Not long after this, there happened a sore famine in the land, and the long continuance of it, which was for three years, made David suspect that it did not proceed from any common cause, but was inflicted by the immediate hand of God; and when he consulted the divine oracle to know the occasion of it, he was given to understand, that Saul's cruelty to the Gibeonites, in slaying so many, contrary to the treaty then depending between him and them, was the cause of it. Hereupon David sent to the Gibeonites, to know ^f what satisfaction they desired; and when he was told, that they expected seven of Saul's posterity to be delivered to them, he complied with their demand, and sent two sons of Rizpah, Saul's concubine, and ^g five of Merab, his eldest daughter, but

^e In the beginning of this woman's speech to Joab, there is something that seems both abrupt and obscure. 'They were wont to speak in old time, saying, They should surely ask counsel at Abel, and so they ended the matter,' (2 Sam. xx. 18.) according to this translation, the sense of the words is, 'This city, which thou art about to destroy, is no mean and contemptible one, but so honourable and considerable for its wisdom, and the wise people in it, that when any difference did arise among any of the neighbouring places, they used proverbially to say, We will ask the opinion and advice of the men of Abel about it, and we will stand to their arbitration; and so all parties were satisfied, and disputes ended.' So that her words, according to this sense, are an high commendation of the city of Abel, for its being a place time out of mind, very eminent for the wisdom and prudence of its inhabitants. But there is another translation in the margin of our Bibles, which seems to be more natural, and makes the woman speak in this manner. 'When the people saw thee lay siege to the city, they said, Surely he will ask, if we will have peace; for the law prescribes, that he should offer peace to strangers, much more then to Israelitish cities; and if he would once do this, we should soon bring things to an amicable agreement; for we are peaceable people, and faithful to our prince.' So that, according to this interpretation, the woman both modestly reproved Joab for the neglect of his duty, and artfully engaged him in the performance of it.—Patrick's Commentary, and Poole's Annotations.

^f This may seem strange, unless we suppose, as Josephus does, that when David consulted God, he told him, not only for what crime it was that he sent this punishment, but that he should take such a revenge for it as the Gibeonites should desire: and there was this farther reason for honouring the Gibeonites herein, because they had been modest under their sufferings, and never made any complaint to David of the injuries that had been done them.—Patrick's Commentary.

^g Michal is put in the text indeed, (2 Sam. xxi. 8.) but not by spared Mephibosheth, the son of Jonathan for the love which he had for his father when alive. These seven the Gibeonites took, and hung upon gibbets; and there they intended them to hang, ^a until God should send rain upon the earth, for the want of this occasioned the famine. But Rizpah, being informed of this, had a tent made of sackcloth pitched near the place, for her to live in, that so, by the help of her servants, she might ^b keep watch day and night, to fright away the birds and beasts from doing any hurt to the dead bodies. It was not long, however, before God sent plentiful showers of rain, so that Rizpah had the liberty to take down the bodies. And, when David was informed of this her pious care, he was moved thereby to take up the bones of Saul, and Jonathan his son, who, for five and thirty years before, had been buried under a tree at Jabesh-Gilead, and together with these seven sufferers of the same family, gave them an honourable interment in the tomb of Kish, the father of Saul, at Zelah, in the country of Benjamin.

David, in the beginning of his reign, had so humbled the Philistines, that they were not able to bring any great numbers into the field; but still, as long as they had men among them of a gigantic stature, ^c and such as were fit to be their champions, they did not cease to disturb the peace of Israel, insomuch that David, in the latter end of his reign, had four engagements with them. In the first of which, himself had like to have been slain by one of these monstrous large men, had not Abishai come timely in to his aid, and killed the Philistine; upon which occasion, it was unanimously agreed in the army, mistake, as some will have it; for though Michal was not the wife of Adriel, but Merab; yet those children which Merab had by Adriel, Michal brought up; and the Jews observe, upon this occasion, that whoever brings up a pupil in his house, is in Scripture said to have begotten him. Nor is it in Scripture only, that this form of expression takes place, but in heathen authors likewise. For Agamemnon and Menelaus are called sons of Atreus, because Pliethenes, who was their father, being dead, he took care to bring them up.—Howell's History, in the notes; and Patrick's Commentary.

^a It was a positive law to the Israelites, (Deut. xxi. 22, 23.) that if any man was hanged, he should be buried before night; but the Gibeonites being not of that nation, thought themselves not obliged by that law. They are remarked indeed to have been a remnant of the Amorites, (2 Sam. xxi. 2.) and among them, as some have imagined, it was a barbarous custom in those days, as it certainly prevailed in alter ages, to hang up men, in order to appease the anger of the gods in time of famine.—Patrick's and Calmel's Commentaries.

^b It is an obvious remark from hence, that crosses and gibbets, whereon malefactors were executed, did not stand high from the ground, since the dead bodies of such were in danger of being torn by ravenous creatures; and what we may farther observe is, that it was an ancient custom for the relations of such as were thus executed, to watch their dead bodies. Thus Homer (Iliad, 23.) mentions Venus, as taking care of Hector's body; and the story of the Ephesian matron every one can tell.—Calmel's Commentary.

^c This is not a solitary instance. Taverner informs us, that the eldest son of the emperor of Java, who reigned in 1648, had six fingers on each hand, and six toes on each foot. And Maupeitius, in his seventeenth letter says, that he met with two families near Berlin, where sedigitism was equally transmitted on both sides of father and mother. I once saw a young girl, in the county of Londonderry in Ireland, who had six fingers on each hand, and six toes on each foot, but her stature had nothing gigantic in it. The daughters of Caius Horatius, of patrician dignity, were called sedigita, because they had six fingers on each hand. Volcatius a poet, was called sedigitus for the same reason.—See Pliny's Natural History, b. xi. c. 43; Dr A. Clarke.—ED.

that the king should never more go into the battle, lest a ^d life so precious should be lost.

In the other three engagements, nothing remarkable happened, but the death of four of these huge men, by the hands of some of David's chief officers; except we may mention here another valiant act, ^e which might probably be done at this time.

The Philistines' army lay in the valley of Rephaim, between David's camp and Bethlehem, where they had likewise a garrison. But notwithstanding this, upon David's intimating a desire to have some of the water of Bethlehem, three of his chief captains broke through the enemies' camp, and having drawn some water out of the well, brought it to David; but he, understanding at what price it had been purchased, even at the hazard of all their lives, would not drink it, but offered it to the Lord.

About two years before David's death, whatever might be the occasion of it, so it was, that ^f he was desirous to know the number of his people, and accordingly gave his chief officers orders to go through the whole kingdom, and bring him an account of all the people. Joab endeavoured to remonstrate against it, in a manner more modest than was customary with him; but the king's orders were positive; and therefore Joab, with other officers to assist him, beginning on the east side of Jor-

^d The expression is very beautiful, and significant in the text, 'Thou shalt no more go out with us to battle, that thou quench not the light of Israel,' (2 Sam. xxi. 17.) For good kings are in Scripture justly called the light of the people, (1 Kings xi. 36. and Ps. cxxxii. 17.) because the beauty and glory, the conduct and direction, the comfort, and safety, and welfare of a people, depend upon them, and are derived from them.—Pool's Annotations.

^e It is commonly observed, by the Jewish commentators, that though David expressed a desire for some of the water of Bethlehem, because it was the place of his nativity, and the water not improbably very excellent in its kind, yet he did not do this with any intent, that any should venture their lives to fetch him it. In this action, however, they have remarked three wonderful things, namely, That three men could break through the whole host of the Philistines; and when they had so done, durst stay to draw water out of the well, and then carry it away with an high hand, through the same host to David. But they might have added a fourth remark, namely, That they attempted this at the gate of Bethlehem, where a garrison of the Philistines kept a strong guard.—Patrick's Commentary.

^f The words in the text are, 'And again the anger of the Lord was kindled against Israel, and he moved David against them to say, Go number Israel and Judah,' (2 Sam. xxiv. 1.) But in the original there is no nominative case at all. We find it however supplied in 1 Chron. xxi. 1. where it is said, that 'Satan stood up against Israel, and provoked David to number Israel.' But then, by the word Satan, there is no necessity why we should understand the devil properly so called, because any evil minister, or counsellor, that advised David to number the people, will answer the signification of the word as well. And that there was some such counsellor, who prompted David to this action, seems to be implied in these words of Joab, 'Now the Lord thy God add unto the people, how many soever they be, an hundred fold, and that the eyes of my lord the king may see it; but why doth my lord the king delight in this thing?' (2 Sam. xxiv. 3.) Whereby it seems plain, that the matter had been debated in the king's council before, and that, though Joab was one who opposed it, David was more influenced by the persuasion of some other.—Le Clerc's Commentary.—Dr Boothroyd translates this passage as follows, "And the anger of Jehovah was again kindled against Israel, because an adversary stood up against Israel, and moved David against them to say, Go number Israel and Judah." This translation represents the meaning of the original as compared with the parallel place, 1 Chron. xxi. 1. and gets rid of the difficulty involved in the received text.—ED.

dan, came round by the north parts of Canaan, and returned to Jerusalem, at the end of nine months and twenty days, with an estimate, that in Israel there were eight hundred thousand men fit to bear arms, and ^a five hundred thousand in Judah; but of the men that belonged to the tribes of Levi and Benjamin, there was no list given in.

David had no sooner received the account, but his heart misgave him, that he had done wrong; and it was not long, before the prophet Gad was sent to bring his sin to remembrance, and to offer him the choice of three punishments, ^b famine, pestilence, or war, which he liked best.

Where every punishment was so destructive, it was hard to tell which to prefer; but David at last made choice of the pestilence; which accordingly was sent, and, in ^c a very short time, destroyed no less than seventy thousand men. The plague began in the extreme parts of the kingdom, but every moment made advances nearer and nearer to Jerusalem; which when the king and inhabitants of the city heard, they clothed themselves in sack-cloth, and, with all humility, cried unto God for mercy. A little before the offering up of the evening sacrifice,

^a If we compare this account with what we meet with in 1 Chron. xxi. 5. we shall find a great difference; for there the men of Israel are said to be three hundred thousand more than they are here, and, on the other hand, the men of Judah are said to be thirty thousand less. But as for the former difference it is but supposing, that in this account recorded in Samuel, the standing legions, which amounted in all to two hundred and eighty-eight thousand, that is, twenty-four thousand with their officers, upon guard every month, are not here mentioned, though they be in Chronicles: and as to the latter difference, it is but adding twenty-four thousand legionary soldiers to the tribe of Judah, and the difficulty is removed. Though some are apt to think, that in this case, there is no need of this supposition, because it is a common thing in Scripture to mention a round sum, either of men or years, though upon a strict computation, there may be some wanting.—Patrick's Commentary.

^b There is another difference in this account, and what we meet with in the book of Chronicles. There the famine is said to be for three years only, but here it is said to be for seven. The Septuagint indeed make it no more than three; and for this reason some have imagined, that the seven is an error crept into the text, especially considering that three years of famine agree better with three days' pestilence, and three months' flight before an enemy. But there is no reason to suppose any error in the text; it is but saying, that in Chronicles, the author speaks of those years of famine which were to come for David's sin only, but in Samuel, of those three years of famine likewise, which were sent for Saul's sin, (2 Sam. xxi.) Now, within one year after the famine that was sent for Saul's sin, was David's sin in numbering the people; the intermediate year then was either the sabbatical year, wherein the people were not allowed to sow nor reap, or a year of such excessive drought, that the crop came to little or nothing. Upon either of these accounts we may properly enough say, that there were four years of famine before, and three more being now added to them, make up the seven that are here mentioned.—Pool's Annotations.

^c The words in the text are: 'So the Lord sent a pestilence upon Israel; from the morning, even to the time appointed.' The time appointed was the space of three days; and therefore some are of opinion, that the plague lasted so long; but then others urge, that this does not agree with what follows, namely, that 'God repented him of the evil, and commanded the angel, who smote the people, to stay his hand. They therefore conclude, that as the word Moed properly signifies an assembly, the "time Moed" must be, when the people met together at the time of the evening sacrifice, that is, about the ninth hour of the day; and consequently, that the plague continued from the morning to this time, which is about nine hours, or the eighth part of three days; God, in his mercy, having been pleased to mitigate the rigour of his judgment, upon the sincere repentance of his people.—Patrick's Commentary, and Pool's Annotations.

or before the time of evening prayer, there appeared an angel over Jerusalem brandishing a flaming sword in his hand, as if he were going to destroy it; whereupon David implored God's mercy for the people, what vengeance soever might light upon him, who was chiefly guilty: but as he was expecting some heavy stroke, the angel sent Gad to him, with orders to go immediately, and build an altar in the thrashing-floor ^d of Aramah the Jebusite, which accordingly he did, and having purchased the place, and some oxen for sacrifice, ^e for ^f fifty shekels of silver, he offered burnt-offerings and peace-offerings, whereof the Lord declared his acceptance by fire from heaven; and so the plague ceased.

It is not improbable, that God at this time revealed to David the exact frame and fashion of the temple; that from the acceptableness of his sacrifices, he perceived that this thrashing-floor was the place which God had designed for the situation of his temple; that therefore he not only purchased that, but the whole top of the mount of Moriah likewise, at the price of ² 'six hundred shekels of gold,' for the ground-plot of this temple; and that all the remainder of his time was employed in providing whatever was necessary for the purpose of building it; in settling the number of the officers, and the manner of the daily service of those that were to attend it; next to this, in settling his civil affairs, and appointing ³ judges, magistrates, and all inferior officers, whose business it was to punish offenders, and to keep all others to their duty, then in settling his ⁴ military matters, particularly the twelve captains, for every month, with their legions, to attend on the king in their turns; then ⁵ the princes of the twelve tribes, and afterwards ⁶ several other officers.

But while he was contriving these things in the best manner, he seems to have been taken, either with a dead palsy, or some other distemper, which chilled his blood, so that he could not be warm in his bed. His physicians therefore advised, that to supply him with ^f a natural

^d 2 Sam. xxiv. 18. A thrashing-floor among the ancient Jews, was only, as it is to this day in the east, a round level plot of ground in the open air, where the corn was trodden out by oxen. Thus Gideon's floor (Judges vi. 37.) appears to have been in the open air; as was likewise this of Aramah the Jebusite; else it would not have been a proper place for erecting an altar and offering sacrifice. In Hosea xiii. 3. we read of the chaff which is driven by the whirlwind from the floor.—Shaw's Travels, p. 139, second edition.—Ed.

^e There is again another difference in the account which we have in the Chronicles, and this in Samuel. In the Chronicles it is said, that David bought the thrashing-floor, &c., for six hundred shekels of gold; but in Samuel it is said, for fifty shekels of silver. Now a shekel of gold being of twelve times more value than a shekel of silver, it makes the disparity very large; and therefore, to account for this, it is generally supposed, that in the whole David made two purchases: first he bought the thrashing-floor and oxen, for which he gave fifty shekels of silver; but that afterwards all the ground about it, out of which the courts of the temple were made, cost him six hundred shekels of gold.—Patrick's Commentary.

^f It is the observation of Galen, in his fifth book "Of the power of simple medicines," that nothing so effectually procures heat and health as the application of any thing young to the stomach: the advice of David's physicians therefore was not amiss; but it had been sinful advice, and such as he could not have followed, had not this young woman, whom he took to bed to him, been his concubinary wife. In those days such wives were allowable: and that she served him in this capacity, is very heat, a virgin should lie in the same bed with him; for which purpose Abishag of Shunem, in the tribe of Issachar, was brought to him, and made concubinary wife, though he had never any carnal knowledge of her.

Adonijah, who, next after Absalom, was David's eldest son, taking the advantage of his father's age and infirmity, began to entertain thoughts of making himself king, presuming that his father either could not, or would not obstruct him. He was indeed a prince of exquisite beauty, admired by all, and so indulged by his father, that he ^a never contradicted him in any thing; but as he had a great deal of Absalom in his complexion, he failed not to imitate him in his equipage, attendants, and splendid manner of life.

By some means, however, he had gained Joab the general of the forces, and Abiathar the high priest, over to his party; and by their advice it was, that he invited all the king's sons, except Solomon, and all the great men of Judah, except Nathan the prophet, Benaiah captain of the guards, and the officers of the army, (who, with Zadok the other high priest, were not for him,) to a sumptuous entertainment at En-rogel, where the purpose of the meeting was, as soon as the company had well feasted, to proclaim him king in the room of his father. Nathan, who knew ^b God's designation, David's choice, and the people's interest in the matter, having got intelligence of this, went and acquainted Bathsheba with it, and advised her by all means to go and press the king ^c to declare Solomon his successor, since things were now come to that extremity, that without her doing this, all their lives must certainly be in danger. Bathsheba pursued her instructions; went to the king, and, having acquainted him with Adonijah's conspiracy, desired him to name her son his successor, according to the oath that he had formerly made to her. While she was thus talking with the king, Nathan came in, and confirmed what manifest from the account we have of her in Scripture, for whereas it is said, that 'the king knew her not,' this certainly implies, that he might have had carnal knowledge of her without sin or scandal; whereas it is said, that 'she lay in his bosom,' this phrase everywhere in Scripture denotes what was the sole privilege of a wife, concubine, (Gen. xvi. 5. Deut. xiii. 6.) Nor can we imagine why Adonijah's desiring her in marriage had been so heinous a crime in Solomon's account, had she not been the king's wife, and he, by this means, had designed to revive his pretensions to the crown.—Poole's Annotations.

^a It is remarked of David, that one of his great faults, and what had led him into many premiuures, was his extraordinary indulgence to his children, of whom he was so fond, that he seems to have overlooked their errors, and not reproved them, though he was bound to do it, by a plain law, (Lev. xix. 17.) and could not but know, that the high priest Eli was severely punished for this neglect.—Poole's Annotations.

^b In 2 Sam. vii. 12. God had promised David by Nathan, that he would set upon his throne a son that should proceed from him, which plainly signified, that none of his sons already born were to be the person: and in 1 Chron. xxii. 9, &c., he declared by the same prophet, that after his father, Solomon should reign, and build him an house. This Adonijah could not but know; and therefore his setting himself against the decree of heaven made his sin the greater.—Patrick's Commentary.

^c This power of naming a successor was first assumed by David, and for some time afterwards, as it appears by the story of his grandson Rehoboam, was continued in the Jewish state. It was a privilege that, in after ages, was granted to several good princes; but among the Israelites it did not prevail long, because the constitution of other nations, to which the Israelites affected to conform themselves, was different.—Poole's Annotations, and Patrick's Commentary.

she had said; so that David immediately declared Solomon his successor, and thereupon commanded Zadok the priest, Nathan the prophet, and Benaiah the captain of his guards, with the other officers and ministers of state, to mount him ^d on the mule that he himself used to ride, and having in this manner ^e conducted him to Gihon, there to let Zadok and Nathan anoint him, and then, by sound of trumpet, to proclaim him king of Israel. All this was accordingly done, and the people of Jerusalem, by their loud shouts and acclamations of joy, gave testimony of their approbation of David's choice.

But how thunderstruck was Adonijah and his company, when, being just upon the point of proclaiming him king, they heard the sound of the trumpet, and the shouts of the people attending Solomon! As soon as they were informed of the occasion, each man thought proper to shift for himself; but, as for Adonijah, he ^f fled to the altar for sanctuary, till, having obtained of Solomon a promise of life, upon condition that he would never attempt any thing for the future against his government, he was conducted into the king's presence, where he

^d All the rest of David's sons were wont to ride upon mules, when they went abroad, (2 Sam. xiii. 29,) but David had a mule peculiar to himself, and the mounting Solomon upon it was a sufficient declaration in his favour. For, as it was capital, according to Maimonides, to ride upon the king's mule, or sit on his throne, or handle his sceptre without his order; so, on the contrary, to have the honour to ride upon the king's horse, by his appointment, was accounted the highest dignity among the Persians, as appears by the story of Mordecai, in the book of Esther.—Cabnet's Commentary.

^e Some commentators are of opinion, that Gihon was the same with the fountain of Siloam; but this is a gross mistake, since Gihon was manifestly to the west, and Siloam to the east of Jerusalem. There is little or no certainty likewise in the notions of some rabbins, who pretend that, in ancient times, kings were always anointed by the side of a fountain, by way of good omen, or that the perpetual running of the stream might be an emblem of the perpetuity of the king's reign. In the history of Saul, who was their first king, and of David, who was three times anointed, we find no mention made of any spring or fountain. As these fountains, however, were places of great concourse, for there were not many in Jerusalem, the chief reason, we may imagine, why David ordered Solomon to be anointed at one of these, was, that the thing might be done as publicly, and in the presence of as many spectators as possible.—Patrick's Commentary.

^f There is no precept in the law to make the altar a privileged place; but, in conformity to the customs of other nations, the Jews seem to have done it. Other nations had certainly this custom, as appears from that passage in Virgil, "In such words he prayed, grasping the altars." (Æneid 6.) And it seems not unlikely, that as the people, when they came into the land of Canaan, had cities appointed by God, wherunto the manslayer might fly; so while they continued in the wilderness, the camp of the Levites might serve for the same purpose. Nay, from the words in Exodus xxi. 14, where God orders the wilful murderer 'to be taken from his altar, that he may die,' it seems unquestionably true, that, even in the land of Canaan, the altar continued a sanctuary for those who fled unto it; but then the question is, to what altar Adonijah fled? Whether to the brazen one which Moses made, and which was now at Gibeon, or that which his father had lately erected in the thrashing-floor of Aramath? It is expressly said, (1 Kings i. 50.) that 'he caught hold of the horns of the altar;' but we can hardly suppose, say some, that the altar in the thrashing-floor, which was run up in such haste with stones and turf, was made in that figure. But what should hinder us from supposing, that as David had built a place for the reception of the ark of the covenant on mount Zion, he had likewise built there an altar for the oblation of the daily sacrifices, in the exact form of the original one that was then at Gibeon, and that it was to this altar, and neither of the others, that Adonijah betook himself for refuge.—Le Clerc's, Patrick's, and Cabnet's Commentaries.

made his obeisance to Solomon, in token of thankfulness for his preservation, and in acknowledgment of his superiority.

This inauguration of Solomon, however, was a little too hasty and private; and therefore David, intending a more public coronation, ordered all the princes of Israel and Judah, and all the officers of his court and army to attend him: when, having recovered a little from his late indisposition, he stood up, and ^a in a solemn oration, put them in mind of God's goodness to him, and of his designation of Solomon to succeed in his throne, and to build him a temple. And therefore since he had reserved that honour for his son, he earnestly recommended to him a strict fidelity and piety towards God, and a zealous discharge of this important trust. To this purpose he gave him the plan which he had made for the execution of this undertaking, and an account of the treasures which he had provided for the perfecting of this great work. He gave him also a list of the priests and Levites, and the courses in which they were to wait in the temple: he gave him likewise the schemes, and regulations of the officers of his court, of the civil officers, of the treasures, and of the superintendents of the revenues, belonging to the crown; and, having made a large oblation of money out of his own private estate for the building of the temple, by his example and persuasion, he prevailed with the princes and the people to contribute according to their abilities, to so good and pious a work. And when he found himself successful herein, for what they gave upon this occasion amounted to an immense sum, he concluded all with a solemn thanksgiving to God, and a prayer, that he would enable Solomon to perfect what he had thus designed and recommended.

^a The speech which Josephus puts in David's mouth upon this occasion, is to this purpose:—"I am now to inform you, my countrymen and brethren, that I have had it a long time in my thoughts to erect a temple to the Lord, and have treasured up a mighty mass of gold and silver toward the charge of the undertaking; but it has pleased God, in his providence, by the mouth of his prophet Nathan, to put a stop to my design, upon this consideration, that he would not have the foundation of his holy house laid by hands that have been dipped in blood, which mine inevitably have been, though in the blood of your enemies, in the wars I have been forced to engage in, for the necessary defence of your liberties: but, at the same time that he forbade me to do this, the prophet informed me, that God had transmitted the care of the whole work to my son and successor. Our father Jacob, as you all well know, had twelve sons, and yet Judah was chosen by common consent to be ruler of all the rest. You know likewise, that I myself, though there were then six brothers of us, was advanced by God to the government, and that none of the rest thought themselves injured: wherefore I must now, in like manner, require it of you, and of all your sons, that you submit cheerfully and dutifully to my son Solomon, and that ye do it without any grumbling or civil dissension, because it is from God's immediate command and commission that he derives his authority. Put the case now, that God should have set a stranger over you, how great a folly and madness would it have been for you to murmur at it? But how thankful ought you to be, for the choice of so near a relation, when you yourselves are partakers of the honour that is done to your brother. There is nothing I so much long for, as to see God's gracious promises take a speedy effect, and the whole people put into a lasting possession of the blessings they are to enjoy under the reign of Solomon. And all this, my dear son, (says he, turning to Solomon,) will be made good, and every thing succeed to your wish, so long as you govern according to piety and justice, with a respect to your duty both towards God and man, upholding a reverence to the laws, and treading in the steps of your forefathers: but whenever you pass these bounds, there is nothing but ruin and misery to be expected.—Jewish Antiquities, b. 7. c. 11.

The next day there was a very great and solemn sacrifice, and much rejoicing among the people. David, upon this occasion, had Solomon anointed a second time, in a more public manner; ordered that Zadok should be the high priest in the room of Abiathar, who had publicly espoused the interest of Adonijah, and, to put an end to all disputes after his decease, had him for the future seated on a royal throne, and made sole regent of the kingdom during his lifetime.

Not long after this, David, perceiving his end approaching, called for Solomon, ^b and gave him his last exhortation, which was, to be constant in his duty to God, ¹ 'to walk in his ways, and ^c keep his statutes, and his commandments, his judgments, and his testimonies, that he might prosper in all that he did;' and then descending to some particular affairs relating to the state, he charged him to do justice to Joab, for the many murders he had been guilty of; to show kindness to the sons of Barzillai, for the support their father had given him in his distress; and though he himself had not put Shimei to death for his past offences, yet whenever he should prove guilty again, not to spare him. ^d Having

^b Josephus introduces David as taking his last leave of his son Solomon in these words: "And now, son, I am going to my fathers, and you, that I leave behind me, are in due time to follow, which is no more than paying a common debt to nature. There is no returning from the grave, and, when we are once gone, we have done with this world for ever. Wherefore, while I am yet among the living, and before it be too late, pray let me remind you of the same things once more. Govern your subjects according to justice. Worship that God from whom you have received your dignity as well as your being, as you are bound to do. Observe his precepts, and keep his laws, as they have been handed down to you from Moses, and have a care that you never forsake them, either for fear, flattery, or any passion or interest whatsoever; for otherwise you can never hope for the blessings of God's favour and providence. But if you behave yourself with reverence and submission towards God, as you ought to do, and as I wish you may do, your kingdom will be established to yourself, and the succession of it continued to your family from generation to generation.—Jewish Antiquities, b. 7. c. 12.

^c Under these four words are comprehended all the laws of Moses. Statutes were such constitutions as had their foundation, not in reason, but in the will and pleasure of God; such was the prohibition of sowing seeds of different kinds together, &c. Commandments were moral duties, that were founded in the nature of things, and carried their reason along with them; as, not to steal, not to murder, &c. Judgments were the laws belonging to civil government, and the dealings of one man with another; such are all those laws that are recorded in the 21st and following chapters of Exodus; and testimonies were such laws as preserved the remembrance of some great events, and testified to men the loving-kindness of the Lord: such as the sabbath, the passover, and the rest of the feasts.—Patrick's Commentary.

^d 1 Kings ii. 9. David is here represented in our English version, as finishing his life with giving a command to Solomon to kill Shimei. The behaviour thus imputed to the king and prophet, should be examined very carefully, as to the ground it stands upon. When the passage is duly considered, it will appear highly probable that an injury has been done to this illustrious character. It is not uncommon in the Hebrew language to omit the negative in a second part of a sentence, and to consider it as repeated, when it has been once expressed, and is followed by the connecting particle. The necessity of so very considerable an alteration, as inserting the particle not, may be here confirmed by some other instances. Thus Ps. 1. 5. ix. 18. xxxviii. 1. If then there are in fact many such instances, the question is, whether the negative, here expressed in the former part of David's command, may not be understood as to be repeated in the latter part: and if this may be, a strong reason will be added why it should be so interpreted. The passage will run thus: 'Behold, thou hast with thee Shimei, who cursed thus ended his exhortation to his son, in a short time after he died, in the seventy-first year of his age, after he had reigned forty years in all, ^a seven in Hebron, and three and thirty in Jerusalem; and ^b was buried in that part of the city which himself had taken from the Jebusites, and called after his own name.

me, but I swore to him by the Lord, saying, I will not put thee to death by the sword. Now therefore hold him not guiltless, for thou art a wise man, and knowest what thou oughtest to do unto him, but bring not down his hoary head to the grave with blood.' Now, if the language itself will admit this construction, the sense thus given to the sentence derives a very strong support from the context. For, how did Solomon understand this charge? Did he kill Shimei in consequence of it? Certainly he did not. For, after he had commanded Joab to be slain, in obedience to his father, he sends for Shimei, and knowing that Shimei ought to be well watched, confines him to a particular spot in Jerusalem for the remainder of his life. 1 Kings ii. 36—42.—Kennicott's Remarks, p. 131.—Ed.

^a In 2 Sam. v. 5. it is said, that he reigned seven years and six months in Hebron, which, together with the three and thirty in Jerusalem, will make his reign to be in all forty years and a half. To solve this difficulty, as some of the Jews esteem it, they have devised a conceit, that, to punish David for his adultery with Bathsheba, God sent upon him a leprosy which continued for six months, in all which time he was looked upon as dead, and not accounted to reign. But they never considered, that these months were part of his reign in Hebron, before he committed that adultery in Jerusalem. The true account of the matter therefore is, that it is very usual in Scripture computation, to omit smaller sums, and only reckon by a round number; for which reason these six months, which were but part of a year, are not taken notice of in the account both of Kings, 1 Kings ii. 11. and Chronicles, 1 Chron. xxix. 26, 27.—Patrick's Commentary; and Paole's Annotations.

^b After this account which Josephus gives us of David's several speeches before his death, he informs us, "That he was buried at Jerusalem with a solemnity of royal pomp and magnificence, that was glorious to the highest degree, and that, over and above the splendour of the ceremony, his son Solomon deposited in his monument an inestimable treasure, from which, when Antiochus, surnamed the Pious, besieged Jerusalem, Hircanus, the high priest, took the sum of three thousand talents, and therewith bribed them to raise the siege; and that, many years after this, Herod, surnamed the Great, took another immense sum from thence, which enabled him to rebuild the temple." Among several nations indeed it was customary to bury, along with princes and other great men, various things of value, that they took delight in while they lived. The Egyptians were used to this; and about their mummies are frequently found very precious ornaments. When Alexander the Great had Cyrus's tomb opened, there was found therein a bed of gold, a very rich table, drinking cups, and many fine vestments; but notwithstanding all this, several learned men look upon this whole account of Josephus as a mere fable. For to what purpose, say they, did Solomon bury all this treasure under ground, when he had so much occasion for it, when he was forced to borrow money of the king of Tyre, and burden his people with so many heavy taxes to supply his excessive expenses? How came it, that the other kings of Judah, who were frequently put to the necessity of stripping the temple of its precious furniture to satisfy their greedy enemies, never once adventured to lay hold on this treasure? How came it to escape the hands of the Chaldeans, and other nations, that so often had the plundering of Jerusalem? Or why should Hircanus violate this deposit, which his predecessors esteemed more sacred than the holy vessels of the Lord? These are questions that cannot easily be resolved; and what is a farther confutation of this story, in that very book, from whence Josephus is supposed to have taken it, it is never once said, that Hircanus broke open David's tomb. The words of that spurious author are that "Hircanus, while he was besieged by Antiochus, opened a treasure chamber which belonged to some of David's descendants, and that, after he had taken a large sum of money out of it, he still left a great deal in it, and sealed it up again." But this is a quite diligent thing, and has no manner of relation to the sepulchre of David. As to the real sepulchre of David,

When David was dead, Solomon succeeded to the throne; and to secure his possession, took an occasion, in a short time, to rid himself of his adversaries. Adonijah, in his father's lifetime, had made bold pretensions, but was defeated, and pardoned by Solomon upon condition that he would become a good subject, and give him no farther molestation; but, by the persuasion of Joab and Abiathar, he was now put upon another bold project, which was to desire Abishag, the late king's concubine in his old age, in marriage, hoping thereby to strengthen his interest, and to be able to play an after game for the crown. To this purpose he prevailed with Bathsheba, the queen-mother, to speak to the king: but the king was so far from granting his request, that he was shocked at the boldness of it, and suspecting some treasonable design at the bottom, sent immediately and had him put to death. In the next place he banished Abiathar; and, having inhibited him from the exercises of his priestly office, confined him to his country house, and put Zadok in his place; and when he heard that Joab was fled into the tabernacle for sanctuary, upon his refusing to come out at his command, ^c he ordered Benaiah, whom he

it is certain, that it was always held in great veneration among the Jews. It was in being in St Peter's time, for so he tells the people, (Acts ii. 29.) Dio (in Adriani vita) informs us, that part of it was fallen down in the emperor Adrian's reign. St Jerome relates, that he himself used frequently to go and pray at it; and modern travellers, as we took notice before, describe some magnificent monuments hewed in a rock, not far from Jerusalem, which are doubtless very ancient; but they themselves do not agree that they were the sepulchres of the kings of Judah. It is somewhat unaccountable, however, that the place of this prince's sepulchre, which both the Chaldeans and the Romans, when they took Jerusalem, thought proper to spare, should now be so entirely lost that we cannot find the least remains of it. But though providence has so ordered it, that the place of David's sepulchre should not at present be known, yet there does not want an eternal monument of his most excellent genius. The book of Psalms, which for the most part was composed by him, does publish the glory of its author, more than the most pompous eulogies; and the author of Ecclesiasticus (chap. xlvii. 2, &c.) has consecrated this epitaph to his memory, which is more durable than either marble or brass:—'As the fat is taken away from the peace-offering, so was David chosen out of the people of Israel. He played with lions as with kids, and with bears as with lambs; he slew a giant when he was young, and took away reproach from the people; for he called upon the most high Lord, and he gave strength to his right hand to slay this mighty warrior, and to set up the horn of his people. So the people honoured him with ten thousands, and praised him in blessings of the Lord, for he destroyed the enemies on every side, and brought to nought the Philistines, his adversaries:—In all his works he praised the Holy One most high, and blessed the Lord with words of glory:—He set singers also before the altar, that by their voices they might make sweet melody, and daily sing praises in their songs. He beautified their feasts, and set their solemn times in perfect order:—The Lord took away his sins, and exalted his horn for ever; he gave him a covenant of kings, and a throne of glory in Israel.'—Calnet's Commentary, and his Dictionary under the word David.

^c It was formerly very customary among princes, to employ their officers, or greatest confidants, in such like executions. Among the Romans, the soldiers were always the persons who carried to prison, to torture, or to execution, such as were found guilty of any offence; and this Tertullian makes an argument to dissuade Christians from engaging in the wars, lest thereby they should be obliged to imprison, punish, or execute malefactors. In Dan. ii. 24. we read that Nebuchadnezzar 'sent Arioch, who was chief commander of his troops, to destroy the wise men of Babylon,' because they could not interpret his dream; and therefore we need less wonder, that we find Solomon employing Benaiah, the captain of his guard, on the like office. But whether afterwards made general in his room, to go in, and kill him there. But when Shimei, who deserved the like fate for his gross abuse of the late king, was brought before him, he only ^a confined him to Jerusalem as a prisoner at large, but with a strict injunction not to move out of the place, upon pain of death. Upon this condition he thankfully accepted of his life, and, for some time, kept within the bounds of his confinement; but having some slaves, who had run away, and had entered themselves into ^b the service of Achish, king of Gath, he imprudently went to reclaim them, and, upon his return, by Solomon's order was put to death.

Having thus secured his kingdom at home, by confining, or cutting off the heads of the faction that was against him, Solomon bethought himself of strengthening his interest abroad by foreign alliances; and to this purpose, married the daughter of ^c Pharaoh king of Egypt, and appointed her at first an apartment in his own palace; but after he had finished the temple, built her a very stately palace adjoining to his own, which she badly deserved; for, in process of time, this woman, he did not first drag Joab from the altar before he slew him, for fear of polluting the holy place with blood, or whether Solomon did not rather think fit to have him killed even at the altar, and let all men see, that no place, though ever so sacred, should secure any man from the hand of justice, commentators have not agreed.—Calmet's and Patrick's Commentaries.

^a Shimei, as we read, was a very powerful man. When he came to meet king David, and to beg pardon for his offence, he had a thousand of his own tribe to accompany him, (2 Sam. xix. 17.) and therefore Solomon might think proper to confine him to the city of Jerusalem, that being removed from the place where his family and interest lay, to one where he was but a stranger, and sufficiently odious for his former ill treatment of the late king, he might be incapable of raising any tumults or seditions; and that, being in this public theatre, all his words and actions might be narrowly observed, which, considering his busy and wicked temper, might give Solomon a fair advantage against him; and as the manner of some is, the very prohibition itself might probably inflame his desire to transgress it.—Poole's Annot.

^b Achish had been so great a friend to David, that, though David had conquered the Philistines, he suffered him still to retain the title of a king, and only to be tributary to him; so that there was a friendly correspondence between this city and Jerusalem, insomuch that Shimei might easily hear, by somebody or other that had been at Gath, that his servants were there. These servants, in all probability, were such as he had purchased with a considerable sum of money, and their running away was not only a loss but a great affront likewise to their master; and therefore partly out of rage, and partly through covetousness, he undertook this dangerous journey, presuming that a thing which might be done secretly and speedily, would never come to Solomon's ears; that in the space of three years' time, Solomon might have forgot his injunction; or that if he remembered it he would not be so rigid as to put it in execution; especially since he went out of Jerusalem, not through wantonness, or any contempt of authority, but merely to recover what he had lost, which, he might think, was a thing excusable.—Poole's Annotations, and Patrick's Commentary.

^c It may seem somewhat strange, that in all the history of the Jews, from the time of Moses to this of Solomon, no mention should be made of the kings of Egypt, as if they had no concern in the affairs of Canaan, but were wholly diverted some other way: but for this, their own historians account, when they tell us, that, during this space of time, the Egyptian kings did nothing worth recording. (Diodor. Biblioth. b. 1. p. 29.) All these kings of Egypt were called Pharaohs; but Pharaoh was not a proper name, but a title of dignity only, which imported the same as sultan or emperor. They had, besides this, other names; and Clemens Alexandrinus, in a passage taken from Alexander Polyhistor, tells us, that the proper name of this Egyptian king, whose daughter Solomon married, was Vaphres.—Le Clerc's and Calmet's Commentaries.

among others, contributed not a little to the perversion of Solomon.

He began his reign however with a good sense of religion upon his mind; for which end, taking the chief of the officers and nobility along with him, he went to Gibeon, where the original tabernacle and altar, that were made in the wilderness, were kept, and there offered a thousand sacrifices, in acknowledgment of God's kindness to him, in placing him upon his father's throne. In the night following, when God appeared to him in a vision, and promised to grant whatever he should ask, he begged him to give him ^d a wise and understanding heart, and ^e considering his youth and inexperience, such qualities as were necessary for the due government of the people committed to his charge; which petition God was so well pleased with, that, over and above the wisdom which he asked, he promised to give him such affluence of riches and honour, as no king in his days should be able to equalize. When Solomon awaked out of sleep, he perceived that this was a dream sent from God; and therefore returning to Jerusalem, he presented himself before the ark of the covenant, which was placed in a tabernacle, that David had made for it, and there he offered sacrifices in abundance.

Solomon, as we said, had obtained of God a promise of the gift of wisdom; and it was not long before he had an opportunity of showing it, to the great satisfaction of all his subjects. ^f Two women, who both lived together

^d Hereupon some Jewish annotators have observed that though Solomon, in his great modesty, might request of God no more than the gift of government, or, as he expresses it, 'an understanding heart to judge the people, and to discern between good and evil,' (1 Kings iii. 9.) yet God, out of his abundant grace, gave him a general knowledge of all other things, as the following history informs us; and that, whereas other men gather their knowledge from study and observation, Solomon had his by an immediate inspiration from God; insomuch that 'he, who went to bed as ignorant as other men, awaked in the morning like an angel of God.' But though his knowledge of things was, in a great measure infused, yet he did not therefore neglect his study. 'He gave his heart to seek, and search out by wisdom, concerning all things under the sun; in which search, as he himself testifies, (Eccles. i. 13.) he took no small pains; so that his gifts extraordinary did not supersede the use of other means in the acquisition of knowledge; but by application and experience he perfected what he had so advantageously received from the hands of God.—Patrick's and Calmet's Commentaries.

^e The words of Solomon himself are, 'I am but a little child; I know not how to go out, or how to come in, (1 Kings iii. 7.) From whence some have inferred, that he was not above twelve years old when he spake them, but this must be a gross miscomputation. His father, when he left the kingdom to him, calls him 'a wise man,' (1 Kings ii. 6, 9.) The foregoing story shows, that he had already sat some time on the throne; and therefore he calls himself a child, not in respect of his years, for most agree that he was twenty when he began to reign, but his skill in governing the people, and managing the affairs of state. This was a modest expression in Solomon; but it is an observation of Aristotle, in his book of politics, that young men are unfit for government, because their consultative power is imperfect; which though it may not be a general rule, was delivered by Solomon himself, in his more mature years, for a maxim: for 'Wo to the land,' says he, (Eccles. x. 16.) 'whose king is a child.'—Patrick's Commentary.

^f These two women are said in the text to be harlots; but the Hebrew word, as we took notice in the case of Rahab, may equally signify a hostess, or one who kept a house of public entertainment; and that it is so to be taken here, we have these reasons to presume:—That as all public prostitution was severely forbidden by the law, Deut. xxiii. 17. women of this infamous character durst not have presented themselves before so just and in one house, were brought to bed about the same time, and one had overlaid her child. She who found the dead child by her, accused the other of having stolen away her living child, and left her dead one in its place: the other pertinaciously denied the thing; so that the question was, 'To whom did this living child belong?' And to determine this, Solomon commanded some that stood by, to take and ^a cut the child in two, and to give to each woman a half; whereupon the real mother begs that the child may be saved, even though it be given to her adversary; but the pretended one is clearly for dividing it; which gave Solomon a full conviction, that she who expressed a tenderness and compassion for the child, was its true mother, and accordingly ordered it to be given her.

The wisdom of the king soon shed a happy influence over all his dominions, and every subject was, in some degree or other, made partaker of it. All Judah and Israel lived in the greatest security; and all the neighbouring nations either paid him tribute, or were his friends and allies. He ruled over all the countries and kingdoms ^b from the Euphrates to the Nile, and in many so wise a king; that women of this lewd behaviour seldom do become mothers of children, and when they chance to have any, are not so solicitous for their preservation, but rather rejoice when they have got rid of them. There is no reason to suppose then, that these women were common harlots; and yet it is generally thought that they were both unmarried persons and guilty of fornication, because no mention is made of their husbands, whose office it was, if they had any, to contest the matter for their wives.—Poole's Annotations; and Calmel's Commentary.

^a Solomon knew at once that the only sign that would discover the true mother, would be her affection, and compassion, and tenderness for her child; and therefore, in order to distinguish between the two, his business was to make trial of this; and if we suppose, that when he commanded the child to be divided, he spake with a sedate countenance, and seeming earnestness, as the true mother's petition to the king makes it apparent that he did, then we may suppose farther, not only the two women, but all the people present with horror and admiration, expecting the execution of the thing; which, when it ended in so just a decision, quite contrary to what they looked for, raised joy in every breast, and gave a more advantageous commendation to the judge: and yet Abarbanel, the Jewish commentator, thinks, that all this was no great proof of Solomon's extraordinary wisdom, nor could it beget that fear or reverence which the text says (1 Kings iii. 25.) it procured to his person. His opinion therefore is, that Solomon made a discovery of the truth antecedent to this experiment; that by observing the countenance, the manner of speech, and all the motions of the women, he discerned the secret of their heart, and penetrated to the bottom of the business; and that his commanding the child to be divided afterwards, was only to notify to the company, what he before had discovered. However this be, it may not be improper, upon this occasion, to mention an instance or two out of profane history, of a singular address, though much inferior to this, in discovering such secrets as seemed to be past finding out. To this purpose, Suetonius, in his life of Claudian, chap. 15., tells us, how that emperor discovered a woman to be the mother of a young man, whom she would not own for her son, by commanding her to be married to him; for the horror of committing incest obliged her to declare the truth; and in like manner, Diodorus Siculus relates, how Ariophanes, king of the Thracians, being appointed to arbitrate between three men, who all pretended to be sons of the king of the Cimmericians, and claimed the succession, found out the true son and heir, by ordering them to shoot each man his arrow into the dead king's body; which one of them refusing to do, was deemed the true claimant.—Poole's Annotations; Patrick's and Calmel's Commentaries.

places his dominions extended beyond the Euphrates. He had a great number of horses and chariots of war. Instances of his wisdom were as numerous as the sands of the sea, and in learning and knowledge he ^c surpassed all the orientals, and the Egyptians. In a word, he was the wisest of mankind, and his reputation was spread through all nations. He composed, or collected, ^d three thousand proverbs, and a ^e thousand and five poems.

and in other places of Scripture, called the river, without any addition: to the west, the country of the Philistines, which bordered upon the Mediterranean sea; and to the south, Egypt. So that Solomon had tributary to him the kingdoms of Syria, Damascus, Moab, and Ammon, which lay between Euphrates and the Mediterranean; as indeed, without such a number of tributary kingdoms, we cannot conceive how the country of Israel could have furnished such a constant supply of provisions and other things necessary for the support of this prince's grandeur.—Patrick's and Calmel's Commentaries.

^c There were three nations in the east of Canaan, that were very famous for their wisdom and erudition; the Chaldeans, beyond the Euphrates; the Persians, beyond the Tigris; and the Arabians on the nearer side of the Euphrates; a little towards the south. But whether the Persians and Chaldeans were remarkable for their learning in Solomon's day, is much doubted among commentators. The book of Job sufficiently shows, that the Arabians, for of that nation was Job and his friends, were famous for their learning in ancient times; and, as to the Chaldeans and other oriental people, since the sons of Noah took up their habitation about Babylon, and the neighbouring countries, it is reasonable to suppose, that where mankind, first began to settle themselves into regular societies, there arts and sciences first began to appear. The Egyptians however pretend to a precedence in this, and several other accomplishments. They say, that the Chaldeans received the principles of philosophy at first from a colony that came from Egypt, as Diodorus indeed makes mention of such a colony, conducted by Belus. But the Chaldeans, on the other hand, maintain, that from them it was, that the Egyptians received their first instructions, and according to some, that Abraham was the person who first communicated to the Chaldeans the knowledge of astronomy, and other sciences. However this be, Solomon received from God a perfect knowledge of all that useful and solid learning, for which the eastern people, and the Egyptians, were justly famed; for, as it follows, he was a great moral philosopher, a great natural philosopher, and an excellent poet.—Patrick's and Calmel's Commentaries.

^d Josephus, who loved to magnify every thing that concerned Solomon, instead of three thousand proverbs, tells us, that Solomon composed three thousand books of proverbs. The greater certainly is our loss, if the thing were credible, because all the proverbs of Solomon, that we have now, are comprised in the book that goes under that name, and in his Ecclesiastes; and yet some learned critics are of opinion, that the nine first chapters of the book of Proverbs were not of Solomon's composition, and that the number of proverbs which properly belong to him, is no more than six hundred and fifty.—Grotius's Annotations; and Calmel's Commentary.

^e These, one would think, were poems enough for a person that had so much other business as king Solomon had; but Josephus, who is never content, makes him the author of so many volumes of poetical compositions; and the Septuagint indeed, as well as other interpreters, make the number of them to be no less than five thousand songs or odes. But of all this number, we have none remaining but the Song of Songs, as it is called, except the hundred and twenty-sixth psalm, which in its Hebrew title, is ascribed to Solomon, may be supposed to be one of these. The Psalter of Solomon, which contains eighteen psalms, a work that was found in Greek in the library of Augsburg, and has been translated into Latin by John Lewis de la Cerda, is supposed by the learned to be none of Solomon's, but of some Hellenistical Jew, much conversant in reading the sacred authors, and who had composed them in imitation of the Psalms of David, whose style he closely pursued, and had inserted several passages of the prophets, especially of Isaiah and Ezekiel, which he accommodated well enough to his purpose. However this be, these eighteen psalms were not unknown to the ancients; for they were formerly in the famous Alexandrian manuscript, which is with us, as may be seen by the index which is still to be found at the end of the New Testament, though the psalms themselves have either been torn out of the book, or lost by some accident. Le Clerc's and Calmet's Commentary, and his Dictionary, under the word Solomon.

He knew the virtue of all plants and trees, from the highest to the lowest; and in his books treated of the nature of ^a all kinds of beasts, and birds, and reptiles, and fishes; inasmuch, that ^b there was a concourse of strangers from all countries to hear his wisdom, and ambassadors from the most remote princes that had heard of his fame.

^a The several books which treated of the nature and virtue of animals, as well as plants, are supposed to have been lost in the Babylonish captivity; but Eusebius, as he is quoted by Anastasius, informs us, that king Hezekiah, seeing the abuse which his subjects made of Solomon's works, by placing too much confidence in the remedies which he prescribed, and the natural secrets which he discovered, thought proper to suppress them all. Notwithstanding this, since his time, many books, concerning the secrets of magic, medicine, and enchantments, have appeared under the name of this prince; and several pieces have been quoted, such as 'The instructions of Solomon to his son Rehoboam; The testament of Solomon; The books of the throne of Solomon; The books of magic, composed by the demons, under the name of Solomon; The Clavicula, or key of Solomon; The ring of Solomon; The contradiction of Solomon,' &c., which were most of them very wicked and pernicious tracts, to which the authors prefixed this great name, to give them more credit and sanction. It is somewhat strange, however, that Josephus should inform us, that Solomon composed books of enchantments, and several manners of exorcisms, or of driving away devils, so that they could return no more; and that he should further assure us, that himself had seen experiments of it by one Eleazar, a Jew, who, in the presence of Vespasian, his sons, and the officers of his army, cured several that were possessed.—Jewish Antiq. b. 8. c. 2. Calmet's Dictionary, under the word Solomon.

^b It is a conceit of one of the Jewish interpreters, that all the kings of the neighbouring countries went to hear the wisdom of Solomon, and that, upon their return, their subjects came to them to hear what he had said; but as we hear of none but the queen of Sheba who came to visit Solomon, we cannot but think, that if any other crowned heads resorted to him, the history would have recorded them as well as her. The words denote no more, than that the kings of all the neighbouring nations sent their ambassadors, and people of every land, that had heard of Solomon's fame, came to see him; for "no spectacle" says an ingenious author, "is more lovely and grateful, than a wise and good king; all men flock to see him, and to partake of his pious and prudent mind. They that see him are loath to leave him, and they that hear of him are as desirous to see him as children are to find their unknown father."—Dion Prusens Orat. de Regno.

^c The fourth chapter of the first book of Kings is chiefly taken up in recording the prime ministers and officers of Solomon's court, the compass and extent of his kingdom, the happiness and security of his subjects, the pomp and magnificence of his living, and the excellence of his own wisdom and erudition.

^d This Hiram was doubtless the son of that other Hiram, who sent David timber and artificers wherewith to build his palace; for if, according to Josephus, the temple was built in the twelfth year of Hiram's reign, and the fourth of Solomon's, this Hiram could not be the same with him who sent David men and materials; because that Hiram was upon the throne when David took Jerusalem, which happened to be three and thirty years, before Solomon began his reign. There are two letters which passed between this Hiram and king Solomon, recorded by Josephus, and for the authenticity of which he appeals both to the Jewish and Tyrian records, that are to this effect:

"King Solomon to King Hiram, greeting.

"Be it known unto thee, O King, that my Father David had it a long time in his mind and purpose, to erect a temple to the

to him to condole his father's death, and congratulate him upon his accession to the throne; and, in a short time after, Solomon, in return sent an embassy to him, desiring him to supply him with wood and workmen, and to lend him his assistance in building the temple of the Lord. Hiram very readily complied with his desire, and sent him word, that he would order cedar trees, and fir trees to be cut down upon mount Libanus; that his people should put them on floats, and bring them by sea to the harbour of Joppa; and that from thence Solomon (who contracted to give Hiram such a quantity of wheat, and wine, and oil, &c., every year, for the maintenance of his household and workmen) might send and fetch them to Jerusalem.

All things being thus agreed on, the preparations for the building of the temple went on apace. Seventy thousand proselytes, who were the remains of the ancient Canaanites, Solomon employed in carrying burdens upon their shoulders; fourscore thousand in cutting stone out of the quarries; and three thousand six hundred in overseeing the work. Of his own subjects, he sent thirty thousand to work with the king of Tyre's men in the quarries of Libanus: and, to finish the inner part of the temple, as well as frame some of its choicest vessels, Hiram ^e sent him a most skilful artist of his own name, Lord; but being perpetually in war in his days, and under a necessity of clearing his hands of his enemies, and making them all his tributaries, before he could attend this great and holy work, he hath left it to me, in a time of peace, both to begin and finish it, according to the direction, as well as prediction, of the Almighty. Blessed be his great name for the present tranquility of my dominions! And, by his gracious assistance, I shall now dedicate the best improvements of this liberty and leisure to his honour and worship. Wherefore I make it my request, that you will let some of your people go along with some servants of mine to mount Libanus, to assist them in cutting down materials towards this building; for the Sidonians understand it much better than we do; and as for the workmen's reward or wages, whatever you think reasonable shall be punctually paid them."

"King Hiram to King Solomon.

"Nothing could have been more welcome to me, than to understand, that the government of your blessed father is by God's providence, devolved into the hands of so excellent, so wise, and so virtuous a successor. His holy name be praised for it! That which you write for shall be done with all care and good will: for I will give orders to cut down and export such quantities of the fairest cedars, and cypress trees as you shall have occasion for. My people shall bring them to the sea side for you, and from thence ship them away to what port you please, when they may lie ready for your own men to transport them to Jerusalem. It would be a great obligation, after all this, to allow us such a provision of corn in exchange, as may stand with your convenience; for that is the commodity that we islanders want most." (Jewish Antiquities, b. 8. c. 2. But notwithstanding all his appeal to the Tyrian records, some have suspected Josephus, as to the genuineness of these two letters, especially where they find him bringing in Hiram, speaking of Tyre, as if it had been an island; whereas it is plain that the old Tyre, which was then standing, and must be the place here spoken of, was situate on the continent.—Le Clerc's Commentary.

^e In former times, among the Hebrews, there had been very excellent workmen, who knew how to cut and engrave precious stones, to cast and work among metals, &c.; but this was before they came into the land of Canaan, in the time of Moses, when Bezaleel and Aholiab were excellent in many different arts, which were necessary for the work of the temple; but, as the Scripture acquaints us, that they had their skill by inspiration from God, it does not appear that they had any successors: and, after the people had got possession of Canaan, they neglected all manufactures, and applied themselves wholly to agriculture and feeding of cattle; so that, in the time of Solomon, there was no whose mother was of the tribe of Dan, but his father a Tyrian; and, what was prodigious, his abilities extended to all kind of works, whether in gold, silver, brass, or iron, whether in linen, tapestry, or embroidery; and by his direction all the curious furniture of the temple was both designed and finished.

And now all things being in readiness, the foundation of the temple was laid in the ^a fourth year of king Solomon's reign, in the year of the creation 2992, 450 years after the Israelites' escape from the Egyptian bondage; and, in the ^b space of seven years and a half was completed with such dexterity, that neither ^c hammer, nor axe, nor any tool of iron was heard in it, all the while that it professed artists that could undertake the work of the temple; but in Tyre and Sidon there were many, for both in his Iliad and his Odyssey, Homer gives the people of these two places this character, whom, upon every turn, he calls Πολυτέχνους, excellent artists in several kinds of works.—Patrick's Commentary.

^a If it be asked, why Solomon did not begin the building of the temple sooner, and even in the first year of his reign, since his father had left him a plan, and all things necessary for the undertaking? Abarbanel's answer is this,—That Solomon would not make use of what his father had prepared, but was resolved to build this temple all at his proper cost and charge. He therefore put into the treasure of the Lord's house all that David had dedicated to the work; and, to gather together as much gold and silver as was necessary to defray so vast an expense, four years can be counted no unreasonable time. Nay, even suppose that he had made use of the treasure which his father had amassed, yet, if the materials that his father had provided lay at a considerable distance, and were left rude and unfashioned, it would cost all this time to form them into the exact symmetry, wherein the Scripture represents them before they were brought together, especially considering, that the very stones which made the foundation, were very probably vast blocks of marble, or porphyry. (1 Kings v. 17;) and all polished in the most exquisite manner. Patrick's Commentary, and Poole's Annotations.

^b The temple itself was indeed but a small edifice, but the many courts and offices that were about it, made the whole a vast pile, and the exquisiteness of the art, and the fewness of the artists that could be employed about it, made a longer time requisite. It must be owned, however, that, considering all things, Solomon made an extraordinary despatch: for, if the building of Diana's temple at Ephesus employed all Asia for the space of 200 years, and no less than 360,000 men, for twenty years together, were taken up in erecting one pyramid, as Pliny, (h. 36. c. 12.) affirms, no reasonable man can wonder, that this temple was seven years and a half in building.—Poole's Annotations, and Calmet's Commentary.

^c The Jewish doctors have entertained a very odd conceit, upon the occasion of this passage in the sacred history, wherein the temple is said to have been built without noise. They tell us, that the Demon Asmodeus drove Solomon once from his throne, and reigned in his place, while that prince was forced to travel over the several kingdoms and provinces of the world; but that at his return to Jerusalem, he defeated Asmodeus, and having chained him so that he could do no hurt, he compelled him to teach him the art of cutting stones for the temple, without making any noise, which was done, as they say, not with any tool or instrument, but by the help of a worm, called samir, which cuts and polishes stone with a marvellous facility. But the foundation of all this fiction, (as Bochart. Hieroz. p. 2. b. 6. c. 11.) has observed, is laid in somebody's mistaking the sense of the word samir, which signifies a very hard stone, called smiris, that is of use to cut and polish other stones, and which Solomon's workmen might possibly have recourse to upon this occasion. But the true reason why no noise was heard in the building of the temple was, that the stones, and other materials, were hewn and squared, and fitted at a distance; so that when they were brought to the place where the temple was to stand, there was nothing to do but to join them together. And this might be done, not only for the ease and convenience of the carriage, but for the magnificence of the work, and the commendation of the workmen's skill and ingenuity.—Poole's Annotations; and Calmet's Dictionary, under the word Solomon.

was building. Such admirable care and contrivance was used, in preparing and adjusting the materials, before they were brought together.

CHAP. II.—Difficulties Obviated, and Objections Answered.

THERE is hardly any one passage in Scripture more difficult to give a satisfactory account of, than this relation of Saul's cruelty to the Gibeonites; because we have little or no intimation, either when, or where, or why their slaughter was committed.

The Gibeonites were not of the children of Israel, but the remains of the Amorites, who, upon Joshua's taking possession of the promised land, imposed upon him and his counsellors, and cunningly drew the Israelites into a league with them, which was instantly confirmed by an oath; and because it was so confirmed, for above three hundred years, was reputed inviolable. But though the Gibeonites, by their craft and fallacy, saved their lives, yet it was upon this condition, that they should ¹ become briers of wood and drawers of water, for the service of the tabernacle. ² Now while the tabernacle was at Nob, which was a city of the priests, and where some of the Gibeonites, their attendants, may be supposed to reside, the sacred history informs us, that Saul ³ in revenge to the priests, whom he took to be favourers of David's cause, destroyed the city, and massacred all the inhabitants thereof; so that several of the Gibeonites must have been slain upon this occasion, and for shedding of their blood this famine was sent. This is the account which some learned men give us of the matter: but they never considered, ⁴ that as Saul's sin in murdering the priests was greater than in slaying the Gibeonites, God should have inflicted this severe punishment upon the laud for the greater sin, rather than the less. It has been said indeed, that for the slaughter of the priests, God had avenged himself on Saul before, by suffering him and his sons to be slain in battle by the Philistines, but that the slaughter of the Gibeonites was not as yet expiated; yet it will be difficult to conceive, why there should be two different and distinct punishments for one and the same sin, committed at the self-same time.

When, or by whom, or on what occasion, the tabernacle and altar of burnt-offerings, which were made by Moses in the wilderness, were removed from Nob to Gibeon we cannot tell, because the Scripture is silent: but it is the conjecture of ⁵ some learned men, that it was not long after the murder of the priests at Nob; and that Saul, very probably, to regain the favour of the people, which he found he had lost by being so barbarous to men of their sacred character, quarrelled with the Gibeonites, and banished them out of their city, in order to make room for the tabernacle of the Lord.

The Scripture indeed acquaints us, that ⁶ he sought to slay the Gibeonites in his zeal to the children of Israel and Judah; where the expression seems to denote that the children of Israel envied these miserable people, inasmuch that Saul thought he could not do a more popular act, than to cut them off;

But by the children of Israel,² some rather understand the tribe of Benjamin in particular, namely, that very tribe from whence king Saul descended: and thence they infer, that his zeal or earnest desire to promote his own tribe to riches and grandeur, made him seek occasion to fall foul upon the Gibeonites, in order that the three cities which they possessed in the territories of Benjamin might fall into his hands, and so be divided among his own family. That he either had, or intended to advance and enrich his own tribe, is manifest from these words of his: ³ 'Hear now, ye Benjamites, will the son of Jesse give every one of you fields and vineyards, and make you all captains of thousands, and captains of hundreds?' that is, will he do for you, as I have, and mean to do? Now, if we look into the actions of Saul, we do not find, that he made any purchase of the possessions of another tribe, or that he took from his enemies any considerable territories, in order to accommodate his Benjamites; and are therefore left to suppose, that the fields and vineyards wherewith he enriched them, he unjustly acquired by destroying and dispossessing the Gibeonites. It is but supposing, then, that some of the chief of these Gibeonites had, in some instance or other, offended Saul, for which he was minded to destroy the whole race; or, that he had cast a greedy eye upon their lands and possessions, which, in case of their excision, would be forfeited to the crown, and so might be given to his own family; and then he had allegations plausible enough against them, pretending, "That it was not for the honour or interest of God's people, to nourish any of that viperous brood in their bosoms; and that however Joshua and the princes, who then bore sway, had by their fraud been drawn into an oath to preserve them, yet, in truth, that oath was contrary to God's command, which required them ⁴ 'to smite them, and utterly destroy them'; and therefore, ought not, as he thought, to be observed."

Thus Saul might set up for a restorer of the divine laws to their ancient rigour, and strictness of execution, and a supplier of the default of Joshua, and the princes of Israel, in sparing the Gibeonites, even though they were comprised in the general ordinance of extirpation; and, under this character, he might easily draw in his own subjects to abet and assist his cruelty against a poor people, for whom they had never any good liking. After the king's fashion is the known maxim; and therefore we may easily suppose, that a wicked and hard-hearted people, who had assisted Saul in the persecution of David; had adhered to his son Absalom in his rebellion against his own father; and who at the beck of so many impious princes, left the true worship of God, and fell into idolatry; would not be backward to assist Saul in putting in execution any of his contrivances against the poor Gibeonites. And if so, we cannot but admire the wisdom and justice of God, in making the punishment national, when the whole nation, for aught

we know, was confederate with Saul in murdering the Gibeonites, or guilty at least in not hindering it; when the next generation was involved in the guilt, by not repairing the injury as much as possible, or not expressing the horror and detestation of it by some public act; when an act of discipline might, at this time, be necessary, to preserve the remaining Gibeonites from insults, to beget in the Israelites a proper respect for them, to prevent the like murders for the future, and the like breaches of national compacts.

Nay, supposing the people, who lived in that time when the famine prevailed, to be never so innocent of the blood of the Gibeonites; yet it cannot be denied, but that God, who is the author and giver of life, has an absolute right over the lives of all, and can recall that gift whenever he pleases. And ⁵ therefore, if, in the case before us, he made a demand, as certainly he had a right to do it, of so many lives at such a time, and in such a manner, as might best answer the ends of discipline; then, that which was just in other views, and without any such special reason, could not become unjust, by having that additional reason to recommend it. In a word, if the thing was righteous, considered merely as an act of dominion in God, it could not but be both righteous and kind, by being made, at the same time, an act of discipline for the punishment of sin and perfidy, and the promotion of justice and godliness among men.

We must all allow, that God, as he is a most just and righteous being, can never require, that the innocent should die for the guilty; and therefore we have reason to believe, that, when Saul for reasons above mentioned, was so outrageous against the Gibeonites, his sons and grandsons, might be instruments of his cruelty, and very probably bear some part in the military execution. For it frequently so happens, that whatever a king commands, be it never so abominable, is generally approved and executed by his family; and therefore, ⁶ when we are told from the mouth of God, that the plague, sent upon the people, was 'for Saul and his bloody house, because he ^a slew the Gibeonites,' it seems to be evident, that it was for their guilt as well as his; nor can we imagine, that this guilt of theirs could be any thing less than that of being the executioners in this slaughter. It is plain, that they were his captains of thousands and captains of hundreds; and it is as plain, that as such, they must be the instruments of his cruelty; for if they were not, why are they called bloody? They refused indeed ⁷ to slaughter the priests at his command; but there is no reason to believe, that they were so scrupulous in regard to the Gibeonites: and if they were not, is there less equity in God's destroying their sons for the sins of their fathers which they adopted and shared in, than there was in his destroying Jehorau, the son of Ahab, for that vineyard which the father had cruelly and unjustly acquired, and the son as unjustly detained?

Without calling then to our assistance God's great prerogative, ⁸ of visiting the sins of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation,⁹ we may fairly say, that if these descendants of Saul did either concur in this murder of the Gibeonites, when doing, or avow and defend it when done, they became culpable upon their own, as well as their ancestors' account, and thereupon justly deserved to be delivered up to the resentment of a people that had suffered so much by their inhumanity.

Upon this supposition then, for it is by supposition that we must go in this obscure part of history, that both the people and the princes of the blood were accessory or instrumental to Saul's cruelty, the reason why God delayed their punishment so long is obvious; even because his infinite goodness waited for their repentance, which goodness we badly requite, if we pervert it as an argument against his providence. For may not God be gracious and merciful as long as he pleases? Or have we any right to set bounds to his patience and long-suffering? It is but supposing then, that while God continued in this state of expectance, upon some special occasion or other, to us unknown, both the people of Israel and Saul's posterity might discover, that they were so far from repenting, that they gloried in the murder of the Gibeonites, and this would determine God, who had hitherto waited for their penitence in vain, to pour out his indignation, upon them, and exact a severe punishment both for their cruelty and obstinacy.

Whether the Gibeonites did right or wrong in exacting so severe a retaliation, as that of hanging up seven of Saul's progeny, for the injury that he and his family had done them, the sacred history is no ways concerned. It relates the transaction just as it happened; but to show us from whence this barbarous custom of hanging up men to appease the anger of the gods did proceed, it prefaces the account of the matter with this observation:—'These Gibeonites were not of the children of Israel,' for among them they learned no such practice, 'but a remnant of the Amorites,' who were addicted to this horrid superstition, of which the Gibeonites, notwithstanding their abode among people of better sentiments, still retained some tincture, and propounded it to David, as an expedient to make the earth become fruitful again: 'Let seven of Saul's sons be given unto us, and we will hang them up unto the Lord.'

The Scripture, you see, speaks in the dialect of these people; but from thence we make a wrong conclusion, if we think that God can be delighted with human sacrifices, which so frequently, and so vehemently, we find him, declaiming against, and professing his utter detestation of. He desires the death or punishment of no man, except it be in pursuance of the ends of his wise providence, or when the criminal, by his bad conduct, has forfeited his life to the government he lives under; nor would he have required the execution of any of Saul's posterity, had it not been to procure the poor distressed Gibeonites, who were true drudges to their Hebrew masters, a kinder treatment, and better quarter for the future; and had it not been to testify his abhorrence of all oppression and violence; to show that the cries of the meanest slave, as well as of the mightiest monarch, enter the ears of the Most High; that with him there is no respect of persons, but the rich and the poor to him are both alike: ³ had it not been to repair the injury done to his most holy name, in the violation of the compact which both Joshua and the princes of Israel made with this people, and confirmed with the solemnity of an oath; had it not been by this exemplary punishment, to give mankind a lesson of instruction concerning the sacredness of oaths and treaties, and how religiously they ought to be observed, even towards those that are in the lowest state and circumstances of life.

Under these considerations only could the death of Saul's sons be acceptable to God; and how far David, in like manner, came to be concerned in it, we shall now proceed to consider.

Both the Septuagint and vulgar Latin translation make the demand of the Gibeonites, when David sent to offer them satisfaction, run in this strain:—⁴ 'The man who consumed us, and oppressed us unjustly, we ought utterly to destroy, so as not to leave one of his race remaining in the coasts of Israel;' and, in this demand, we may presume that they persisted, until David, partly by his authority, and partly by kind entreaties, prevailed with them to be content with seven only. Here then was a fair opportunity for David, had he been so minded, to have cut off the whole race of Saul, as it were at one blow, and to have avoided all the odium of the action, by but barely saying, 'That the Gibeonites demanded all, and his instructions from God were, to grant whatever they demanded.' But instead of that, we find him, before this happened, making inquiry for such ⁵ 'as were left of Saul's family, that he might show kindness to them for Jonathan's sake;' interposing his good offices here with the Gibeonites, to have them abate the keenness of their resentment, and make the slaughter of Saul's devoted house as moderate as possible; and, after that slaughter was over, ⁶ giving them a public and solemn interment, with the bones of Saul and Jonathan his son, in the sepulchre of their ancestors, and himself attending them in person to the grave.

The death of Saul's posterity, procured by the Gibeonites, had it not proceeded from God's positive command, but been only a plausible pretence for David to get rid of his rivals in empire, ⁷ we cannot imagine why he should slay no more than seven of these descendants, why he should cut off only collateral branches, and spare all those who were in a direct line of succession to the throne; why he spared Ishbosheth, his competitor for the kingdom, whom, by Abner's means, he might have despatched, and according to their desert punished the two traitors, who had officiously murdered him; and why he spared Mephibosheth the son of Jonathan, and Micah his son, and Micah's four sons, whom in all probability he lived to see, and in them ⁸ a long generation, all descended from Saul's family, and all related to the crown.

Had this affair of the Gibeonites happened indeed about the beginning of David's reign over all Israel, soon after the death of Ishbosheth, and when he had reason to apprehend, that some other rival might, perchance spring up in his stead, there might then be some umbrage to think, that the branches of Saul's family were to be cut off for reasons of state, and to make his possession of the crown more safe : but, since these things came to pass very near the conclusion of his reign, when, as he himself acknowledges¹ in the very next chapter, God had not only 'covered him with the shield of his salvation, and so enlarged his steps under him, that his feet could not slip, but given him likewise the necks of his enemies, and made him the head over many stragelations ;' he could have no just conception of danger from any quarter, and consequently no necessity to establish his throne by blood.

It could not be then for any private end, that David delivered these children of Saul into the hands of the Gibeonites, but purely in obedience to the will of God, who had both directed, and warranted him to do so. For we cannot but suppose, as Josephus does, that, when David consulted the oracle concerning the famine, God informed him, not only for what crime it was inflicted, but by what means likewise it was to be removed : and therefore being let into all this, he was not at liberty to do what he pleased, but compelled rather to give up the children as so many victims, notwithstanding his promise and oath to their father ; because a superior power interposed, and in so doing, cancelled the prior obligation.

His making a grant of Mephibosheth's estate to a vile miscreant of a servant, without giving his master a fair hearing, is another exception that is commonly made to the justice of king David's proceedings in this period of time. But how could David have leisure to send for Mephibosheth from mount Olivet to Jerusalem, and inquire into the merits of the cause depending between him and his servant, when he was in so great a hurry, and under flight from the arms of his rebel son ? Or how could he suppose that Ziba could have dared to have told him so notorious a lie, when it might in a short time be disproved ? Every circumstance, in short, on Ziba's side looked well ; but none on the master's. To him David had been extremely kind in restoring him to the forfeited estate of his grandfather Saul, and in allowing him² to eat at his own table, as one of the king's sons ; and now at the general rendezvous of his friends, David might well have expected, that the person to whom he had extended so many favours, should not have been so negligent of his duty, as to absent himself, unless it had been upon some extraordinary business ; and therefore, when Ziba acquaints him with the occasion of his absence, though it was a mere fiction, yet with David it might find a readier credence, because at this time he had reason to mistrust every body, and seeing his own family disconcerted and broken, might think the crown liable to fall to any new claimant, that could pretend to the same right of succession that Mephibosheth might.

On the contrary, every thing appeared bright and plausible on Ziba's side. He, though but a servant, came to join the king, and, instead of adhering to his master's pretended schemes of advancement, had expressed his duty to his rightful sovereign, in bringing him a considerable present, enough to engage his good opinion. The story that he told of his master likewise, though utterly false, was cunningly contrived, and fitly accommodated to the nature of the times ; so that, in this situation of affairs, as wise a man as David might have been induced to believe the whole to be true, and upon the presumption of its being so, might have proceeded to pass a judgment of forfeiture (as in most eastern countries every crime against the state was always attended with such a forfeiture) upon Mephibosheth's estate, and to consign the possession of it to another.

All therefore that David can be blamed for in this whole transaction, is an error in judgment, even when he was imposed upon by the plausible tale of a sycophant, and had no opportunity of coming at the truth ; but upon his return to Jerusalem, when Mephibosheth appears before him, and pleads his own cause, we find this the decision of it. ³ 'Why speakest thou any more of thy matters ? I have said, Thou and Ziba divide the land :' which words must not be understood, as if he appointed, at that time, an equal division of the estate between Mephibosheth and his servant, for where should the justice of such a sentence be : but rather that he revoked the order he had given to Ziba, upon the supposed forfeiture of his master, and put things now upon the same establishment they were at first. ⁴ 'I have said,' that is, 'my first grant shall stand, when I decreed that Mephibosheth should be lord of the whole estate, and Ziba his steward to manage it for him.'

The words of the grant are these : ⁵ 'Then the king called Ziba, Saul's servant, and said unto him, I have given unto thy master's son all that pertained to Saul, and to all his house. Thou therefore, and thy sons, and thy servants, shall till the land for him, and thou shalt bring in the fruits, that thy master's son, may have food to eat,' that is, may be enabled to maintain himself and family in plenty ; 'but Mephibosheth, thy master's son, shall eat bread always at my table.' From whence it seems manifest, that this Ziba had been an old steward in Saul's family, and had managed his private estate, which lay at Gibeah of Benjamin. ⁶ This estate, upon one account or other, had come into David's possession, either in right of his wife, upon the death of Saul's son, or by forfeiture to the crown, upon Ishbosheth's rebellion ; but he, being willing now to do a generous act to Saul's family, in memory of his friendship to Jonathan, passed a free grant or dedition of it to his son, and that he might make a provision for all his dependants at once, put Ziba into the same place he had enjoyed before, constituting him ^a steward of the royal manor of Gibeah, even as he had been in the life of Saul. So that David's sentence or determination, ⁷ 'thou and Ziba divide the land,' refers us to this original grant, and consequently implies no more, than that all things should be in the same situation they were in before, namely, that Ziba, and his sons, should manage the estate, and support themselves out of it, as usual, and that the remainder of the profits which accrued from thence, they should bring to Mephibosheth, for him to dispose of as he pleased; and to this sense of the words the following reply seems to be accommodated, 'yea let him have all,' namely, to his own use and property, 'since my lord the king is come again in peace.'

That which leads many into a misconception of David, as if he left the world in a vindictive and unforgiving temper, because we find him giving his son some instructions concerning two persons who had grossly misbehaved towards him, has been nothing else but the want of distinguishing between the same person, when acting or advising in a public, and when in a private capacity. Shimei curses David in the time of his troubles, and yet David forgives him, and promises he shall not die. Joab does many valorous and brave acts for the honour of his king, and the enlargement of his dominions; but then he sullies all with his insolent behaviour, and barbarous murders. They both had committed crimes enough to forfeit their lives; David, however, for reasons of state, thought it not advisable to seize either of them for the present, but directed his son, if ever they should give him a sufficient provocation not to spare them. 'Thou hast Shimei with thee, ¹ and some share perhaps he may have in thy favour; but trust him not, he is no friend to kings, or kingly power. Remember what he did to me in my distress; how bitterly, how virulently, he cursed me to my face; and I make no doubt, but that he would be the same to thee in the like circumstances. I forgave him in my exile, because I looked upon him as an instrument in God's hands to humble me for my great offence. I forgave him in my return home, because he came to me when my heart was open, and unwilling to damp the joy of my restoration with the effusion of any blood. I promised him his life; and let not that promise be violated in my days: but what I did is no rule or obligation to thee. Let him not die however for his offence against me, but rather watch his conduct, and if he should chance to give thee a fresh occasion, be sure to lay hold of it, because it is not in his nature to be a good subject.' ^a

^a The way in which this passage here commented upon, should be understood and translated, has already been noticed, p. 393, but for the satisfaction of the curious and inquiring reader we here subjoin Dr Kennicott's criticism on the text. He says 'David is here represented in our English version as finishing his life, with giving a command to Solomon to kill Shimei, and to kill him on account of that very crime for which, as David here says, he had sworn to him by the Lord he would not put him to death. The behaviour thus imputed to the king and prophet, and which would be justly censurable, if true, should be examined very carefully as to the ground it stands upon: and when the passage is duly considered, I presume it will appear highly probable that an injury has been here done to this illustrious character. The point to which I now beg the reader's attention is this: that it is not uncommon in the Hebrew language to omit the negative in a second part of the sentence, and to consider it as repeated when it has been once expressed: and is followed by the connecting particle. And thus on (Is. xlii. 22,) the late learned annotator says, 'the negative is repeated or referred to by the conjunction vau, as in many other places.' So also (Is. xxiii. 4.) The necessity of so very considerable an alteration as inserting the particle not, may be here confirmed by some other instances. (Ps. i. 5.) 'The mighty shall not stand in judgment nor (the Hebrew is and, signifying and not) sinners in the congregation of the righteous.' (Ps. ix. 18.) 'The needy shall not always be forgotten: (and then the negative understood as repeated by the conjunction now dropped,) the expectation of the poor shall not perish for ever.' (Ps. xxxviii. 1.) 'O Lord,

'Thou rememberest likewise what Joab did unto me; with what insolence he treated me in the time of the war against Absalom; how, contrary to my orders, he slew him, and afterwards talked to me in a menacing and imperious manner. Thou rememberest what he did to Amasa, whom I intended to have put in his place, and made the general of all my forces; and what to Abner, who was then endeavouring to gain over to my party all that adhered to the house of Saul. The injury done to these two brave men redounds upon me, since they were both under my protection, and both murdered, basely murdered, because I had an esteem for them; and till justice be done to their murderer, which I, in my lifetime, had not power to do, ² their innocent blood will not depart from my house.' Do thou therefore take care to assail it; and whenever he commits any transgression against thee, let the blood of these two valuable men be charged to his account, and let him, as he has long deserved, be put to death.

This is the sense of David's words to his son concerning these two men; and it is easy to observe, that in these dying instructions of his, ³ he is not to be considered as a private man, acting upon principles of resentment, but as a king and governor, giving advice to his son and successor in affairs of state. It was for the public good, that such offenders, as Shimei and Joab, should suffer at a proper time, and as prudence should direct: and therefore, since his promise and oath to one of them, and the formidable power and interest which the other had usurped, restrained him, in his lifetime, from punishing them as they deserved; and since it would have been an unjust thing in itself, and a derogation to the glory of his reign, to suffer such public and crying sins to go unpunished, he recommended the consideration of these things to his son, and, ⁴ like a wise magistrate, laid a scheme for the punishment of wickedness, without regard to any private revenge.

David, as we said, durst not call Joab to an account,

rebuke me not in thy wrath, neither (and, for and not) chasten me in thy hot displeasure.' (Ps. lxxv. 5.) 'Lift not up your horn on high: (and then the negative, understood as repeated by the conjunction, now dropped,) speak not with a stiff neck.' (Prov. xxix. 12.) Our version is this: 'Doth not he that pondereth the heart consider it? and he that keepeth the soul, doth not he know it? and shall not he render to every man according to his works?' And (Prov. xxx. 3.) 'I neither learned wisdom, nor (and, for and not) have the knowledge of the holy.' If then there are in fact many such instances, the question is, whether the negative here, expressed in the former part of David's command, may not be understood as to be repeated in the latter part; and if this may be, a strong reason will be added why it should be so interpreted. The passage will run thus: 'Behold thou hast with thee Shimei, who cursed me; but I swore to him by the Lord, saying, I will not put thee to death by the sword. Now, therefore, hold him not guiltless: for thou art a wise man, and knowest what thou oughtest to do unto him, but bring not down his hoary head to the grave with blood.' Now if the language itself will admit of this construction, the sense thus given to the sentence derives a very strong support from the context. For how did Solomon understand this charge? Did he kill Shimei in consequence of it? Certainly he did not; for after he had immediately commanded Joab to be slain, in obedience to his father, he sends for Shimei, and knowing that Shimei ought to be well watched, confines him to a particular spot in Jerusalem for the remainder of his life: 1 Kings ii. 36—42: see also Job xxiii. 17; xxx. 20; xxxi. 20 ² This is the best mode of interpreting this text.—ED.

because his power and interest was so great in the army (and it was the army that David in a great measure depended on) that it might have occasioned an alteration in the government, had he pretended to do it: but when Solomon came to the throne, Joab was not that mighty man he had formerly been. He was at least of an equal age with David; had commanded the armies of Israel for twenty years, and upwards; and as he was only formidable at the head of his troops, and in the times of war and public disorder; so ¹ the profound peace which had subsisted for some time, both before and after the beginning of Solomon's reign, had impaired his power, and made him in a manner useless. Upon this account, Solomon had not the like reason to fear him that his father had; nor did he lie under the like obligations to spare him. He had done David great services indeed, and a sufficient recompense it was, that he had been indulged for so many years, with an impunity for his crimes; but whatever the father might be, the son was under no ties or obligations, especially when he found him conspiring to take away his kingdom, and translate it to another.

Wherein the formality of David's sin in numbering the people, which, at first view, seems not to be so very heinous, did consist, it is not so well agreed among interpreters. ² 'When thou takest the number of the children of Israel,' says God to Moses, 'after their number, then shall they give every man a ransom for his soul unto the Lord, that there be no plague among them, when thou numberest them:' upon which passage Josephus, and some others, have founded this conjecture:—That David had quite forgot to demand of every man that was mustered, an half shekel, which was appointed by the law, and is here called 'a ransom for his soul;' and therefore God sent among the people a pestilence; because, amidst the great plenty and abundance which they now enjoyed, it was a very impious and provoking thing not to pay him his dues. ³ But where do we find, that upon every numbering of the people, a half shekel was ordered to be paid? It was in this case only, when the people were to contribute towards the building of the tabernacle, and God threatens those who should refuse to do it; but this has no manner of relation to what David did, who nowhere stands charged with such an omission, ⁴ any more than with a design of raising a capitation tax, as others conceive, upon every poll through the kingdom.

Others are of opinion, that this numbering of the people was a thing contrary to the fundamental promise which God made Abraham, namely, that his seed should so increase, as even to exceed the stars in multitude; and therefore since God had promised to increase them beyond number, it savoured of infidelity and distrust in God, for any one to go about to number them: but quite contrary to this, the Scripture in another place tells us, that David, out of a religious regard to the promise of God, never intended to take an exact number of all, but of such only as were fit to bear arms; for so the words are ⁵ 'He took not the number of them, from twenty years old and under, because the Lord hath said, he would increase Israel like to the stars of the heavens.'

The most common therefore, and indeed the only probable opinion is, that this act of David's proceeded ⁶ from pride and ambition, and a foolish curiosity to know the number of his subjects, the strength of his forces, and the extent of his empire: as if all these had greatly contributed to his glory and renown; as if they had been of his own acquiring, and more proper to place his confidence in, than the power and assistance of him whose protection he had so long experienced; whom, upon other occasions, he was wont to call 'his rock, his shield, and castle of defence;' and who was able at all times, to save with a handful of men, as well as a multitude.

Pride then, and an arrogant conceit of himself, which is always attended with a forgetfulness of God, was at the bottom of David's numbering the people; and indeed so visible to others, as well as to the all-seeing eye of God, that we find Joab, who was then of his privy council, thus remonstrating against it: ⁷ 'Now the Lord thy God add unto thy people, how many soever they be, an hundred-fold, and that the eyes of my lord the king may see it; but why doth my lord the king delight in this thing?'

It is a judicious observation of the apostle, ⁸ 'Let no man say when he is tempted, I am tempted of God; for God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth he any man: but every man is tempted, when he is drawn away with his own lust, and enticed;' and therefore it may justly be reckoned a peculiar elegance in the Hebrew tongue, that it frequently leaves out the nominative noun to a verb active, which, when it happens, the accusative following supplies the place of the nominative that is wanting. This shows that our translators have made a gross mistake in rendering the passage, 'the Lord moved David to number Israel and Judah,' because in the original there is no such thing as 'the Lord;' for the nominative is omitted, as I said, and the accusative supplying its place makes the sense simply 'David was moved, (by what is not named, but by his pride and vanity, we may say, as well as ⁹ the instigations of the devil) to number the people.' So that there is no contradiction in the Scripture account of this transaction, no appearance of a confederacy between God and Satan; nor was God any further concerned in it, than as his providence, for wise ends, thought proper to permit it.

'But if David only was culpable in this affair, why did not God immediately punish him for it, instead of falling upon the people, who were confessedly innocent?'

The generality perhaps were innocent as to the affair of numbering the people: that might be chiefly David's sin; but in other respects they were not. They had many great and grievous sins, which justly deserved punishment, and for which probably they would have been punished before, had it not been for God's tenderness to David, who must have been a sufferer in the common calamity; but now, when both king and people had deserved correction, God was pleased to let loose his anger upon both. David, indeed, was not smitten in person, but a king is never more sensibly punished than when the judgment of God falls upon his people and diminishes their number, and their strength, for the body politic is not unlike the body natural; no sooner does the head suffer, but all the members suffer with it; nor can the least part of the body be in pain, but the head is immediately affected: and therefore we need not doubt but that David, when he saw ¹ ‘the angel stretching out his hand upon Jerusalem to destroy it,’ and thereupon broke out into this exclamation, ‘Let thy hand, I pray thee, be against me, and against my father’s house,’ had his heart as full of grief and anxiety as any one that lay languishing in the plague.

Thus, in all the afflictions of his people, David was afflicted: and if this sore judgment befell the nation a little while before Absalom’s rebellion, as some have suspected a mislocation in this part of the history, this may suggest a reason why God might think fit to preserve David, and not cut him off, as he deserved, for his sin; ² that the dissension which might have arisen among his sons, about the right of succession, in case of his death, and the foreign and domestic wars that would thereupon have ensued, and ^a proved more fatal to the Israelites, than this destroying pestilence, might, by David’s life, and interposition, be prevented. And from the sense of this, very probably, it is, that we find him commemorating his deliverance from this public calamity, in such exalted strains, as make it disputable, whether their piety or poetry are more remarkable. ³ ‘He that dwelleth in the secret places of the Most High, shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty. He shall deliver thee from the snare of the fowler, and from the noisome pestilence. Thou shalt not be afraid for the terror by night, nor for the arrow that flieth by day, nor for the pestilence that walketh in darkness, or for the destruction that wasteth at noonday. A thousand shall fall at thy side, and ten thousand at thy right hand, but it shall not come nigh thee.’

It must be owned indeed, that there is a very large difference, in the Scripture accounts of the number of men, fit to bear arms, that were found in David’s dominions: ⁴ In Samuel it is said, that they were in Israel eight hundred thousand, and in Judah five hundred thousand; but in ⁵ Chronicles, they of Israel were a thousand thousand, and a hundred thousand, and they of Judah four hundred threescore and ten thousand: and various have been the attempts to adjust and settle this disagreement. Some suppose, that, as Joab undertook this office with no small reluctance, and David, very probably, might repent of the thing, before it was fully executed, though the commissioners might make an exact review, ⁶ yet they thought proper to lay before the king no more than what the sum in Samuel amounts to; but that the author of the book of Chronicles might, from some of these commissioners, receive the complete sum, which occasioned the difference.

legionary soldiers, as they are called, or those companies of militia which attended the king’s person by turns, and might make the number either greater or less, according as they were numbered or not numbered in the account: but this solution is purely arbitrary, and such as has no foundation in Scripture. It supposes without, that the real number was what is recorded in Chronicles, which, taking in the several articles that are said to be omitted, surpasses all faith.

Since there is then no possibility of reconciling these different computations, the question is, which of the two we are to receive? And this, without all controversy, must be that in Samuel, not only because the Arabic translators in their version of the Chronicles, have inserted it, but because there is nothing excessive, or extravagant, in the supposition, that, in a fertile and well cultivated country of sixty leagues in length, and thirty in breadth, a multitude of people, to the number of six or seven millions, which taking in the other articles, will be the sum total, might very comfortably be maintained. ⁸ Rather, then, than have recourse to such solutions as do but more embarrass the matter, we may adventure to say, without any diminution to the Scripture’s authority, that the excessive number in the Chronicles was a mistake of the person, who, after the captivity, transcribed this part of the sacred writ; ‘For I do hesitate to say,’ says Sulpicius, ⁹ in his sacred history, ‘that truth had been corrupted rather by the carelessness of transcribers during a course of so many ages, than that the prophet erred.’

It must be acknowledged, that in most nations where the regal power was at this time established, the right of succession was generally hereditary, and the eldest son seldom, except in cases of incapacity, postponed. This is what Adonijah, urges to Bathsheba; ¹⁰ ‘thou knowest that the kingdom was mine by right of primogeniture, and that all Israel set their faces on me, that I should reign:’ but then, there was this peculiar to the Jewish constitution, that as God had been their only king from the time that they first became a nation, so when they thought fit to have that form of government altered, he still reserved to himself the right of nominating the successor, when the throne became vacant: ¹¹ ‘when thou art come into the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee, and shalt say, I will set a king over me, like all the nations that are about me, thou shalt by all means make him king over thee whom the Lord thy God shall choose.’ So that when God had declared his pleasure concerning the person that was to succeed him, as he did by the prophet Nathan, David was not at liberty to make choice of any other.

We do not dispute at all, but that Bathsheba, who was his favourite wife, had a great ascendancy over her husband; but Solomon’s title was not founded upon her interest and management with the king, but upon the ordination and appointment of God. ¹² ‘Of all my sons, says David, (‘for the Lord hath given me many sons,) he hath chosen Solomon my son to sit upon the throne of the kingdom of the Lord over Israel;’ and therefore Adonijah himself acknowledges, ¹³ ‘that it was of the Lord, that the kingdom was turned about and became his brother's.'

Nathan indeed put Bathsheba upon another argument, namely, the sacredness of the king's oath, in order to prevail with him in behalf of her son: 'Didst not thou swear unto thy handmaid, saying, Surely Solomon thy son shall reign after me, and he shall sit upon my throne?' But at what time this promise was made, is a matter of some dispute. The generality of interpreters are of opinion, that after the death of the first child which David had by Bathsheba, he comforted her for her loss, and gave her assurance, that, if God should give him another son by her, he would not fail to make him his successor. But it is much more probable, that David did not make any declaration of a promise to Bathsheba, until God had revealed it to him,² that he should have a son, distinct from what he had already, who should succeed him in the kingdom, and have the honour of building him a temple; and no sooner was Solomon born, but David was convinced that this was the child to whom the promise belonged, by Nathan's being sent to give him a name, denoting his being³ 'beloved of the Lord:' and it was at this time, most probably, that David gave his mother a promise, confirmed upon oath, that, since God had so manifestly declared in favour of the child, he, for his part, would do his utmost to facilitate his succession. But, upon the whole, he did not choose for himself,⁴ neither was his declaration to Bathsheba previous to Nathan's information, but rather the effect and consequence of it.

But even suppose there had been no divine interposition in favour of Solomon, why might not David, who had done such signal service in his reign, nominate his successor? ⁵ Several great princes in most nations have claimed this privilege. Among the Romans, Aurelius named Nerva, and Nerva chose Trajan, and so did Augustus appoint his successor. And that this was a prerogative belonging to the crown of Israel, and what conformed with it for some time after David, is evident from the story of his grandson Rehoboam,⁶ who though a prince of no great merit, took upon him the authority of nominating his successor, and to the prejudice of his eldest son, made one of his youngest king.

Far are we from vindicating Solomon in all his actions, any more than David in the matter of Uriah. His severity to his brother for a seemingly small offence looked like revenge, and as if he had taken the first opportunity to cut him off, for his former attempt upon the kingdom; and yet we cannot but imagine,⁷ from Solomon's words to his mother, 'Why dost thou ask Abishag for Adonijah? Ask for him the kingdom also, for he is mine elder brother,' that there was some farther conspiracy against him, though not mentioned in holy writ, whereof he had got intelligence, and wherein Joab and Abiathar were engaged; and that he looked upon this asking Abishag in marriage as the prelude to it, and the first overt act, as it were, of their treason. It is certain that they thought to impose upon the king, as they had done upon his mother, and carry their point without ever discovering the malevolent intent of it.

The wives of the late king, according to the customs of the east, belonged to his successor, and were never married to any under a crowned head. ⁸ Abishag was doubtless a beautiful woman, and, by her near relation to David might have a powerful interest at court; Adonijah might therefore hope, by this marriage, to strengthen his pretensions to the crown, or, at least, to lay the foundation for some future attempt, upon a proper opportunity, either if Solomon should die, and leave a young son, not able to contest the point with him, or if at any time he should happen to fall under the people's displeasure, as his father had done before him.

This might be Adonijah's design, and Solomon accordingly might have information of it: but supposing that his brother's design was entirely innocent, yet since his request, according to the customs then prevailing, was confessedly bold and presumptuous, and had in it all the appearance of treason,⁹ it was none of Solomon's business to make any farther inquiry about it, or to interpret the thing in his brother's favour. It was sufficient for him that the action was in itself criminal, and of dangerous consequence to the state; for it is by their actions, and not intentions, that all offenders must be tried.

Adonijah indeed, had he lived under our constitution, would have had a fair hearing before conviction; but we ought to remember, that, in the kingdoms of the east, the government was absolute, and the power of life or death entirely in the prince; so that Solomon, without the formality of any process, could pronounce his brother dead: and, because he conceived, that, in cases of this nature, delays were dangerous, might send immediately, and have him despatched; though we cannot but say, that it had been more to his commendation, had he showed more clemency, and spared his life.

And in like manner, had he not married his Egyptian queen, there might be less objection to his character; for, whatever augmentation of power he might promise himself from that alliance,¹⁰ he certainly ran the hazard of having his religion corrupted by this unlawful mixture. Others, however, have observed that as the sacred Scriptures commend the beginning of Solomon's reign, in all other respects, except the¹¹ 'people's sacrificing in high places,' which might be the rather tolerated, 'because there was no house built unto the name of the Lord in those days;' and as they give him this character,¹² that 'he loved the Lord, and walked in all the statutes of David his father,' he would never have done an act so directly contrary to the laws of God, as marrying an idolatrous princess, had she not been first proselyted to the Jewish faith. The Scripture indeed takes notice of the gods of the Moabites, Ammonites, and Sidonians, for whom Solomon, in compliance to his strange wives, built places of worship: but as there is no mention made of any gods of the Egyptians, it seems very likely that this princess, when she was espoused to Solomon, quitted the religion of her ancestors, to which these words in the psalm, supposed to have been written upon this occasion, ¹ 'Hearken, O my daughter, forget thine own people, and thy father's house, so shall the king have pleasure in thy beauty, for he is the Lord,'² are thought by some to be no distant allusion. However this be, it is certain, that we find Solomon nowhere reprov'd in Scripture for this match; ³ nor can we think, that his book of Canticles, which is supposed to be his epithalamium, would have found a place in the sacred canon, had the spouse, whom it all along celebrates, been at that time an idolatress; though there is reason to believe that she afterwards relapsed into her ancient religion, and contributed, as much as any, to the king's seduction, and the many great disorders that were in the latter part of his reign.

How far the high priest, Abiathar, was concerned in the plot against Solomon, the sacred history does not particularly inform us; but such was the reverence paid to the sacerdotal character, that Solomon would have hardly dared to have deposed such an one from his office, had not the constitution of the nation authorized him so to do. The kings in the east, indeed, soon found out ways to make themselves absolute; but it looks as if, at the first establishment, the king was at the head of the Hebrew republic, and the high priest his subject, and in all civil affairs submitted to his correction; ⁴ inasmuch, that when any one abused the power of his office to the prejudice of the commonweal, or endangering the king's person, the king might justly deprive him of his honours and titles, of his temporalities and emoluments, and even of life itself. And therefore, when Abiathar, by his conspiracy, had merited all this, whatever was dependent on the crown, as all the revenues of this place, as well as the liberty of officiating in it, were dependent, Solomon might lawfully take from him; but the sacerdotal character, which he received from God, and to which he was anointed, this he could not alienate: and therefore we may observe, that after his deprivation, and even when Zadok was in possession of his place, he is nevertheless still mentioned ⁵ under the style and title of the priest.

The truth is, there is a great deal of difference between depriving a man of the dignity, and of the exercise of his function in such a determinate place; and between taking from him an authority that was given him by God, and the profits and emoluments arising from it, which were originally the gift of the crown. The former of these Solomon could not do, and the latter it is probable he was the rather incited to do, out of regard to the prophecy of Samuel, wherein he foretold Eli, from whom Abiathar was descended, that he would translate the priesthood from his to another family, as he did in the person of Zadok, who was of the house of Eleazar, even as Eli was of that of Ithamar; so that, by this means, the priesthood reverted to its ancient channel.

In the account which we have of Solomon's sumptuous manner of living, ⁶ we read in the book of Kings, that he had 'forty thousand stalls of horses for his chariots;'⁷ ⁸ but in that of Chronicles it is said, that he had no more than four; and yet in this some will acknowledge no disagreement at all. The author of Samuel, say they, speaks of the horses; the author of the Chronicles of the stalls or stables, which, supposing every one to contain ten horses, answer the number exactly. It is observable, however, that the history makes mention ⁹ of chariot cities, that is, cities, wherein Solomon kept chariots and horsemen in several parts of his kingdom, for the security of his government, and the suppression of any disorder that might happen to arise; and therefore others have thought, that in the Chronicles the author speaks of those stalls which Solomon had at Jerusalem for his constant lifeguard, and were no more than four thousand; but in Kings, of all those stalls which were dispersed up and down in the several parts of his kingdom, which might be forty thousand: because, upon the account of the conquests, which his father had made on the east side of Jordan, it was necessary for Solomon to have a stronger armament of this kind than other kings before him had, in order to keep the people, that would otherwise be apt to rebel, in due subjection.

But without any prejudice to the authority of the Scriptures, why may we not own, that an error has possibly crept into the text through the negligence of some transcriber, who has inserted arbahim, that is, forty, instead of arbah, four, and so made this large disparity in the number? Four thousand stalls, supposing each stall for a single horse, are moderate enough; but forty thousand is incredible: and therefore, to proportion the horses to the chariots, ¹⁰ which were a thousand and four hundred, we may suppose, ¹¹ with the learned author, from whom we have borrowed this conjecture, that of these chariots some were drawn with two, some with three, and some with four horses. Now if the chariots were drawn with a pair only, the number of Solomon's chariot horses must be two thousand eight hundred; if by two pair, then it must be five thousand six hundred; but the medium between these two numbers is very near four thousand; and therefore it seems most likely, that the horses which the king kept for this use only, might be much about this number. Too many for the law to tolerate; ¹² but the king perhaps might have as little regard to this clause in the law, as he had to the following one, which forbade him ¹³ 'to multiply wives and concubines to himself, or greatly to multiply silver or gold.'

The only remaining difficulty, except the divine vision vouchsafed Solomon, which has not been mentioned, is the great quantity of sacrifices which he is said to have offered on one altar only; but without recurring to any miracle for this, or without supposing that this fire, which originally came from heaven, was more strong and intense than any common fire; and therefore, after the return from the captivity the altar, as some observe, was made larger, because there wanted this celestial flame: without any forced solution like this, we have no reason to think, that all these sacrifices were offered in one day. The king, we may imagine, upon one of the great festivals, went in procession with his nobles, to pay his devotion at Gibeon, where the tabernacle was, and the brazen altar which Moses had made. Each of the great festivals lasted for seven days; but Solomon might stay much longer at Gibeon, until, by the daily oblations, a thousand burnt-offerings were consumed; and at the conclusion of this course of devotion, he might offer up his ardent prayer to God, for wisdom, and God, for the confirmation of his faith, might appear to him in a dream by night, and have that converse with him which the Scripture takes notice of.

In a word, though we should allow that the soul of man, when the body is asleep, is in a state of rest and inactivity; yet we cannot but think, that God can approach it in many different ways; can move and actuate it just as he pleases; and when he is minded to make a discovery of any thing, can set such a lively representation of it before the eyes of the man's understanding, as shall make him not doubt of the reality of the vision.

Solomon indeed, at the consecration of the temple, owns, that ⁴ 'the heaven of heavens could not contain God, and much less then the house that he had built him:' but it will not therefore follow, that there is no necessity for places appropriated to divine worship, nor any occasion for making them so magnificent and sumptuous. That God, who is the author and giver of our being, and to whom we are indebted, for every thing we have, and every thing we hope for, should be constantly attended with the homage and adoration, with the praises and acknowledgments of his creatures, his own dependant creatures, is a position that will admit of no controversy; and that there should be some places appointed for this purpose, that all the offices of religion may be performed with more decency, and more solemnity, is another position, that seems to arise from the nature of the thing. These buildings we style, the 'houses of God;' but it is not to defend him, as Arnobius ⁵ speaks, from heat or cold, from wind or rain, or tempests, that we raise such structures, but to put ourselves in a capacity of paying our duty to him, and of nourishing in our hearts such sentiments of respect and reverence, of love and gratitude, as are due from creatures to their great Creator.

In these places, God is said to be more immediately present to hear our supplications, receive our praises, and relieve our wants; and therefore, to make his habitation commodious, David exhorts his subjects to a liberal contribution, and 'because I have a joy,' says he, 'in the house of my God, I have of mine own gold and silver, given three thousand talents of gold, even the gold of Ophir, and seven thousand talents of fine silver.' "He indeed makes mention," as the learned ⁶ Hooker, with whose words I conclude this argument, has observed, "of the natural conveniency that such kind of bounteous expenses have, since thereby we not only testify our cheerful affection to God, which thinks nothing too dear to be bestowed about the furniture of his service, but give testimony to the world likewise of his almightiness, whom we outwardly honour with the chiefest of outward things, as being, of all things, himself incomparably the greatest. To set forth the majesty of kings, his vicegerents here below, the most gorgeous and rare treasures that the world can afford are procured; and can we suppose, that God will be pleased to accept what the meanest of these would disdain? In a word, though the true worship of God," says he, "be to God in itself acceptable, who respects not so much in what place, as with what affection he is served; yet manifest it is, that the very majesty and holiness of the place where God is worshipped, hath, in regard of us, great virtue, force, and efficacy, as it is a sensible help to stir up devotion, and, in that respect, bettereth, no doubt, our holiest and best actions of that kind."

CHAP. III.—Of the ancient Jerusalem, and its Temple.

It is an opinion vulgarly received, and not without much probability, that Jerusalem is the same city which ⁷ elsewhere is called Salem, and whereof Melchizedek is said to have been king. Not that Salem, or the city of Melchizedek, was of equal extent with Jerusalem in after times; but Jerusalem was no other than the city of Salem, enlarged and beautified by the kings of all Israel at first—David and Solomon, and after that, by the succeeding kings of Judah, when the monarchy came to be divided into two distinct kingdoms.

The word Salem, in the Hebrew language, ¹ signifies peace: and as the city of Melchizedek, called Salem, is probably thought to be the same with Jerusalem; so it is certain, that Jerusalem was ² otherwise called Jebus, and therefore, as it preserves the name of Salem in the latter, so it is thought to preserve the name of Jebus in the former part of it, and to be nothing else but a compound of Jebus and Salem, which, for the better sound's sake, by the change of one letter, and the omission of another, is softened into Jerusalem.

Whether this city stood in the centre of the world or no, we shall not pretend to determine, though some ^a very zealously contend for it; since it is a matter of more material disquisition, in what tribe it may be supposed to have been situated. In the conquest of the land of Canaan, and at the famous battle of Gibeon, ³ Joshua put to death the king of Jerusalem, and, very probably, took the city, though, by some means or other not mentioned in Scripture, the Jebusites afterwards got possession, and continued their possession even till the days of David. In the division of the land, it was apparently one of those cities which ⁴ were given to the tribe of Benjamin; and yet when we read, that at one time ⁵ 'the children of Judah could not drive out the Jebusites,' and, at another, ⁶ 'that the children of Judah took and burnt Jerusalem,' one would be tempted to think, that it lay within the limits of that tribe. But then this difference may be easily reconciled, if we will but consider, that as this city was built on the frontiers of both tribes, it is sometimes made a part of the one, and sometimes of the other; that, by Joshua's division of the country, Benjamin had most right to it, but, by the right of conquest, Judah; however, when it came to be made the metropolis of the whole nation, it was thought to belong to the Israelites in common, and therefore was claimed by neither.

The city of Jerusalem was built upon two hills, and encompassed all round with mountains. It was situated in a barren and stony soil; but the places adjacent were well watered, having the fountains of Gihon and Siloam, and the brook Kidron at the foot of its walls. Jebus, or the ancient city which David took, was seated on a hill towards the south; and, on the opposite quarter, towards the north, was Mount Zion, where David built a new ^b city, and called it after his own name, and where

^a To this purpose they observe, that the sacred writers are very well acquainted with this, as appears by that passage of Ezekiel, c. v. 5, 'Thus saith the Lord God, this is Jerusalem: I have set it in the midst of the nations and countries round about her.' For what purpose he did this, the Psalmist has not been wanting to inform us: 'Out of Zion,' says he, 'the perfection of beauty, God hath shined,' (Ps. l. 2.) Here the Almighty kept his court, and from hence he sent out his ambassadors, the prophets, to publish his decrees to the whole world around him, with more ease, and speedier conveyance, than could possibly be done from any other region of the habitable world. From hence, as from a central point, the light of the law at first, and the gospel afterwards shone out to the surrounding nations; and therefore we find Jerusalem emphatically called 'the city of our God, the mountain of his holiness, beautiful for situation, and the joy of the whole earth,' (Ps. xlviii. 1, 2.)—The History of the Life of King David, vol. 2.

^b This city was of a circular form, situated on a much higher hill, and surrounded with a broad deep trench, hewn whether by stood his royal palace likewise, ^c and the temple of the Lord; for the temple was built upon Mount Moriah, which was one of the hills belonging to Mount Zion, ^d

Between these two mountains lay the valley of Millo, which formerly separated ancient Jebus from the city of David, but was afterwards filled up by David and Solomon, to make a communication between the two cities. But, besides this valley of Millo, we read in Scripture art or nature, out of a natural rock. This trench was defended by a wall of great strength, erected upon its inner edge, and this wall was, in like manner, defended and beautified with strong and square towers, at regular distances; which towers are said to have been built of white marble, the lowest 60, and the highest 120 cubits high, but all exactly of one level on the top, although in themselves of very different heights, according to the declivity of the ground on which they stood.—The History of the Life of King David, vol. 2.

^c The tower which went under the name of David, was situated upon the utmost angle of Mount Zion, and the beauty and fine proportion of this fabric, as well as the use that was made of it, may be fairly inferred from that famous comparison of Solomon's: 'Thy neck is like the tower of David, built for an armoury, whereon there hang a thousand bucklers, all shields of mighty men,' (Cant. iv. 4.) 'The tower of furnaces,' which probably had its name from the many fires that were lighted up in it at once, answered all the ends of a Pharos, or watch tower, both to land and sea. By the advantage of its situation, it could not fail of being an excellent light-house both to the Mediterranean and Red sea, and was probably so contrived, as to illuminate a great part of the city likewise, and in that respect, was not only a glorious ornament, but of excellent use. The 'house of the mighty' was a palace erected by David, in honour of his worthies, or chieftains in war, in which they had apartments, according to their reputation and merit in arms, were always ready at hand, for counsel or aid, as the king's affairs required, and at leisure hours, by superintending and instructing the youth in their military exercises, answered all the purposes of a royal academy for the science of war.—The History of the Life of King David, vol. 2.

^d Dr Clarke and Mr Buckingham, who have investigated more closely than other travellers the topography of Jerusalem, suppose a hill on the south of that generally considered as Mount Zion, and from which it is separated by the valley taken for that of Hinnom, to be the true Zion. This hill is the one usually described as the mountain of Corruption, or of Offence, so called from Solomon's idolatry; and the valley which separates it from the supposed Zion, as that of Hinnom, or Gehinnom. But as Josephus describes but one valley after the filling up of that between Aera and Moriah by the Asmoneans, namely, that of the Cheesemongers, or Tyropeon, which united at the fountain of Siloam with the valley of Jehoshaphat; and as this supposed valley of Gehinnom is the only one which answers to that description; and further, as this hill alone has the distinct outline, and superior elevation, which we are universally given to understand the citadel of Zion possessed; it has certainly very strong claims to be considered as such. Every representation of Zion in Scripture implies a hill distinct from, and loftier than the ground on which the lower city stood. It was the hill or citadel of Jebus, the "castle" or "stronghold of Zion," which, from its insulated and impregnable nature, the Israelites were unable to take for 400 years after they had gained possession of the lower city (2 Sam. v. 1 Chron. xi.) it was the crowning eminence of the ridge on which the city stood; and from which the whole was denominated after its name. (Ps. cxxxii. 13, 14.) But no marked division or superiority of height which can explain such a pre-eminence of character, and such an uncommon power of defence, as are here represented, distinguishes the hill commonly received as that of Zion. It is further to be remarked, that Josephus describes the city as seated on two principal hills only, with one principal intervening valley, namely, that of the Cheesemongers, or Tyropeon, joining the valley of Jehoshaphat at the fountain of Siloam, as already stated. He also expressly mentions the upper city as situated on the one, and the lower city on the other, relative terms certainly, but of little meaning when applied to the slight inclination of the unequal ground on which the modern city, with its allotted part of Zion, stands.—En- of ¹ the house of Millo, which is said to be ² in the city of David, and therefore was built either upon Mount Zion, or some adjacent place. Let us then inquire a little what this house of Millo might possibly be.

Millo, considered in its etymology, is thought to be deduced from a root which signifies to be full, and is therefore, in the sacred history, supposed to denote a large capacious place, designed for public meetings, or, in short, a senate-house. That this was some public edifice, I think may be inferred from the notice that is taken of it among some other of Solomon's public buildings, where the reason of the tax, which he levied upon his subjects, is said to be this, ³ 'That he might build the house of the Lord, and his own house, and Millo, and the walls of Jerusalem,' &c., for, since we find it joined with the 'house of the Lord, and the walls of Jerusalem,' we cannot but suppose, that it was a building of the same public nature; and we since find farther, that ⁴ 'the servants of king Joash arose, and made a conspiracy, and slew him in the house of Millo, very probably when he was come thither to debate, and consult with his princes, and other chief men, the thing seems to be incontestable, that this house of Millo was erected for a public senate-house, though there is some reason to imagine that it was employed likewise for other purposes.

In the reign of Hezekiah, when Sennacherib came against Jerusalem with a purpose to besiege it, the king took counsel with his princes, and among other things, that were thought proper for his defence, it is said, ⁵ 'that he built up all the wall that was fallen, and repaired Millo, and made darts and shields in abundance.' From whence we may infer, that this Millo was a place of great consequence to the strength of Jerusalem, and was very probably made to serve two purposes, that is, to be both a parliament-house and an arsenal.

The palace which David built for himself, to which was adjoined that which his son built for the king of Egypt's daughter, must needs have been a very magnificent structure, since he had both his ⁶ workmen and materials sent him ^a from Tyre, which, at that time, surpassed all other nations in the art of building: but of this we can give no other account, than that it stood westward from the temple, and consisted of a large square court, defended by flankers, from one of which was the descent by stairs into the gardens, which, in all probability, were watered by the fountain of Siloam.

This fountain of Siloam, rises just under the walls of Jerusalem, on the east side thereof, between the city and the brook Kidron; and in all probability, was the same with the fountain Enrogel, or the Fuller's fountain, whereof we find mention ⁷ in Joshua, and in the books of Samuel and the Kings. Some travellers will have it that the water of this fountain is brackish, and has not a good taste; but the prophet Isaiah, when he utters the complaint of God against the Jews, ⁸ 'forasmuch as this people refuseth the waters of Shiloah, which go softly,'

&c., seems to denote the contrary. However this be, St Jerome himself affirms, that the waters of this fountain made the valley through which they ran, as watering the gardens and plantations that were there, very pleasant and delightful.

The fountain of Gihon, which springs very probably from an adjacent hill of the same name, was on the west side of Jerusalem; and as King Hezekiah ⁹ ordered the upper channel of this fountain to be conveyed into Jerusalem, that when the city was besieged, the enemy might not have the benefit of its waters; so we need not doubt, but ¹⁰ that the other spring of Siloam was, in like manner, conveyed into the city, and that, for the convenience of its inhabitants, they were both, in several places, distributed ¹¹ into pools; though some make that of Siloam to be without the walls.

The brook Kidron runs in the valley of Jehoshaphat on the east of Jerusalem, between the city and the Mount of Olives. It has usually no great quantity of water in it, and is frequently quite dry; but, upon any sudden rains, it swells exceedingly, and runs with great impetuosity. It was indeed of singular service to the ancient city, as it received its common sewers, and, upon every such violent flood, emptied them into the Dead Sea.

The mount of Olives, which doubtless had its name from the great quantity of olive trees that grew there, was situated to the east of Jerusalem, and parted from the city only by the valley of Jehoshaphat, and the brook Kidron; for which reason it is said to be a Sabbath-day's journey, that is, about a mile from it. It was on this mountain that Solomon built temples to the gods of the Ammonites and of the Moabites, in complaisance to his wives, who were natives of these nations; and for this reason it is likewise called in Scripture, ¹² 'the mount of corruption,' because such as follow vain idols are frequently said in Scripture to corrupt themselves. ¹³ Some indeed have imagined, that this mount of corruption was a distinct place, but the matter of fact is, that Mount Olivet had three summits, or was made up of three several mountains, ranged one after another, from north to south. The middle summit was that from which our Lord ascended; toward the south was that whereon Solomon ¹⁴ set up his abominations; and towards the north was the highest of all, ¹⁵ which was commonly called Galilee.

Mount Calvary, which, in all appearance, had its name ^b from the similitude it bore to the figure of a skull, or a man's head, was to the west of the ancient Jerusalem, just without the gates: and, as our Saviour suffered there, we may presume it was the common place where criminals of all kinds were generally executed. ^a

^b Some formerly have been of opinion, that this mount was called Calvary, because the head of the first man in the world was buried there, and that our Saviour was crucified in the same place; and that his blood running down upon the body of this person, might restore him to life, and procure him the favour of a resurrection. To support this tradition, they tell us that Noah, having preserved Adam's body in the ark, distributed the several parts of it to his children, and, as a particular favour, gave the skull or head to Shem, who was to be the parent of that holy stock, from whom the Messias was to come; and that Shem, with a spirit of foresight, buried the skull in Calvary, where he knew the Messias would be crucified. But neither the ancient fathers nor any modern authors that mention this tradition, were ever persuaded of its truth; and, without any disrespect to them, we may look upon all this as mere fiction.—Calmet's Dictionary under the word Calvary.

The valley of Hinnom, or the sons of Hinnom, lay to the south of the city, and was remarkable for the cruel and barbarous worship of Moloch, where parents made their children pass through the fire, or be burned in the fire, by way of sacrifice to that idol; and where it was usual to have musical instruments, from whence it obtained likewise the name of Tophet, the Hebrew word Toph, signifying the same as Tympanum in Latin, and Timbrel in English, to drown the lamentable shrieks of the children thus sacrificed. In this place there were afterwards kept a perpetual fire, to consume the dead carcasses and excrements, which were brought from Jerusalem; and therefore our Saviour alluding to this, calls hell by the name of Ge-henna, or the valley of Hinnom.

The valley of Jehoshaphat, which is likewise called the valley of Kidron, because of the above mentioned brook which runs through it, lies on the east of Jerusalem, between the city and the mount of Olives. Our Saviour, indeed, ascended from this mount; but the notion is very extravagant, that when he returns again he will judge the world in this valley, merely because the prophet Joel hath said, ¹ 'I will gather all nations, and will bring them into the valley of Jehoshaphat, and will plead with them for my people;' for what is there called the valley of Jehoshaphat, is not a proper, but an appellative name, and denotes no more than the judgment of God.

There is another valley that the Scripture makes early mention of, and that is ² 'the valley of Shaveh,' which is likewise called the king's dale, where Melchizedek met Abraham in his return from the slaughter of Chedorlaomer. According to Josephus, it was, in his time, but about two furlongs distant from Jerusalem, and for this reason, perhaps, it has been thought by some, to be no other than the valley of Jehoshaphat; though others make it different, yet so, as to come up near to the said valley, and to lie on the south-east part of the city, not far from the king's gardens. ³ Why it obtained the name of the king's dale, whether it was from its near situation to the king's palace and gardens, or from its being the place where the kings were wont to exercise themselves, or at least to entertain themselves, with seeing others perform their exercises of running, riding, and the like, is not agreed, and very likely will never be determined.

There were several gates, belonging to the ancient Jerusalem, ⁴ that are mentioned in Scripture; but it is

^a Mr Buckingham, who is satisfied of the identity of the present hill shown as Calvary, imagines that it was at the time of the crucifixion, as it is now, within the city. Of the arguments by which this opinion is supported, the following is an abstract:—The objections commonly urged against the position of Calvary within the walls are—that the term Golgotha, which is interpreted 'the place of a skull,' implies a place of public interment; that it was contrary to the custom of the east to bury in cities; and that it would be considered as defiling by the Jews to have a place of execution in the heart of the town. To the first of these objections it is answered, on the part of Mr Buckingham, that the word Golgotha thus translated a place of skulls, implies merely a skull; and is so used by St Luke, who, without mentioning Golgotha, writes, 'And when they were come to a place called skull,' &c.; that the name applies rather to a tradition that the skull of Adam was found in this spot; or, which is more probable, that it was derived from the figure of the eminence itself, which was a mound of small elevation, consisting of a round nodule of rock, which, from a resemblance which it bore to the shape of a skull, obtained that name for it. To the second objection it is replied, that whatever the general custom of the east may be, it was the common practice of the Jews to bury in their own gardens, whether within or without the town. The third objection is endeavoured to be removed, by showing, that Calvary was not, as is generally supposed, a place of public execution; but was merely seized on by the enraged and impatient multitude, as a convenient spot for carrying their mad purpose into speedy effect. This opinion is considered to be corroborated, by the singular fact, that it is nowhere said that Christ was led out of the city to be crucified; and by the no less extraordinary circumstance of Joseph of Arimathea having, on this same spot, a garden and a tomb, which he would not be likely to have had in a place defiled by public executions. Wherever Calvary was, it does not seem probable that it was a place of common execution for malefactors. It is quite inconceivable that a wealthy Jew like Joseph of Arimathea, should make choice of a place of public execution, where these horrid exhibitions must have been frequent, as the scene of his recreation while alive, and of his interment after death. The choice of this spot may rather be considered as accidental—as the first convenient one which offered itself to the impatient Jews, on which to immolate their victim, and to which he was hurried lest he should again escape them. This spot or mount is a rock, the summit of which is ascended to by a steep flight of eighteen or twenty steps from the common level of the church, which is equal with that of the street without; and besides this, there is a descent of thirty steps from the level of the church to the chapel of Helena; and eleven more to the place where it is said the cross was found; making in all sixty-one steps, or, if the last eleven be considered as subterraneous, fifty; equal to at least thirty-five feet of perpendicular height—sufficient to give this little eminence the character of a mound or mount.—Ed.

⁴ The present style of building in Jerusalem will, perhaps, in the unchanging character of eastern customs, best enable us to understand its ancient structure. The streets of almost every eastern city are narrow, for the purpose of excluding the sun and wind between the deep and almost blank walls of the houses, having small and but few windows towards the street; their fronts, properly speaking, being towards the central quadrangle. The entrance into the principal houses is by a porch, having benches on each side, where visits are received and business is despatched; few guests being permitted to penetrate further into the mansion. This porch communicates with the court in the centre: which, with persons of rank or wealth, is paved with marble, and laid out with fruit-trees and fountains. This court is surrounded with a cloister; over which is a gallery, having a balustrade or latticed work on the side towards the court, and on the opposite one the entrances to the chambers. Whoever has travelled in Spain or Portugal, where, by their Moorish possessors, many eastern customs were introduced, may have seen houses of this construction: the convents almost universally answer to it exactly. The open space in the quadrangle is the place where company is received on festive occasions; and is the same as the το κεντρον, the "midst" or the middle of the house into which the paralytic was let down, when our Saviour was preaching to a numerous assembly. (Luke v. 18, 19.) The stairs are placed either in the porch itself, or at the entrance into the court; from whence they are continued up one corner of the gallery to the top of the house, which is made flat to walk on, and surrounded by a parapet or balustrade. Thus a person may ascend from the porch to the top of the house without having any communication with its interior: and to this arrangement our Lord alludes, in his directions to his disciples respecting the troubles which were approaching, and their flight from Jerusalem. 'Let him who is on the house-top not come down to take any thing out of his house.' (Matt. xxiv. 17.) Of the present state and appearance of Jerusalem, M. Chateaubriand gives the following account: "When seen from the mount of Olives, on the other side of the valley of Jehoshaphat, Jerusalem presents an inclined plane descending from west to east. An embattled wall, fortified with towers and a Gothic castle, encompasses the city all round; excluding, however, part of mount Zion, which it formerly enclosed. In the western quarter, and in the centre of the city towards Calvary, the houses stand very close; but in the no easy matter to discover where their particular situation was. There is reason to believe likewise, that their names have been varied, or that one and the same gate has gone under different appellations; and as there were several circuits of walls in the city, which had their respective gates, it is more than probable, that some of these gates did not lead out of the city into the country. The gate of the valley, which doubtless had its name from leading into some valley, and ^a as travellers will have it, to the valley of Jehoshaphat, was situate on the east side of the city.

The dung gate, which seems to have taken its name

eastern part, along the brook Cedron, you perceive vacant spaces; among the rest, that which surrounds the mosque erected on the ruins of the temple, and the nearly deserted spot where once stood the castle of Antonia and the second palace of Herod. The noises of Jerusalem are heavy square masses, very low, without chimneys or windows: they have flat terraces or domes on the top; and look like prisons or sepulchres. The whole would appear to the eye one uninterrupted level, did not the steeples of the churches, the minarets of the mosques, the summits of a few cypresses, and the clumps of nopals, break the uniformity of the plane. On beholding these stone buildings encompassed by a stony country, you are ready to inquire if they are not the confused monuments of a cemetery in the midst of a desert. Enter the city, but nothing will you there find to make amends for the dulness of its exterior. You lose yourself among narrow, unpaved streets, here going up hill, there down, from the inequality of the ground; and you walk among clouds of dust or loose stones. Canvass stretched from house to house, increases the gloom of the labyrinth; bazaars roofed over, and fraught with infection, completely exclude the light from the desolate city. A few paltry shops expose nothing but wretchedness to view; and even these are frequently shut, from apprehension of the passage of a cadi. Not a creature is to be seen in the streets, not a creature at the gates, except now and then a peasant gliding through the gloom, concealing under his garments the fruits of his labour, lest he should be robbed of his hard earnings by the rapacious soldier. Aside, in a corner, the Arab butcher is slaughtering some animal, suspended by the legs from a wall in ruins: from his haggard and ferocious look, and his bloody hands, you would rather suppose that he had been cutting the throat of a fellow creature than killing a lamb. The only noise heard from time to time, in this desolate city, is the galloping of the steed of the desert: it is the Jaissary who brings the head of the Bedouin, or returns from plundering the unhappy Fellah." The following is Mr Buckingham's description of Jerusalem, as seen from the Mount of Olives:—"Reposing beneath the shade of an olive-tree, upon the brow of this hill, we enjoyed from hence a fine prospect of Jerusalem on the opposite one. This city occupies an irregular square of about two miles and a half in circumference. Its shortest apparent side is that which faces the east; and in this is the supposed gate of the ancient temple, now closed up, and the small projecting stone on which Mohammed is to sit when the world is to be assembled to judgment in the vale below. The southern side is exceedingly irregular, taking quite a zigzag direction; the south-west extreme being terminated by a mosque, built over the supposed sepulchre of David, on the summit of Mount Zion. The form and exact direction of the western and northern walls are not distinctly seen from hence; but every part of this appears to be a modern work, and executed at the same time. The walls are flanked at irregular distances by square towers, and have battlements running all around on their summits, with loop-holes for arrows or musquetry close to the top. The walls appear to be about 50 feet in height, but are not surrounded by a ditch. The northern wall runs over slightly declining ground; the eastern wall runs straight along the brow of Mount Moriah, with the deep valley of Jehoshaphat below; the southern wall crosses over the summit of the hill assumed as Mount Zion, with the vale of Hinnom at its feet; and the western wall runs along on more level ground, near the summit of the high and stony mountains over which we had at first approached the town. As the city is thus seated on the brow of one large hill, divided by name into several smaller hills, and the whole of these slope gently down towards the east, this view from the Mount of Olives, a position of greater height than that on which the highest part of the city stands, commands nearly the whole of it at once. On the north, it is bounded by a level and apparently fertile space, now covered with olive-trees, particularly near the north-east angle. On the south, the steep side of Mount Zion, and the valley of Hinnom, both show patches of cultivation and little garden enclosures. On the west, the sterile summits of the hills there barely lift their outlines above the dwellings.

And on the east, the deep valley of Jehoshaphat, now at our feet has some partial spots relieved by trees, though as forbidding in its general aspect, as the vale of death could ever be desired to be, by those who have chosen it for the place of their interment. Within the walls of the city are seen, to the north, crowded dwellings, remarkable in no respect, except being terraced by flat roofs, and generally built of stone. On the south, are some gardens and vineyards, with the long red mosque of Al Sakhara, having two tiers of windows, a sloping roof, and a dark dome at one end, and the mosque of Zion, on the sepulchre of David, in the same quarter. On the west, is seen the high square castle and palace of the same monarch, near the Bethlehem-gate. In the centre, rise the two epulas of unequal form and size, the one blue and the other white, covering the church of the holy sepulchre. Around, in different directions, are seen the minarets of eight or ten mosques, and an assemblage of about 2000 dwellings. And on the east, is seated the great mosque of Al Haram, or, as called by Christians, the mosque of Solomon, from being supposed, with that of Al Sakhara near it, to occupy the site of the ancient temple, of that splendid and luxurious king." The same author describes Jerusalem, as seated on unequal ground, on a range of high hills, which he computes at 1500 feet above the sea; some of the eminences being higher than those on which the city itself stands. The whole country around is represented as a rocky and barren space, which almost defies the efforts of human labour to fertilize by any common process. The fixed inhabitants he estimates at about 8000; but the continual arrival and departure of strangers make the total number of those present in the city from 10 to 15,000 generally, according to the season of the year. These are made up of a mixed multitude of Turkish and Arabian Mohammedans, who are the most numerous, Greeks, Latins, Armenians, Copts, Abyssinians, Syrians, Nestorians, Maronites, Chaldeans, and Jews; amongst whom, the poor Jews, in this their own city, are the most degraded, and "are more remarkable from the striking peculiarities of their features and dress, than from their numbers as contrasted with the other bodies."

Mr Joliffe, however, who visited Jerusalem in 1817, states, that the highest estimate makes the total number of inhabitants amount to 25,000: of which there are supposed to be—

Mohammedans	13,000
Jews	4,000
Roman Catholics	800
Armenians	400
Copts	50

Dr Richardson, who was at Jerusalem in 1818, estimates the population at 20,000; whom he distributes into:—

Mussulmans	5,000
Christians	5,000
Jews	10,000

Which, probably, judging from other estimates, increases the number of the Jews in the same proportion as it diminishes that of the Mohammedans.

There is very little trade in Jerusalem, and few manufactures; the only one that at all flourishes, is that of crucifixes, chaplets, and relics; of which, incredible as it may seem, whole cargoes are shipped off from Jaffa for Italy, Portugal, and Spain.—Ed.

Our countryman, Mr Sandys, is of opinion, that the gate of the valley was formerly the same with what is now called St Stephen's gate, not far from the golden gate, or great gate, which leads into that which was formerly the court of the temple. He likewise supposes, that this gate of St Stephen's was formerly called the sheep gate; but into this opinion perhaps he might be led by the nearness of St Stephen's gate to the pool of Bethesda, there the sacrifices were washed before they were brought to the priest to be offered: and therefore, since the valley gate, and the sheep gate, are distinctly mentioned by Nehemiah, we cannot but think, that they must have been different gates.—Will's Geography of the Old Testament, vol. 3.

from the dung and filth of the beasts that were sacrificed at the temple, being carried out of it, was probably the same with what is now so called, and stands on the east side of the city likewise.

The water gate, which took its name from its use, because through it was the water brought to serve the city and the temple, was ¹ on the same side; and so was

The gate of the fountain, so called from its nearness to the fountain of Siloam, only inclining a little towards the south.

The gate of Ephraim, which opened to the main road, leading to the tribe of Ephraim, and from it derived its name, stood on the north side of the city, because on that side was that tribe seated; ² though others had rather place it on the west.

The horse gate, sheep gate, and fish gate, are supposed by some to have had their denominations from the several markets of these creatures, that were kept there. The horse and sheep gates were both on the east side, not far from the palace and the temple; and the fish gate was on the north, though some, who think it had its name from the fish that were brought from the Mediterranean sea, had rather place it on the west side.

Lastly, the high gate, or the gate of Benjamin, so called from its situation towards the land or tribe of Benjamin, is supposed by some to have been the principal gate of the royal palace; but from what we read ³ concerning Jeremiah's being grossly abused near this gate, it appears to have been situated by the house of the Lord.

Thus we have passed through most of the gates of this ancient city; and on the north side of it, without the walls now, but then probably within them, we meet with some subterraneous chambers, that are wonderfully magnificent, and at present called the sepulchres of the kings, ⁴ of which some late travellers give us a description to this effect. "When you come to the place, you pass through an entry hewed out of a rock, which admits you into an open court about twenty-six feet square, all cut out of the rock, which is of solid marble, and serves instead of walls. On the left hand of this court is a portico nine paces long, and four broad, with a kind of architrave running round its front, cut out of the same rock, as are likewise the pillars that support it. At the end of this portico there is a passage into the sepulchres, which when you have crept through it with some difficulty, lets you into a large chamber of above four and twenty feet square. Its sides and ceiling are so exactly square, and its angles so just, that no architect, with levels and plummets, could build a room more regular. From this room you pass into six more, one within another, and all of the same fabric with the first, except that the two innermost are deeper than the rest, and have a descent of about six or seven steps into them. In every one of these rooms, except the first, were coffins of stone, placed in niches, along the sides of the room, and amount in all to about fifty."⁵

upon as a wonder, is, that the ceiling, the doors, as well as all the rest, their hinges, their posts, their frames, &c., are all cut out of the same continued rock. It may therefore be worth our inquiring a little in what manner these structures were employed, and who possibly might be the persons that were repositied in them.

That these subterraneous structures were not the sepulchres of the kings of Judah, the generality of those that have inspected them are agreed, because the Scripture tells us, that David and Solomon, and most of their successors were ⁶ buried in the city of David; and yet these grotts lie without the gate of Damascus, as it is now called, at a considerable distance from the city of David; but how far this city of David did formerly extend, or where we shall find any other signs of ^a the places, where David and the other kings his successors were buried, we have no hints given us. The Rev. Mr Maundrell, from this passage in Scripture, ⁶ "And Hezekiah slept with his fathers, and they buried him in the chiefest of the sepulchres of the sons of David," is of opinion, that this was the place where Hezekiah, and the sons immediately born to David, that were not repositied in the royal sepulchres, were buried: but it is much more probable, and what both the Syriac and Arabic versions seem to confirm, that by the sons of David here, we are not to understand his immediate sons, properly so called, but the kings rather that succeeded him. This is a form of speech frequently made use of by the sacred writers: and therefore the sense of 'Hezekiah's being buried in the sepulchres of the sons of David,' must be, that he was buried in the sepulchres of the kings descended from David.

The more probable opinion, therefore, is that of Le Bruyn, who supposes, that these grotts were the sepulchres of Manasseh, his son Amon, and his grandson Josiah, kings of Judah. Of Manasseh the Scripture tells us expressly, that ⁷ 'he was buried in the garden of his own house, in the garden of Uzza;' and of Amon it is said, that 'he was buried in the garden of Uzza;' which garden Manasseh might very probably purchase, and being taken with the pleasantness of it, might there build him a house, which is here called 'his own house,' in contradistinction to the royal palace, which was built, and inhabited by his ancestors, on Mount Zion. Of Josiah indeed the sacred history does not say expressly, that he was buried here; all that it tells us is, that he ⁸ was 'buried in the sepulchres of his fathers;' but whether ^a Benjamin of Tudela, who wrote about the year 1173, relates, that not above fifteen years before, a wall belonging to mount Zion, fell down, and the priests set twenty men to work upon it. Two of these workmen being one day left alone, took up a stone, which opened a passage into a subterraneous place, into which they entered. There they found a palace, supported by marble pillars, and crusted over with gold and silver. At the entrance was a table, and upon this table a golden crown and sceptre. This, say the Jews, was David's monument, and opposite to it was Solomon's, adorned in the like manner. As they were attempting to penetrate farther, they were overset by a whirlwind, and remained senseless till the evening, when they heard a voice, bidding them arise, and begone. Benjamin assures us, that he had this story from the mouth of one Abraham, a Pharisee, who, as he said, had been consulted about this event by the patriarch of Jerusalem, and declared that this was David's monument. But the whole of this account has so much the air of a fable, that it is needless to confute it.—Calmet's Dictionary under the word David.

in the city of David, or in the garden of Uzza, it makes no mention: and therefore, since both his father and grandfather were buried in this garden, there is reason to think, that Josiah was here buried likewise; especially considering, that in one of these subterraneous rooms, as Le Bruyn tells us, which seemed to be more lofty than the rest, there were three coffins curiously adorned with carved works, which he took to be the coffins of these three kings.

But of all the buildings that ancient Jerusalem had to boast of, the temple which David designed, and Solomon perfected, was the most magnificent. We are not, however, to imagine, that this temple was built like one of our churches; for it did not consist of one single edifice, but ^a of several courts and buildings, which took up a great deal of ground. The place whereon it was erected, was on the top of Mount Moriah, and the building altogether made an exact square of 800 cubits, or 1160 feet long on each side, exactly fronting the east, west, north, and south.

The ground plot upon which the temple was built was a square of 600 cubits every way. It was encompassed with a wall of six cubits high, and the same in breadth, and contained several buildings for different uses, surrounded with cloisters, supported by marble pillars. Within this space was the court of the Gentiles, fifty cubits wide, and adorned, in like manner, with cloisters and pillars. To separate this court from the court of the Israelites, there was a wall of 500 cubits square. The court of the Israelites was 100 cubits. It was paved with marble of different colours, and had four gates, to every quarter one, and each rising with an ascent of seven steps. To separate this court from the court of the priests, there was a wall of 200 cubits square; and the priests' court was 100 cubits, encompassed with cloisters and apartments where the priests, that attended the service of the temple, were used to live. This court had but three gates, to the east, to the north, and to the south, and were approached by an ascent of eight steps. These courts were all open, and without any covering, but in case of rain, or other bad weather, the people could retire under the cloisters, that were supported with rows of pillars, and went round every court. In the Israelites' court, over against the gate of the priests' court, was erected a throne for the king, which was a magnificent alcove, where he seated himself when he came to the temple. In the priests' court was the altar of burnt-offerings, a great deal larger than that of the tabernacle, having ten brazen lavers, whereas the tabernacle had but one, and a sea of brass, which the tabernacle had not, supported by twelve oxen.

On the west side of the altar of burnt-offerings, there was an ascent of twelve steps, to what we may properly call the temple; and this consisted of three parts, the porch, the sanctuary, and the holy of holies. The porch was about twelve cubits long, and twenty broad, at the entrance of which stood the two famous pillars, Jachin and Boaz, whose names import, that 'God alone was the support of the temple;' and its gate was fourteen cubits wide, the sanctuary or nave of the temple, was forty cubits long, and twenty broad, wherein were the altar of incense, and the table of shewbread; but because the temple was larger and wanted more light than the tabernacle, instead of one, it had ten golden candlesticks. The holy of holies was a square of twenty cubits, wherein was placed the ark of the covenant, containing the two tables of stone, wherein God had engraven his ten commandments; but instead of two cherubim, as were in the tabernacle, in the temple there were four.

Round about the temple, and against the walls thereof, as Josephus tells us, were built thirty cells, or little houses, which served in the way of so many buttresses, and were, at the same time, no small ornament to it; for there were stories of these cells, one above another, whereof the second was narrower than the first, and the third than the second, so that their roofs and balustrades being within each other, made three different terraces, as it were, ^b upon which one might walk round the temple.

^b The temple itself, strictly so called, had two stories, the upper of which was raised quite above these little houses and their roofs; for their roofs reached no higher than the top of the first story. The second story, which had no building adjoining to its side, made a large room over the sanctuary and the holy of holies, of equal dimensions with them; and it is no improbable opinion that this was the upper chamber, in which the Holy Ghost was pleased to descend upon the apostles in a visible manner. This upper room was appropriated to the pious laity as a place for them to come and pay their devotions in; and therefore it seems very likely that the apostles were here with other devout persons, while the temple was full of Jews of all nations, who were come to celebrate the feast of the Pentecost, and that thereupon they below, hearing the noise, which was occasioned, by the shaking of the place, ran up to see the cause of it, and, to their great surprise, found the apostles distinguished from the other Jews about them, both by the cloven tongues which sat upon each of

^a These several parts of the temple the Greeks are very careful to distinguish by different names. What was properly the temple, they called ἡ ναὸς; and the courts and other parts of the temple, τὰ ἱερόα. Thus when Zacharias is said to have gone into the temple to burn incense, (Luke i. 9.) which was done in the sanctum, the word is ναὸς; but when it is said that Anna the prophetess departed not from the temple, (Luke ii. 37.) that is, lived in that part of the court of the Israelites which was appropriated to religious women, the Greek word is ἱερόα. And this observation holds good all through the New Testament.—Lamy, De Tabern. b. 5. c. 5.

Upon the whole then, we may observe, ¹ that the glory of this temple did not consist in the bulk or largeness of it, for in itself it was but a small pile of building, no more than an hundred and fifty feet in length, and an hundred and five in breadth, taking the whole of it together from out to out, and is exceeded by many of our parish churches, but its chief grandeur and excellency lay in its out buildings and ornaments, in its workmanship, which was everywhere very curious, and its overlappings, which were vast and prodigious; for the overlaying of the holy of holies, only, which was a room but thirty feet square, and twenty high, amounted to six hundred talents of gold, which comes to four millions three hundred and twenty thousand pounds of our sterling money.

To conclude this chapter then, ² in the words of the Jewish historian, "The whole frame, in fine," says he, "was raised upon stones, polished to the highest degree of perfection, and so artificially put together, that there was no joint to be discerned, no sign of any working tools being upon them, but the whole looked liker the work of providence and nature, than the product of art and human invention. And as for the inside, whatever carving, gilding, embroidery, rich silks, and fine linen could do, of these there was the greatest profusion. The very floor of the temple was overlaid with beaten gold, the doors were large, and proportioned to the height of the walls, twenty cubits broad, and still gold upon gold." In a word, it was gold all over, and ^a nothing was wanting, either within or without, that might contribute to the glory and magnificence of the work.

CHAP. IV.—On the Temple.

SUPPLEMENTAL BY THE EDITOR.

DIANA'S temple at Ephesus was one of the seven wonders of the world. It is said that almost all Asia was employed in the building of it for about two hundred years; but it was certainly more extensive than the

^a It is not to be doubted, but that Solomon made all the utensils and ornaments of the temple proportionable, both in number and richness, to that of the edifice; and yet Josephus seems to have carried his account beyond all credibility, when he tells us, that there were 10,000 tables besides those of the shewbread; 10,000 candlesticks besides those in the holy place; 80,000 cups for drink-offerings; 100,000 basins of gold, and double that number of silver: when he tells us that Solomon caused to be made 1000 ornaments for the sole use of the high priest, 10,000 linen robes and girdles for that of the common priests, and 200,000 more for the Levites and musicians; when he tells of 200,000 trumpets made according to Solomon's direction, with 200,000 more, made in the fashion that Moses had appointed, and 400,000 musical instruments of a mixed metal, between gold and silver, called by the ancients electrum—concerning all which we can only say, that the text is either silent or contradicts this prodigious account.—Universal History, b. 1. c. 7.

temple at Jerusalem, for it may be justly questioned, notwithstanding the profusion of gold, silver, precious stones, &c., employed in the temple of Solomon, whether it cost any thing like the money expended on the temple of Diana.

Pliny informs us, that ³ in order to build one of the pyramids in Egypt, no less than three hundred and sixty thousand men were employed for the space of twenty years. But neither was the temple any such work as this. We may also observe that the temple was never intended to hold a vast concourse of people; it was only for the service of the Lord, and the priests were those alone who were employed in it. The courts, chambers, and other apartments, were far more extensive than the temple itself; it was never designed to be a place to worship at. There God was known to have a peculiar residence, and before him the tribes came, and the priests were a sort of mediators between him and the people. In short, the temple was to the Jews in the promised land what the tabernacle was to the Hebrews in the wilderness; the place where God's honour dwelt, and whither the people flocked to pay their adoration.

"Solomon laid the foundation of the temple, A. M. 2992, B. C. 1008, before the vulgar era 1012; and it was finished A. M. 3000, and dedicated in 3001, B. C. 999, before the vulgar era 1003; ^b Kings viii. 2 Chron. v. vii. viii. The place that was pitched on for erecting this magnificent structure was on the side of Mount Zion called Moriah. Its entrance or frontispiece stood towards the east, and the most holy or most retired part was towards the west. The author of the first book of Kings, and of the second of Chronicles, has chiefly made it his business to describe the temple properly so called, that is the sanctuary, the sanctum, and the apartments belonging to them, as also the vessels, the implements, and the ornaments of the temple, without giving any description scarcely of the courts and open areas, which however made a principal part of the grandeur of this august edifice.

"But Ezekiel has supplied this defect by the exact plan he has delineated of these necessary parts. Indeed it must be owned that the temple as described by Ezekiel was never restored after the captivity of Babylon, according to the model and the mensuration that this prophet has given of it. But as the measure he sets down for the sanctum and the sanctuary are, within a small matter, the same as those of the temple of Solomon; and as this prophet, who was himself a priest, had seen the first temple; it is to be supposed that the description he gives us of the temple of Jerusalem is the same as that of the temple of Solomon.

"The ground-plot upon which the temple was built was a square of six hundred cubits, or twenty-five thousand royal feet; (Ezek. xlv.) This space was encompassed with a wall of the height of six cubits, and of the same breadth. Beyond this wall was the court of the Gentiles, being fifty cubits wide. After this was seen a great wall, which encompassed the whole court of the children of Israel. This wall was a square of five hundred cubits.

³ Hist. Nat. b. xxxvi. c. 12.

^b These dates are according to the commonly received chronology. According to Dr Hales, the temple was begun A. M. 4384, or B. C. 1027, and finished B. C. 1020.

A. M. 2981. A. C. 1023; OR, ACCORDING TO HALES, A. M. 4375. A. C. 1036. 2 SAM. xix.—1 KINGS viii.

The court of Israel was an hundred cubits square, and was encompassed all round with magnificent galleries supported by two or three rows of pillars. It had four gates of entrance, one to the east, another to the west, a third to the north, and the fourth to the south. They were all of the same form and largeness, and each had an ascent of seven steps. The court was paved with marble of divers colours, and had no covering; but the people, in case of need, could retire under the galleries that were all round about. These apartments were to lodge the priests in, and to lay up such things as were necessary for the use of the temple. There were but three ways to come in, to the east, to the north, and to the south, and they went to it by an ascent of eight steps. Before, and over against the gate of the court of the priests, in the court of Israel, was erected a throne for the king, being a magnificent alcove, where the king seated himself when he came into the temple. Within the court of the priests, and over against the same eastern gate, was the altar of burnt-offerings, of twelve cubits square, according to Ezek. xliii. 16, or of ten cubits high and twenty broad, according to 2 Chron. iv. 1. They went up to it by stairs on the eastern side.

“Beyond this, and to the west of the altar of burnt-offerings, was the temple properly so called, that is to say, the sanctuary, the sanctum, and the porch of entrance. The porch was twenty cubits wide, and six cubits deep. Its gate was fourteen cubits wide. The sanctum was forty cubits wide, and twenty deep. There stood the golden candlestick, the table of shewbread, and the golden altar, upon which the incense was offered. The sanctuary was a square of twenty cubits. There was nothing in the sanctuary but the ark of the covenant, which included the tables of the law. The high priest entered here but once a year, and none but himself was allowed to enter. Solomon had embellished the inside of this holy place with palm trees in relief, and cherubim of wood covered with plates of gold, and in general the whole sanctuary was adorned, and as it were, overlaid with plates of gold.

“Round the sanctum and sanctuary were three stories of chambers, to the number of thirty-three. Ezekiel makes them but four cubits wide; but the first Book of Kings, vi. 6, allows five cubits to the first story, six to the second, and seven to the third.

“Since the consecration or dedication of the temple by Solomon A. M. 3001, this edifice has suffered many revolutions, which it is proper to take notice of here.

“Shishak, king of Egypt, having declared war with Rehoboam, king of Judah, took Jerusalem, in A. M. 3033, B. C. 967, before the vulgar era 971, and carried away the treasures of the temple; 1 Kings xiv. 2 Chron. xii.

“In 3146, Jehoash, king of Judah, got silver together to go upon the repairs of the temple; they began to work upon it in earnest, in 3148, B. C. 852, before the vulgar era 856; 2 Kings xii. 4, 5, and 2 Chron. xxiv. 7, 8, 9, &c.

“Ahaz, king of Judah, having called to his assistance Tilgath-Pilneser, king of Assyria, against the kings of Israel and Damascus, who were at war with him, robbed the temple of the Lord of its riches, to give away to this strange king; 2 Chron. xxviii. 21, 22, &c. A. M. 3264, B. C. 736, before the vulgar era 740; and not contented with this, he profaned this holy place by setting up there an altar like one he had seen at Damascus, and taking away the brazen altar that Solomon had made; 2 Kings xvi. 10, 11, 12, &c. He also took away the brazen sea from off the brazen oxen that supported it, and the brazen basins from their pedestals, and the king's throne or oratory, which was of brass. These he took away to prevent their being carried away by the king of Assyria. Nor did he stop here, but carried his wickedness so far as to sacrifice to strange gods, and to erect profane altars in all the corners of the streets of Jerusalem; 2 Chron. xxviii. 24, 25. He pillaged the temple of the Lord, broke the sacred vessels, and, lastly, shut up the house of God. This happened A. M. 3264, B. C. 736, before the vulgar era 740, to his death, which happened in 3278, B. C. 722, before the vulgar era 726.

“Hezekiah, the son and successor of Ahaz, opened again and repaired the gates of the temple which his father had shut up and robbed of their ornaments; 2 Chron. xxix. 3, 4, &c. A. M. 3278, B. C. 722, before the vulgar era 726. He restored the worship of the Lord and the sacrifices, and made new sacred vessels in the place of those that Ahaz had destroyed. But in the fourteenth year of his reign, (2 Kings xviii. 15, 16,) A. M. 3291, B. C. 709, before the vulgar era 713, Sennacherib, king of Assyria, coming with an army into the land of Judah, Hezekiah was forced to take all the riches of the temple, and even the plates of gold that he himself had put upon the gates of the temple, and give them to the king of Assyria. But when Sennacherib was gone back into his own country, there is no doubt that Hezekiah restored all these things to their first condition.

“Manasseh, son and successor of Hezekiah, profaned the temple of the Lord, by setting up altars to all the host of heaven, even in the courts of the house of the Lord; 2 Kings xxi. 4, 5, 6, 7; 2 Chron. xxxiii. 5, 6, 7; A. M. 3306, and the following years. He set up idols there, and worshipped them. God delivered him into the hands of the king of Babylon, who loaded him with chains, and carried him away beyond the Euphrates; 2 Chron. xxxiii. 11, 12, &c.; A. M. 3328, B. C. 672, before the vulgar era, 676. There he acknowledged and repented of his sins; and being sent back to his own dominions, he redressed the profanations he had made of the temple of the Lord, by taking away the idols, destroying the profane altars, and restoring the altar of burnt-offering, upon which he offered his sacrifices.

“Josiah, king of Judah, laboured with all his might in repairing the edifices of the temple, 2 Kings xxii. 4, 5, 6, &c., 2 Chron. xxxiv. 8—10; A. M. 3380, B. C. 620, before the vulgar era 624, which had been either neglected or demolished by the kings of Judah, his predecessors. He also commanded the priests and Levites to replace the ark of the Lord in the sanctuary, in its appointed place; and ordered that it should not any more be removed from place to place, as it had been during the reign of the wicked kings, his predecessors, 2 Chron. xxxv. 3.

“Nebuchadnezzar took away a part of the sacred vessels of the temple of the Lord, and placed them in the temple of his god, at Babylon, under the reign of Jehoiakim, king of Judah; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 6, 7; A. M. 3398, B. C. 602, before the vulgar era 606. He also carried away others, under the reign of Jehoiachin, 2 Chron.

xxxvi. 10; A. M. 3405, B. C. 595, before the vulgar era 599. Lastly, he took the city of Jerusalem, and entirely destroyed the temple, in the eleventh year of Zedekiah, A. M. 3416, B. C. 584, before the vulgar era 588; 2 Kings xxv. 1, 2, 3, &c., 2 Chron. xxxvi. 18, 19.

“The temple continued buried in its ruins for the space of fifty-two years, till the first year of Cyrus at Babylon, A. M. 3468, B. C. 532, before the vulgar era 536. Then Cyrus gave permission to the Jews to return to Jerusalem, and there to rebuild the temple of the Lord, Ezra i. 1, 2, 3, &c. The following year they laid the foundation of the second temple; but they had hardly been at work upon it one year, when either Cyrus or his officers, being gained over by the enemies of the Jews, forbade them to go on with their work; Ezra iv. 5; A. M. 3470, B. C. 530, before the vulgar era 534. After the death of Cyrus and Cambyses, they were again forbidden by the Magian, who reigned after Cambyses, and whom the Scripture calls by the name of Artaxerxes; Ezra iv. 7, 17, 18, &c.; A. M. 3483, B. C. 517, before the vulgar era 521. Lastly, these prohibitions being superseded under the reign of Darius, son of Hystaspes, Ezra vi. 1, 14; Hag. i. 1, &c.; A. M. 3485, B. C. 515, before the vulgar era 519; the temple was finished and dedicated four years after, A. M. 3489, B. C. 511, before the vulgar era 515, twenty years after the return from the captivity.

“This temple was profaned by order of Antiochus Epiphanes, A. M. 3837. The ordinary sacrifices were discontinued therein, and the idol of Jupiter Olympus was set up upon the altar. It continued in this condition for three years; then Judas Maccabæus purified it, and restored the sacrifice and worship of the Lord; 1 Mac. iv. 36; A. M. 3840, B. C. 160, before the vulgar era 164.

“Herod the Great undertook to rebuild the whole temple of Jerusalem anew, in the eighteenth year of his reign, A. M. 3986.¹ He began to lay the foundation of it A. M. 3987, forty-six years before the first passover of Jesus Christ, as the Jews observe to him, by saying, ² ‘Forty and six years was this temple in building, and wilt thou rear it up in three days?’ This is not saying that Herod had employed six and forty years in building it; for Josephus assures us, that he finished it in nine years and a half.³ But after the time of this prince, they all continued to make some new addition to it; and the same Josephus tells us that they went on working upon it even to the beginning of the Jewish war.⁴

“This temple, built by Herod, did not subsist more than twenty-seven years, being destroyed A. M. 4073, A. D. 73, of the vulgar era 69. It was begun by Herod in 3987, finished in 3996, burned and destroyed by the Romans in 4073.

of Solomon, and from that which was rebuilt by Zerubbabel after the captivity. This is the description that Josephus has left us of it, who himself had seen it:—

“The temple, properly so called, was built sixty cubits high, and as many broad; but there were two sides of front, like two arms or shoulderings, which advanced twenty cubits on each side, which gave in the whole front an hundred cubits, as well as in height. The stones made use of in this building were white and hard, twenty-five cubits long, eight in height, and twelve in width.⁵

“The front of this magnificent building resembled that of a royal palace. The two extremes of each face were lower than the middle, which middle was so exalted that those who were over against the temple, or that approached towards it at a distance, might see it though they were many furlongs from it. The gates were almost of the same height as the temple; and on the top of the gates were veils or tapestry of several colours, embellished with purple flowers. On the two sides of the doors were two pillars, the cornices of which were adorned with the branches of a golden vine, which hung down with their grapes and clusters, and were so well imitated, that art did not at all yield to nature. Herod made very large and very high galleries about the temple, which were suitable to the magnificence of the rest of the building, and exceeded in beauty and sumptuousness all of the kind that had been seen before.

“The temple was built upon a very irregular mountain, and at first there was hardly place enough on the top of it for the site of the temple and altar. The rest of it was steep and sloping.⁶ But when king Solomon built it he raised a wall towards the east, to support the earth on that side; and after this side was filled up, he then built one of the porticos or galleries. At that time this face only was cased with stone, but in succeeding times, the people endeavouring to enlarge this space, and the top of the mountain being much extended, they broke down the wall which was on the north side, and enclosed another space, as large as that which the whole circumference of the temple contained at first. So that, at last, against all hope and expectation, this work was carried so far that the whole mountain was surrounded by a treble wall. But for the completing of this great work, whole ages were no more than sufficient; and all the sacred treasures were applied to this use, that the devotion of the people had brought to the temple from all the provinces of the world. In some places these walls were above 300 cubits high, and the stones used in these walls were some forty cubits long. They were fastened together by iron cramps and lead, to be able to resist the injuries of time. The platform on which the temple was built was a furlong square, or 120 paces.” Thus far Calmet and Josephus.⁷

BOOK VI.

CONTAINING AN ACCOUNT OF THINGS, FROM THE BUILDING OF SOLOMON'S TEMPLE, TO THE BABYLONISH CAPTIVITY, IN ALL ABOUT 400 YEARS,—ACCORDING TO DR HALES, 422 YEARS FROM THE FOUNDATION OF THE TEMPLE, AND OF COURSE 414 YEARS AND SIX MONTHS FROM ITS BEING FINISHED.

PRELIMINARY OBSERVATIONS.

THE division of the history of God's chosen people, on which we are now entering, extends nearly from the close of David's reign to the Babylonish captivity, a period of about four hundred and twenty-seven years. The sacred books in which this history is contained, are usually called "the first and second books of the Kings;" and in some versions, "the third and fourth books of the Kings." It is evident, as Mr Scott remarks, that they contain an abstract of the history, compiled from much more copious records, which seem to have been collected and preserved by contemporary prophets,¹ and indeed, a considerable part of the transactions of their own times, is recorded in connexion with the prophecies of Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel. It is, however, uncertain by whom this compilation was made: but if Ezra, as it is generally and probably supposed, compiled the books of Chronicles; it is not likely that he compiled these also; as they form a distinct history of the same times. If, therefore, they were arranged in the present manner, principally by one sacred writer, they who ascribe them to Jeremiah, seem to have adopted the more probable opinion. Indeed, the second book of the Kings and his prophecy end with the narrative of the same events; though perhaps both were added after his death by another hand; and it is not unlikely that some other trivial alterations were made in the days of Ezra, to render the narrative more perspicuous to the Jews after the captivity.

They have, however, been constantly received, both by Jews and Christians, as a part of the Sacred Canon, the holy Scriptures; and the events recorded are frequently referred to in the New Testament.² They contain many prophecies; especially that of Josiah, who was foretold by name, three hundred years before his birth. After the death of David, the sacred historian records the principal transactions of Solomon's long and peaceful reign; which, however, was covered with a dark cloud toward the close; and under his successor, the nation was divided into two distinct kingdoms of Judah and Israel. The descendants of Solomon reigned over that of Judah till the captivity, for about three hundred and eighty-seven years: so that from the accession of David, during a course of four hundred and sixty-seven years, the throne was filled by his descendants, in lineal descent, except as the sons of Josiah succeeded one another. During this long term of years there was not a single revolution, or civil war; and but one short interruption, by Athaliah's usurpation. Perhaps it would be difficult to find, in universal history, any thing equal to this permanent internal order and tranquillity. Above half the kings of Judah supported true religion, and many of them were eminently pious men; and it is remarkable that their reigns were much longer than those of the wicked princes.³

The kingdom of Israel continued about two hundred and fifty-four years, till the Assyrian captivity. The nineteen kings, of seven families, who, during this period, reigned in succession, were all idolaters, and most of them monsters of iniquity: yet the Lord by his prophets, especially by Elijah and Elisha, preserved a considerable degree of true religion in the land, till the measure of their national wickedness was full; and then they were finally dispersed among the Gentiles, except as a remnant of them was incorporated among the Jews.

Connected with the peace and prosperity of Solomon's reign, and the fame of his wisdom, a full account is given of the temple having been built by him. God had commanded Israel to offer all their sacrifices at one place; Shiloh had for some time been that place; and the ark had been removed to Zion, by David, in order that a temple might there be built, which Solomon his son accomplished. Now a large portion of the subsequent parts of the Old Testament relate to this temple; to the sins of the people in sacrificing elsewhere; to their profanation of the temple; to the judgments of God upon them for their crimes; especially to the destruction of the temple by the Chaldeans; and to the rebuilding of it by Zerubbabel. These things so run through all the subsequent history and prophecies, that if Solomon did not build the temple by the express command of God, it must follow, that God punished the nation with tremendous judgments for violating merely human appointments. When the Samaritans preferred Mount Gerizim, our Lord told the woman of Samaria, that they "knew not what they worshipped, for salvation was of the Jews:" and this declaration, with his own constant attendance at the ordinances there administered, sufficiently attest the divine inspiration of those records, in which alone it is expressly declared that Solomon built the temple by the direction and appointment of God.

The temple was a type of Christ,—of his church,—and of heaven. The tabernacle seemed rather to represent the church in its moveable, changeable state, in this world: but the temple, fixed to one place, appears to have been intended to represent the church in heaven.—This was the house in which Christ dwelt, till he assumed human nature. Here was the place that God chose, where his people offered up their sacrifices, till he came, who by the sacrifice of himself finished transgression, made an end of sin offering, made reconciliation for iniquity, and brought in everlasting righteousness. Here the messenger of the covenant often delivered his heavenly doctrine; and here his church was gathered by the pouring out of his Spirit after his ascension: the sound of the gospel went forth from hence over the world.

It may also be observed, that the Jewish church was, in the reign of Solomon, in a state of great external prosperity. Israel was exceedingly multiplied, so that they seemed to have become like the sand on the sea shore. They were now in the peaceful possession of the promised land, and of all the abundance, which, through the divine blessing, it yielded to them. Their king was a typical representation of Christ, glorious in his apparel, exalted, triumphing, and reigning, in his kingdom of peace. The happy state of the Jewish church at that time, shadowed forth the condition of the church in the latter day, when nation shall not lift up sword against nation, nor learn war any more;—at that blissful period, when they shall not hurt nor destroy in all God's holy mountain, because the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea. There were considerable additions made to the canon of Scripture by Solomon, who wrote the books of Proverbs and Ecclesiastes, probably near the close of his reign. The Song of Songs, which was also written by him, has always been considered as representing the high and glorious relation which subsists between Christ and his redeemed church.

The reader should remark the care which God exercised in the course of this period, in upholding the true religion. When the ten tribes had generally forsaken the worship of God, he preserved the true religion in the kingdom of Judah; and when that people corrupted themselves, as they often did, God still kept the lamp of heavenly truth burning, and was often pleased, when things seemed to come to an extremity, to grant blessed revivals of religion, by remarkable outpourings of his Holy Spirit, particularly in Hezekiah and Josiah's time. The preservation of the book of law in the time of the great apostasy, during a considerable part of the long reign of Manasseh, which lasted fifty-five years, and also in the reign of Amon his son, is a remarkable instance of the care which God exercised over the interests of true religion.

The intelligent reader will also observe, that amid the apostasies and calamities by which this period was characterized, the tribe of Judah, from which the Redeemer was to come, was preserved from ruin by the special interposition of God. As instances of deliverance by the arm of God, we need only mention their preservation when Shishak king of Egypt came against Judah with a great force; when Jeroboam brought an army of eight hundred thousand men against the members of this tribe; and when, again, in Asa's time, Zerah the Ethiopian came against him with a yet larger army of a thousand thousand and three hundred chariots.¹ And Asa cried unto the Lord his God, and said, Lord, it is nothing with thee to help, whether with many, or with them that have no power.² His prayer was heard; and God himself gave him the victory over this mighty host. When the children of Moab, and the children of Amon, and the inhabitants of mount Seir, combined together against Judah with a mighty army, a force greatly superior to any that Jehoshaphat could raise, God assured Jehoshaphat and his people by one of the prophets, that they need not be afraid, for that he himself, without their instrumentality, would destroy their armies. But it is unnecessary to allude to more examples of this kind. It was the purpose of God, a purpose often referred to by the prophets, that the Messiah should spring from the tribe of Judah, and the family of David, and that therefore this tribe and family should be preserved till that illustrious descendant appeared, to whom should be given the throne of his father David, and of whose kingdom there shall be no end.

Nor should we fail to notice the goodness of God to his church and people, in raising up eminent prophets, who committed their prophecies to writing, for the instruction and edification of the church in all ages. From the time of Samuel there had been a constant succession of prophets in Israel, who had added to the canon of Scripture by their historical writings. But now in the days of Uzziah, God raised up great prophets, who added to the canon not only by their historical compositions, but by books of their prophecies. Of these, we need only mention Isaiah, Amos, Jonah, Micah, and Nahum. They were divinely qualified to exercise the prophetic office for the purpose of bearing testimony to the great Redeemer: for the testimony of Jesus and the spirit of prophecy are the same.³ Accordingly, we find, that the main things insisted on by the prophets are Christ, his redemption, the establishment of his kingdom among men, and the glories of the latter day. In what exalted strains do they allude to these heavenly themes. How plainly and fully does Isaiah, the evangelical prophet, describe the manner and circumstances, the nature and end, of the sufferings and sacrifice of Christ!³ In what chapter of the New Testament are these more fully set forth

This, then, forms an important era in the history of the discovery of human redemption. The way of salvation for fallen man was more clear than at any former period by the great increase of gospel light communicated by inspired prophets: 'Of which salvation the prophets inquired and searched diligently, who prophesied of the grace that should come unto you: searching what, or what manner of time the Spirit of Christ which was in them did signify, when it testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow. Unto whom it was revealed, that not unto themselves, but unto us they did minister the things which are now reported unto you by them that have preached the gospel unto you with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven.'¹

SECT. I.

CHAP. I.—From the finishing of the temple, to the reign of Jehoshaphat.

THE HISTORY.

WHEN Solomon had finished the temple, which was in the eleventh year of his reign, and in the eighth month of that year,^a even when all the solemn feasts were over, he thought it advisable to defer the dedication of it until the next year, which was a year of jubilee, and determined to have it done some days before the ^b feast of tabernacles. To this purpose, he sent all the elders of Israel, the princes of the tribes, and the heads of the families, notice to repair to Jerusalem at the time appointed; when accordingly, all being met together, the priests and Levites carried into the temple, first, all the presents that David had made to it: then set up, in their several places, the vessels and ornaments appointed for the service of the altar, and the sanctuary; and lastly,

^a Solomon deferred the dedication of the temple to the following year after it was finished, because that year, according to Archbishop Usher, was a jubilee. "This," he observes, "was the ninth jubilee, opening the fourth millenary of the world, or A. M. 3001, wherein Solomon, with great magnificence, celebrated the dedication of the temple seven days, and the feast of tabernacles other seven days; the celebration of the eighth day of tabernacles being finished, upon the twenty-third day of the seventh month, the people were dismissed, every man to his home. The eighth day of the seventh month, namely, the thirtieth of our October, being Friday, was the first of the seven days of dedication; on the tenth day, Saturday November 1, was the feast of expiation or atonement held; whereon, according to the Levitical laws, the jubilee was proclaimed by sound of trumpet. The fifteenth day, Friday November 6, was the commencement of the feast of tabernacles; the twenty-second, November 13, being also Friday, was the termination of the feast of tabernacles, which was always very solemnly kept, (2 Chron. vii. 9; Lev. xxiii. 36; John vii. 37.) and the day following, November 14, being our Saturday, when the Sabbath was ended, the people returned home.—Usher's Annals.—Ed.

^b This feast was appointed in commemoration of the children of Israel's dwelling in booths, whilst they were in the wilderness, and of the tabernacle, which at that time was built, where God promised to meet them, to dwell among them, and to sanctify the place with his glory; and might therefore be well reckoned a very proper season for the dedication of the temple, which was to succeed in the tabernacle's place.—Bedford's Scripture Chronology, b. 6. c. 2.

brought the ^c ark of the covenant, together with the ^d tabernacle of the congregation, into its new habitation with great solemnity; the king and elders of the people walking before, while others of the priests offered an ^e infinite number of sacrifices, in all the places through which the ark passed.

^c The sacred history tells us, that 'in this ark there was nothing save the two tables of stone, which Moses put there at Horeb,' (1 Kings viii. 9.) and yet the author to the Hebrews affirms, 'that in this ark was the golden pot that had manna, and Aaron's rod that budded, as well as the tables of the covenant,' (Heb. ix. 4.) Now, to reconcile this, some imagine, that before the ark had any fixed and settled place, which is the time the apostle refers to, all these things were included in it, though it was chiefly intended for nothing but the tables of the covenant; but that, when it was placed in the temple, nothing was left in it but these two tables; all the other things were deposited in the treasury of the temple, where the book of the law (as we read in 2 Chron. xxxiv. 14.) was found in the days of king Josias. Others however pretend, that in the time of the apostle, that is, towards the end of the Jewish commonwealth, Aaron's rod, and the pot of manna were really kept in the ark, though, in the days of Solomon, they were not. But this answer would be more solid and satisfactory, if he knew for certain, that, in the time of the apostle, the ark of the covenant was really in the sanctuary of the temple which Herod built; whereas Josephus (On the Jewish War, b. 6. c. 6.) tells us expressly, that, when the Romans destroyed the temple, there was nothing found in the holy of holies.—Calmel's Commentary.

^d But the question is, what tabernacle, whether that which Moses made, and was then at Gibeon, (2 Chron. i. 3.) or that which was made by David, and was then at Jerusalem? To end this dispute, some have imagined, that both these tabernacles were at this time carried into the temple, and laid up there, that all danger of superstition and idolatry might thereby be avoided, and that no worship might be performed anywhere, but only at the house which was dedicated to God's service. But it is observed by others, that the convenience which David made for the reception of the ark, was never called the 'tabernacle of the covenant;' it was no more than a plain tent, set up in some large room of the royal palace, until a more proper receptacle could be provided for it; but the tabernacle that was at Gibeon was the same that sojourned so long in the wilderness. The tent was the same, the curtains the same, and the altar the same that was made by Moses; or, at least, if there was any alteration in it, as things of this nature could hardly subsist so very long without some repair, the reparation was always made according to the original model, and with as little deviation as possible. It is not to be doubted, then, but that the Mosaic tabernacle is the tabernacle here intended, which for the prevention of schism, and to make the temple the centre of devotion, was now taken down, and reposit in the treasury, or storehouse, where it continued until the time that Jerusalem was taken by the Chaldeans, when Jeremiah, as Josephus informs us, (Jewish Antiq. b. 8. c. 2.) was admonished by God, to take it and the ark, and the altar of incense, and hide them in some secret place, from whence it is doubted, whether they have ever yet been removed, for fear of profanation.—Patrick's and Calmel's Commentaries.

^e The number of sacrifices which, upon this occasion, are said to be offered, was 'two and twenty thousand oxen, and an hundred and twenty thousand sheep,' (1 Kings viii. 63.) But we must not suppose, that these were offered all on one day, much less on one altar. The continuance of this meeting was for fourteen days, seven in the feast of tabernacles, and seven in that of the dedication; and because the brazen altar, before the door of the temple, was not sufficient to receive all these sacrifices, Solomon, by a special license from God, ordered other altars to be erected in the court of the priests, and perhaps in other places, which were to serve only during this present solemnity, when such a vast number of sacrifices were to be offered: for at other times no other altar was allowed but this brazen one, which Moses had made. It is no bad observation, however, of Josephus, (b. 8. c. 2.) that, during the oblation of so many sacrifices, the Levites took care to 'perlume the air with the fragrant of incense, and sweet odours, to such a degree, that the people were sensible of it at a distance;' otherwise the burning of so many beasts at one time, must have occasioned an offensive smell.—Patrick's Comment.

A. M. 3901. A. C. 1003; OR, ACCORDING TO HALES. A. M. 4391. A. C. 1020. 1 KINGS viii. TO THE END OF 2 CHRON.

When the ark was placed in the sanctuary, and the priests and Levites, in their turns, were celebrating the praises of God, the temple was filled with a ^a miraculous cloud, insomuch that the priests could not continue to officiate. This Solomon observing, took occasion from thence to infer, that the Lord had taken possession of the place; and having for some time fallen prostrate ^b with his face to the ground, he raised himself up, and turning towards the sanctuary, ^c addressed his prayer to God, and 'beseeched him graciously to accept of the house which he had built for his sake, to bless and sanctify it; and to hear the prayers of all, whether Jews or Gentiles, who, upon any occasion, either of public or private calamity, might direct their supplications to him ^d from that holy place. He beseeched him likewise to

^a When Moses had finished the tabernacle according to the pattern which God had showed him, and set it all up, it is said, that 'a cloud covered the tent of the congregation, and the glory of the Lord filled the tabernacle, so that Moses was not able to enter into the tent of the congregation, because the cloud abode thereon, and the glory of the Lord filled the tabernacle,' (Exod. xl. 34, 35.) And therefore, when the temple was finished, and the ark brought into the sanctuary, God gave the like indication of his presence, and residence there. Hereby he testified his acceptance of the building, and furnishing the temple, as a service done to his name; and hereby he declared, that as the glory of the ark, that sacred symbol of his presence, had been long eclipsed by its frequent removes, and mean habitations; so now his pleasure was, that it should be looked upon with the same esteem and veneration as when Moses conducted it into the tabernacle. For this cloud, we must know, was not a heavy, thick, opaque body, such as is engendered in the air, and arises from vapours and exhalations, but a cloud that was dark and luminous at the same time, whose darkness was awful and majestic, and whose internal part was bright and refulgent, darting its rays upon occasion, and exhibiting its light through its obscurity; so that, according to its different phasis, or position, it became to the Israelites a pillar of a cloud by day, to screen them from the heat, and at night a pillar of fire to give them light, (Exod. xiii. 21.) Whatever it was that constituted this strange appearance, it is certain this mixture of light and darkness was looked upon as a symbol of the divine presence; for so the Scripture has informed us, that he who dwelleth in light that is inaccessible, 'made darkness his secret place, his pavilion round about him, with dark water, and thick clouds to cover him, (Ps. xviii. 11.)—Calmet's Commentary.

^b Although it is not improbable that Solomon may have prostrated himself on the appearance of the cloud of glory that filled the temple, the text makes no mention of his having done so, but immediately after this divine manifestation, we are told that he spake and blessed the people. It may seem unnecessary to take notice of so trifling a matter, but to mix up with the sacred narrative assertions which are founded on mere conjecture, we consider neither safe nor warrantable.—Ed.

^c The prayer which Josephus puts into Solomon's mouth upon this occasion, is to this effect:—"O Lord, thou that inhabitest eternity, and hast raised out of nothing the mighty fabric of this universe, the heavens, the air, the earth, and the sea; thou that fillest the whole, and every thing that is in it, and art thyself unbounded, and incomprehensible; look down graciously upon thy servants, that have presumed to erect a temple here to the honour of thy great name. Lord, hear our prayers, and receive our sacrifices. Thou art everywhere, vouchsafe also to be with us. Thou that seest and hearest all things, look down from thy throne in heaven, and give ear to our supplications in this place. Thou that never failest to assist those that call upon thee day and night, and love and serve thee as they ought to do, have mercy upon us." There is another prayer, in the same historian, addressed to God on the same occasion, wherein Solomon blesses him for the exaltation of his family, and implores the continuance of his goodness and peculiar presence in the temple, well worth the reader's perusal, though too long to be inserted here.

^d It is the same thing, no doubt, to God, wherever we pray, so long as we pray with a pious mind and a devout heart, and fulfil the promise which he had been pleased to make to his father David, in favour of his family, and the kings his successors; and having thus finished his prayer, he turned to the people, and after he had blessed them, gave them a strict charge to be sincere in their duty towards God, to walk in his statutes, and observe his laws.

While Solomon was thus addressing his prayers to God, and his exhortations to the people, a victim was laid upon the altar, and God, to testify his acceptance of what was doing, sent immediately a fire from heaven, which consumed it, and all the other sacrifices that were about it; which, when the people, who were witnesses of the miracle, perceived, they fell upon their faces, and worshipped the God of Israel: and it was, very probably, on the ^e night following, that he appeared to Solomon again in a dream, and ^f signified to him, 'that he had made the subject of our prayers such good things as he has permitted us to ask; but it was not consistent with the preservation of the Jewish state and religion that he should be publicly worshipped in every place. For since the Jews were on every side surrounded with idolaters, led away with divers superstitions, but ignorant all of the true God, it was highly necessary, that in all divine matters, there should be a strict union between them all both in heart and voice, and consequently, that they should all meet together in one place to worship God, lest they should run into parties, and fall into idolatry, as it happened when the kingdom became divided into two. And therefore, though Solomon, knew very well that in every place, God was ready to hear the prayers of every devout supplicant, yet, for the preservation of peace and unity, he was minded to give the people a notion, that God would be found more exorable to the prayers which were offered in the temple of Jerusalem, and thereby excite them to a frequentation of that, rather than any other place.—Le Clerc's Commentary in locum.

^e It is thus that we have placed the time of God's second appearance to Solomon; but some are of opinion, that it did not happen till two and twenty years after God's first appearance, and after that Solomon had accomplished all his buildings; to which the connexion of the discourse seems to give some countenance; and it came to pass, when Solomon had finished the building of the house of the Lord, and the king's house, and all that he was pleased to do, that the Lord appeared to him a second time, (1 Kings ix. 1, 2.) It seems a little strange, however, that God should delay answering this prince's prayer for thirteen years together, and then, when he appeared to him, tell him, 'I have heard thy prayer, and the supplication that thou hast made before me, and I have hallowed this house which thou hast built.' Ver. 3. And therefore to solve this difficulty, it is reasonable to think, that the division of this 9th chapter is wrong; that the first verse of it should be annexed to the conclusion of the preceding chapter, and so terminate the account of what Solomon had done; and that the next chapter should begin with the second verse, where the historian enters upon a fresh subject, namely, the answer that God returned to Solomon's prayer, which he continues to the tenth verse, and presents us with it all at once, that he might not break the thread of his narration.—Calmet's Commentary on 1 Kings ix. 2.

^f Josephus has made a very handsome comment upon the answer which God made Solomon in his dream. The voice told him farther, says he, 'that in case of such an apostasy, as he had before mentioned, his new-erected fabric should, by divine permission, come to be sacked, and burned by the hands of barbarians, and Jerusalem itself laid in rubbish and ashes by a merciless enemy; insomuch that people should stand amazed at the very report of so incredible a misery and distress, and be wondering one to another, how it could come to pass, that a nation which was but yesterday the envy of mankind for riches, external glory, and renown, should now, all on a sudden, be sunk and lost to the last degree of wretchedness and contempt, and reduced to this despicable state too by the same hand that raised them. To which questions their own guilty consciences shall make this answer: "We have forsaken our God; we have abandoned the religion of our forefathers, and of our country, and all this is justly befallen us for our sins."—Jewish Antiq. b. 8. c. 2.

heard his prayer; did accept of the temple which he had built for him; and would not fail to listen to the petitions that proceeded from thence; that if he persevered in his obedience to him, as his father David had done, he would establish his throne, and perpetuate a race of successors in his family; but that, if either he, or his children prevaricated in this matter, he would cut them off, overturn his kingdom, and destroy the temple.⁷

The feast of the dedication, in conjunction with that of tabernacles, lasted for fourteen days; and when all things were thus performed with the greatest order and solemnity, on the morrow the king dismissed the people, ^a who returned to their respective homes with glad and joyful hearts.

Solomon, it must be observed, had a singular taste for building; therefore, after he had finished and consecrated the temple, he undertook a palace for himself,^b which had all the magnificence that can be imagined, another for his Egyptian queen, and a third, that was called ^c 'the house of the forest of Lebanon,' where he chiefly chose to reside. These were the works of thirteen years: and as Hiram, king of Tyre, was very kind in supplying him with men, money, and materials, to carry on these, and many more stately structures, Solomon, to express his gratitude, or to clear off the debt which he had contracted with him,^d offered him twenty cities in the land of Galilee, adjoining to his own country. But as these places ^e did not suit his convenience, he refused to accept of them; and therefore Solomon, having made him, no doubt, some other recompense more to

was really built on Lebanon, since we read of Solomon's having his throne, (1 Kings vii. 7.) and the golden shields, that he made, placed in it, (1 Kings x. 17.) which he scarce would have removed to the very extremity of his kingdom: and therefore we may conclude, as indeed it appears from 1 Kings vii. 2., that this house was near Jerusalem, and called by the name of the 'Forest of Lebanon,' just as many pleasant and delightful places in that country were called Carmel, because it was in a lofty place like Lebanon, and the trees which grew upon it made it very shady and cool, and consequently proper for Solomon to dwell there in summer, as he did in his palace in Jerusalem in winter.—Patrick and Cabnet's Commentary on 1 Kings vii. 2.

^d It is an express injunction which God gives the Israelites, that the land wherein the people had a right by divine lot, and himself a right, as being the sole proprietor thereof, was not to be sold or alienated for ever, (Lev. xxv. 23.) How then could Solomon, without violating this law, pretend to give Hiram twenty cities in the land of Galilee? Now to this some have replied, that Solomon did not give Hiram a property and perpetual right to those cities, but only assigned him the possession of them for a time, until the debt which he had contracted for the several supplies he had from him, while he was building the temple, was satisfied. Others think that upon supposition that these cities were inhabited by Israelites, Solomon did not give Hiram, as indeed he could not, their particular possessions, but only his own royalties over them, which he might justly do, and all the profits he received from them, which, according to the taxes then imposed, (1 Kings xii. 4.) were not inconsiderable. But there is no reason for these far fetched solutions, when the Scripture expressly tells us, that these cities were not in the territories of Israel, nor inhabited at that time by the Israelites, (2 Chron. viii. 2.) There were indeed some of them conquered by the king of Egypt, who gave them to Solomon as a portion with his daughter, and others by Solomon himself, who, as Selden observes, (On the Law of Nature and Nations, b. 6. c. 16.) had "a right to dispose of those lands which he had conquered in voluntary war, without the consent of the senate." And this may be one reason why he gave these, rather than other cities, because these were certainly in his own power to give, when others perhaps were not. A learned author upon this subject, has given a quite different turn to the sense of the passage. For his opinion is, that Hiram did not return these cities, because he thought them not good enough, but because he was unwilling to receive so large a remuneration for the few good offices he had done Solomon, and was minded rather that his favours of this kind should be all gratuitous. He therefore makes the word Calul, which is the name that Hiram gives to the country where these cities stood, a title of respect, and not of contempt; for he derives it from the Hebrew Chelbes, which signifies a bond or chain, intimating that these two neighbouring kings had mutually bound themselves in a bond of friendship, Solomon by giving, and Hiram by returning the cities now under consideration. This is very pretty: but it is carrying the point of generosity in the king of Tyre a little too high, in my opinion, considering his acceptance of, if not express stipulation for, such a quantity of corn and oil, in lieu of the timber which he sent Solomon, (1 Kings v. 10, 11.)—Patrick's and Le Clerc's Commentaries; and Pool's Annotations.

^e The reason is, because the Tyrians being very commodiously situated for that purpose, were in a manner, wholly addicted to merchandise: and therefore would not remove from the sea coasts, to live in a soil which was fat and deep, and consequently required a great deal of labour to cultivate it, which was a business that they were very little accustomed to.—Bedford's Scripture Chronology, b. 6. c. 2.

^a In 1 Kings viii. 66, we are told that 'on the eighth day he sent the people away'; that is, the day after the latter feast of tabernacles, which lasted seven days. It is said, (2 Chron. vii. 10.) that, 'on the three and twentieth day he sent the people away,' which Houbigant thinks cannot be reconciled. He is of opinion, that something has been omitted here which should have been supplied from the parallel place; but it is probable that these fourteen days of rejoicing were not kept without intermission, particularly as the day of expiation, or atonement, was celebrated on the tenth of Tisri, or Ethanim. (See Lev. xxiii. 27; and Calendar of the Jews, in Prolegom. p. 66.) By admitting therefore a sufficient interval of time to complete the number of days, these two texts may be satisfactorily reconciled.—Hewlett's Commentaries.—ED.

^b The description of this palace, which we may gather from Josephus, Lamy, and others, that have treated of Solomon's buildings, is in this manner related:—"Upon several rows of pillars, there was erected a spacious pile of building, in the nature of a common hall, for the hearing of causes. It was an hundred cubits in length, fifty in breadth, and in depth thirty, supported by fifteen square columns, covered with Corinthian work in cedar, and fortified with double doors, curiously wrought, that served both for the security and ornament of the place. In the middle of this hall was another edifice of thirty cubits square, and underest with strong pillars, wherein was placed a throne of state, on which the king himself used to sit personally in judgment. On the right hand of this court of justice stood the king's own palace, and, on the left, that which he built for Pharaoh's daughter, both fitted up with cedar, and built with huge stones of ten cubits square, which were partly plain, and partly overlaid with the most precious marble.—The rooms were hung with rich hangings, and beautified with images, and sculptures of all kinds, so exquisitely finished, that they seemed to be alive, and in motion. It would be an endless work, says Josephus, to give a particular survey of this mighty mass of building; so many courts and other contrivances, such a variety of chambers and offices, great and little, long and large galleries, vast rooms of state, and others for feasting and entertainment, set out as richly as could be, with costly furniture, and gildings; besides, that all the services for the king's table were of pure gold. In a word, the whole house was in a manner made up from top to bottom, of white marble, cedar, gold, and silver, with precious stones, here and there intermingled upon the walls and ceilings, after the manner of the adorning of the temple."—Jewish Antiq. b. 8. c. 2.

^c Some commentators are of opinion, that this house was the same with the palace which Solomon built in Jerusalem, and that it had its name from the tall pillars that supported it, which looked like the cedars in the forest of Lebanon; but the contrary is manifest, because the holy Scripture speaks of it as a distinct building, though perhaps it might not be far distant from the other on some cool shady mountain, which made it resemble Mount Lebanon. For it is an idle fancy to think, that this house his satisfaction, took and repaired these cities; and having built store cities likewise in the country, he sent colonies of his own subjects to inhabit them, that they might be a curb and restraint on the Syrians of Zobah, who had formerly been conquered by David, and, upon their revolt, but lately reduced by Solomon.

To conclude the account of Solomon's public buildings. He built the walls of Jerusalem, and a senate-house in the same city, called Millo. He repaired and fortified Hazor, Megiddo, the two Beth-Horons, Baalah, ^a Tadmor in the wilderness of Syria, and Gezer, which

^a Tadmor, which, by the Greeks, is called Palmyra, is situated in the wilderness of Syria, upon the borders of Arabia Deserta, inclining towards the Euphrates. Josephus places it two days' journey from the Upper Syria, one day's journey from the Euphrates, and six days' journey from Babylon. And the reason he gives why Solomon was inclined to build a city in this place, was, because in all the country round about, there was no such thing as a well or fountain, but in this spot only, to be found. If we may guess by the ruins, which later travellers give us the description of, this city was certainly one of the finest and most magnificent in the east, and it is somewhat surprising, that history should give us no account, either when or by whom it was reduced to the sad condition in which it lies at this day. But the true reason for his building this town in so desolate a place, was the commodiousness of its situation, to cut off all commerce between the Syrians and Mesopotamians, and to prevent their caballing and conspiring together against him, as they had done against his father David.—Le Clerc's Commentary. [It is probable that Tadmor was originally a watering station between Syria and Mesopotamia, with perhaps some indifferent accommodation suited to the mode of travelling in those times. The mere circumstance of wholesome water being found on any spot in such a country, was sufficient to give it importance. It lay in the direct line of communication for the Indian trade, by way of the Euphrates and Persian Gulf, and must have been an important station, not only for rest and refreshment, but as a point of exchange with the Armenian merchants, who would meet the Indian convoy here with their own merchandise, as the nearest point to them, as they thus carry on a direct traffic, independent of the great merchants of Tyre and Sidon. It is no wonder therefore, that the efforts of Solomon should be directed to obtain possession of a place from whence so great a profit might be drawn, either by a tax on the articles of trade, or by turning a portion of it, which would otherwise have gone to the ports of Phœnicia, into those of his own dominions. To strengthen this design he built Tadmor; that is, he converted it from a mere caravansera to a proud city; furnished it with every necessary and convenience as a place of trade; and made it one of the greatest of the many emporia of eastern commerce: advantages which it enjoyed, and under which it continued to flourish, for more than a thousand years, as may be gathered from the mention made of its strength and prosperity at the time of the Parthian wars.]—Mansford's Scripture Gazetteer.—Ed. The original name was preserved till the time of Alexander, who extended his conquests to this city, which then exchanged Tadmor for the title of Palmyra. It submitted to the Romans about the year 130, and continued in alliance with them during a period of 150 years. When the Saracens triumphed in the east, they acquired possession of this city, and restored its ancient name of Tadmor. Of the time of its ruin there is no authentic record; but it is thought, with some probability, that its destruction occurred during the period in which it was occupied by the Saracens. Of its present appearance Messrs Wood and Dawkins, who visited it in 1751, thus speak:—"It is scarcely possible to imagine any thing more striking than this view. So great a number of Corinthian pillars, mixed with so little wall or solid building, afforded a most romantic variety of prospect." Captain Mangles, who travelled more recently, observes, "On opening upon the ruins of Palmyra, as seen from the valley of the tombs, we were much struck with the picturesque effect of the whole, presenting the most imposing sight of the kind we had ever seen." But on a minutest inspection, the ruins of this once mighty city do not appear so interesting as at a distance. Volney observes, "In the space covered by these ruins, we sometimes find a palace of which nothing remains but the court and walls; sometimes a temple, whose

the king of Egypt took from the Canaanites, and gave it in dower with his daughter. He fortified all the cities which he made his magazines for corn, wine, and oil, and those where his chariots and horses were kept. He subdued all the Hittites, and Hivites, and Amorites, and Perizzites, that anywhere remained in the land of Israel, and laid on them all the drudgery, and servile labour. But ^b as for his own subjects, he appointed them either to be surveyors of his works, or guards to his person, or commanders in the army, or traders and merchants, that so he might make his nation as famous, and as rich and flourishing, as it was possible to be effected by human policy.

But it was not only a multitude of hands, but a large supply of wealth likewise, that was necessary to carry on so many expensive buildings; and therefore Solomon took care to cultivate the trade to Ophir, which his father had begun from Elam and ^c Ezion-Geber, two ports in the Red sea, whether himself went in person to inspect the building of the ships, and to provide them with able and experienced seamen, which his good friend and ally Hiram was never backward to furnish him with. So that by this means his subjects, who soon attained to the art of navigation, were enabled to make several advantageous voyages; and particularly in one fleet, peristyle is half thrown down; and now a portico, a gallery, a triumphal arch. If from this striking scene we cast our eyes upon the ground, another almost as varied presents itself. On which side soever we look, the earth is strewed with vast stones half buried, with broken entablatures, mutilated friezes, disfigured reliefs, effaced sculptures, violated tombs, and altars defiled by the dust." It is situated under a ridge of barren hills to the west, and its other sides are open to the desert. The city was originally about ten miles in circumference; but such have been the destructions effected by time, that the boundaries are with difficulty traced and determined. In the Modern Traveller, there is a very excellent description of the present aspect of this ruined city, by Mr Josiah Conder.—Calmet's Dictionary in locum.

^b History indeed takes notice of the same temper in Sesostris, king of Egypt, who, upon his return home from his several expeditions, took it into his head to build temples in all the cities of Egypt, but would suffer no Egyptian to do any servile work therein. All the work of this nature was performed by the captives that he brought with him from the wars; and therefore, to perpetuate the remembrance of his kindness to his subjects, as well as remove some possible odium from himself, upon every temple he ordered this inscription to be set up, "No native was ever a labourer here."—Diodorus Bibliot. b. 1.

^c Josephus will needs have it, that Ezion-Geber is the same with Berenice, which lies indeed upon the Red sea, but then it is upon the western or African shore thereof; whereas the Scripture is positive, that it was a port of Idumæa, or Arabia Deserta, situate upon the gulf of Elam, which is on the opposite shore. Elam, or Eloth, or Elath, for it was called by all these names, was situate upon the same, and might possibly have its name from thence. When David conquered Edom, or Idumæa, he made himself master of this port, (2 Sam. viii. 14.) His son, we see, built ships here, and sent them from hence to Ophir for gold, (2 Chron. viii. 17, 18.) It continued in the possession of the Israelites about an hundred and fifty years, till, in the time of Joram, the Edomites recovered it, (2 Kings viii. 20.) but it was again taken from them by Azariah, and by him left to his son, (2 Kings xiv. 22.) His grandson Ahaz however lost it again to the king of Syria, (2 Kings xvi. 6.) and the Syrians had it in their hands a long while, till, after many changes under the Ptolemies, and the Selencidæ, it came at length into the possession of the Romans. It was formerly a small town, with fruitful fields about it, but now there is nothing left but a tower, which serves as an habitation for the governor, who is subject to the governor of Grand Cairo, and no signs of fruitfulness to be seen in any parts adjoining to it.—Patrick's Commentary, and Calmet's Dictionary, under the word Elam.

^a brought him home no less than ^b four hundred and twenty talents of gold, with many other commodities, and curiosities of great value. ^c In short, Solomon was one of the richest, and most magnificent princes, that was then on the face of the earth. In his time, silver was no more regarded than stones in the street: his annual revenues were six hundred and sixty-six talents of gold, besides the tributes he received from the kings and nations that were in subjection to him; the subsidies which his subjects the Israelites paid; and the sums arising from the merchants for his customs. The bucklers of his guards were of gold; the ^d ivory throne, whereon he sat, was overlaid with it; and all the utensils of his palaces, and vessels of his table, which ^e for magnificence, and sumptuousness of provision, exceeded all that was ever known before, were of the same metal. Presents of gold, of rich stuffs, of spices, of arms, of horses, and mules, were sent to him from every quarter; and to see the face, and hear the wisdom of the renowned Solomon, was the prevailing ambition of the great men of that age.

Captivated with this desire the queen of Sheba came to Jerusalem, attended with a great retinue, and brought with her rich presents of gold, spices, and precious stones. Her purpose was, to try if Solomon's wisdom was answerable to the high commendations she had

^a As great a king as Solomon was, we find he turned merchant, and yet the imperial laws forbid noblemen to exercise trade and commerce, as a thing below them; and much less then (as Bodinus de Republica, b. 6. c. 2.) does it become a king. But we must not measure antiquity by our own times: what might be then commendable may now have a different appearance. But the same author is very right in one concession that he makes, namely, that though he would not have kings now to be merchants yet, if he might have his choice, "I had rather a prince should be a merchant," says he, "than a tyrant, and that noblemen should rather trade than oppress, and make a prey of their tenants.—Patrick's Commentary.

^b In 2 Chron. viii. 18, the number of talents brought home to Solomon, are said to be four hundred and fifty: but this is a matter that is easily resolved, if we will but suppose, that the charges of the voyage to and fro cost thirty talents; or that Solomon gave Hiram's servants, for conducting his fleet, thirty talents; or that in refining the whole mass of gold, the waste might be thirty talents; so that, though Solomon's fleet brought him home four hundred and fifty talents, yet by one or more of these deductions, there came clear to his coffers no more than four hundred and twenty.—Patrick's Commentary.

^c 1 Kings x. 22. Ellis, in Cook's last voyage, speaking of the people of Otaheite, says, "They expressed great surprise at the Spaniards, who had lately made them a visit, because they had not red feathers as well as the English, which they had brought with them in great plenty from the Friendly Isles, for they are with these people the summum bonum and extent of all their wishes." (Vol. 1. p. 129.) As these islands border so closely upon Asia, and have among their manners and customs many which bear a resemblance to those of the Asiatics, may not these people's high esteem for red feathers throw some light upon this passage, where we find peacocks ranked amongst the valuable commodities imported by Solomon.—Ed.

^d We never read of ivory till about Solomon's days, who perhaps brought elephants out of India, or at least took care to have a great deal of ivory imported from thence; for, in after ages, we read of ivory beds, and ivory palaces, &c. Cabinets and wardrobes were ornamented with ivory, by what is called marquetry; (Ps. xlv. 8.) these were named 'houses of ivory;' probably because made in the form of a house or palace; as the silver naoi of Diana, mentioned Acts xix. 24, were in the form of her temple at Ephesus; and as we have now ivory models of the Chinese pagodas or temples. At this time, however, ivory was every whit as precious as gold, and therefore we must not suppose, that this throne of Solomon's was entirely overlaid with gold, for then it might as well be made of wood, but only in particular places, that so the mixture of gold and ivory, which gave a lustre to each other, might make the throne look more beautiful. The like to this, the text says, 'there was not made in any kingdom,' (1 Kings x. 20.) and perhaps it was so in those days; but, in after ages, we read, that the throne of the Parthian kings was of gold, encompassed with four golden pillars, beset with precious stones; and that the Persian kings sat in judgment under a golden vine, and other trees of gold, the bunches of whose grapes were made of several sorts of precious stones.—Patrick's Commentary. To this article may be very properly annexed the following account of the famous peacock throne of the great Mogul:—"The great Mogul has seven thrones, some set all over with diamonds; others wth rubies, emeralds, and pearls. But the largest throne is erected in the hall of the first court of the palace; it is in form like one of our field beds, six feet long and four broad. I counted about a hundred and eight pale rubies in collets about that throne, the least whereof weighed a hundred carats; but there are some that weigh two hundred. Emeralds I counted about a hundred and forty, that weighed some threescore, some thirty carats. The under part of the canopy is entirely embroidered with pearls and diamonds, with a fringe of pearls round the edge. Upon the top of the canopy, which is made like an arch with four panes, stands a peacock, with his tail spread, consisting entirely of sapphires and other proper coloured stones; the body is of beaten gold, encased with numerous jewels; and a great ruby adorns his breast, to which hangs a pearl that weighs fifty carats. On each side of the peacock stands two nose-gays, as high as the bird, consisting of various sorts of flowers, all of beaten gold enamelled. When the king seats himself upon the throne, there is a transparent jewel, with a diamond appendant, of eighty or ninety carats weight, encompassed with rubies and emeralds, so suspended that it is always in his eye. The twelve pillars also that uphold the canopy are set round with rows of fair pearls, and of an excellent water, that weigh from six to ten carats apiece. At the distance of four feet, upon each side of the throne, are placed two umbrellas, the handles of which are about eight feet high, covered with diamonds, the umbrellas themselves being of crimson velvet, embroidered and fringed with pearl. This is the famous throne which Timur began and Shah Johan finished, and is really reported to have cost a hundred and sixty millions and five hundred thousand livres of our money." (Tavernier's Indian Travels, vol. iii. p. 331. edit. 1713.) Mr Morier, describing his interview with the king of Persia, says:—"He was seated on a species of throne, called the takht-e-taoo, or the throne of the peacock, which is raised three feet from the ground, and appears an oblong square of eight feet broad and twelve long. We could see the bust only of his majesty, as the rest of his body was hidden by an elevated railing, the upper work of the throne, at the corners of which were placed several ornaments of vases and toys. The back is much raised; on each side are two square pillars, on which are perched birds, probably intended for peacocks, studded with precious stones of every description, and holding each a ruby in their beaks. The highest part of the throne is composed of an oval ornament of jewellery; from which emanate a great number of diamond rays. Unfortunately we were so far distant from the throne, and so little favoured by the light, that we could not discover much of its general materials. We were told, however, that it is covered with gold plates, enriched by that fine enamel work so common in the ornamental furniture of Persia. It is said to have cost one hundred thousand tomanis.—Travels through Persia, p. 19. See also Forbes's Oriental Memoirs, vol. iii. p. 81.—Ed.

^e The provisions of Solomon's table, for one day, were thirty measures, which, according to the Hebrew word cor, as Goodwin has computed it, are six gallons, above an hundred and sixty-eight bushels of fine flour, and sixty of coarser flour for inferior servants, ten stall-fed oxen, twenty oxen out of the pastures, and an hundred sheep, besides harts, and roebucks, and fallow deer, and fatted fowl," or, as Bochart translates the word, "the choicest of all fatted things." (1 Kings iv. 22, 23.) and this, according to the calculation which some have made from the quantity of bread that was every day consumed, must make Solomon's family consist, at least, of forty or fifty thousand souls.—Calmet's Commentary.

heard of it; and therefore in discourse she proposed to him several enigmatical questions. But when she heard his clear and satisfactory solutions, she was not a little amazed at the profoundness of his judgment; and when she had seen the beauty, and worship of the temple, the magnificence of his court, and the sumptuousness of ^a his table and attendants, she was quite astonished, and frankly owned to him, that what herself had seen did far surpass any of the most extravagant reports she had ever yet heard of him: and so, having made him very ^b great and noble presents, and received others from him, that were not inconsiderable, she took her leave, and returned to her own country, highly pleased and satisfied with her visit.^c

Hitherto we have seen nothing in Solomon but what was truly great and wonderful; but the latter actions of his life so sadly tarnish and disgrace his character. For he gave himself up to the love of strange women, such as were descended from idolatrous nations, and, besides Pharaoh's daughter ^d mentioned before, married wives from among the Moabites, the Ammonites, the Hittites, the Idumeans, and the Sidonians. ^e Nay, so unbounded

^a Our excellent commentator, Bishop Patrick, tells us, that a very great man of our own, but is silent as to his name, has observed, that such things, as the difference of apparel, the order of sitting at table, and the attendance of Solomon's servants and ministers, were justly admired by the queen of Sheba, as an indication of his wisdom; "for they are the outworks," as he calls them, "which preserves majesty itself from approaches and surprisals; and whatsoever prince departs from these forms and trappings, and ornaments of his dignity, and pre-eminence, will hardly be able at some time, to preserve the body itself of majesty from intrusion, invasion, and violation."

^b After a very complimentary speech, in which Josephus makes this queen address king Solomon, among other valuable presents, recorded in Scripture, "they speak also," says he, "of a root of balsam, which she brought with her, which, according to a tradition we have, was the first plant of the kind that ever came into Judea, where it hath propagated so wonderfully ever since."—Jewish Antiquities, b. 8. c. 2.

^c 1 Kings x. 21. The magnificence of Solomon, particularly with respect to his drinking vessels, has not been exceeded by modern Eastern princes. The gold plate of the kings of Persia has been much celebrated, and is taken notice of by Chardin. He observes, that the plate of the king of Persia is of gold, and that very fine, exceeding the standard of ducats, and equal to those of Venice, which are of the purest gold. Shah Abas caused seven thousand two hundred marks of gold to be melted for this purpose. Now the two hundred targets of gold which Solomon made, weighed but little less than the drinking vessels which Shah Abas made. (1 Kings x. 16.) We may therefore believe that his royal drinking vessels were of equal, if not greater weight.—Harmer, vol. i. p. 384.—Ed.

^d Pharaoh's daughter is generally supposed to have been a proselyte to the Jewish religion, and therefore Solomon, in marrying her, incurred no fault; but, in marrying so many women besides, and those of a different religion, he committed two sins against the law; one in multiplying wives, and another, in marrying those of strange nations, who still retained their idolatry; and therefore the wise son of Sirach, amidst all the encomiums that he heaps upon Solomon, could not forget this heinous iniquity, and terrible flaw in his character. "Thou didst bow thy loins to women, and by thy body, thou wast brought into subjection. Thou didst stain thine honour, and pollute thy seed, so that thou broughtest wrath upon thy children, and wast grieved for thy folly." (Eccles. xviii. 19, 20.)—Patrick's Commentary.

^e 1 Kings xi. 3. It appears to have been the manner of eastern princes to have a great number of wives, merely for pomp and state. Father La Compe tells us in his History of China, (part 1. p. 62.) that there the emperor hath a great number of wives, chosen out of the prime beauties of the country. It is also said, that the great Mogul has as many wives as make up a thousand. Habesci (Present State of the Ottoman Empire, was his lust, that he had 700 wives, and 300 concubines, who conspired not a little to pervert his heart, and seduce him, in his old age, to the worship of their several idols.

Provoked at this his sad apostasy, God sent a prophet to upbraid him with his ingratitude, and to pronounce this heavy judgment upon him:—"That as he had revolted from his worship, so the major part of his kingdom should revolt from him, and put themselves under the government of one of his servants, though not in his days, yet in those of his immediate successor;" and, to make him sensible, that this judgment began already to operate, he raised up several enemies to the disturbance of his peace, which, as long as he continued in God's service, he enjoyed without interruption.

^f The first of these was Hadad of the blood-royal of Edom, who having fled from Joab, when he ravaged the country, and put the male children to death, escaped to Pharaoh king of Egypt, where he married his sister Tephneh; but, upon David's death, returned to his country, and recovered the kingdom. ^g The second was Rezon, who flying from his master Hadadezer king of Zobah, gathered together a great number of men, over whom he made himself captain, and with their assistance, seizing on Damascus, he there reigned as king of Syria, and confederated with Hadad to distress Solomon in the declining part of his reign. But ^h the most dan-

Sultan Selim had nearly 2000; Sultan Mahomet had but 300; Achmet the fourth has pretty near 1600. See also Knolles's History of the Turks, p. 1368, Hanway's History of the Revolutions of Persia, part 7. c. 31. p. 208.—Ed.

^f Hadad was a young prince of the royal family of Idumæa, who fled into Egypt when David conquered that country: for David, having obtained a signal victory under the conduct of Abishai, who, at that time, commanded in chief, sent Joab afterwards with an order to kill all the males that should be found in the land. But Hadad had escaped into Egypt, where, finding favour in the eyes of the king, he married his wife's sister, and there settled. But, after the death of David, he returned into Idumæa, and gave Solomon no small molestation. For, entering into a league with Rezon, a fugitive from his master Hadadezer king of Zobah, but who had now made himself king of some part of Syria, he, by his assistance, made so many inroads upon the land of Israel, that all things were in the utmost confusion, even before Solomon died; Calmet's Commentary,—and Josephus's Jewish Antiq. b. 8. c. 2.

^g When David made war against Hadadezer, Rezon, one of his generals, escaped from the field of battle, with the troops under his command; and having lived for a little while by plunder and robbery, at length seized on Damascus, and reigned there. But his reign was not long. For David took Damascus, as well as the other parts of Syria, and left it in subjection to his son Solomon, till God was pleased to suffer this Rezon to recover Damascus, and there re-establish himself, to the great disturbance of the latter part of Solomon's reign.—Calmet's Commentary.

^h As Solomon was engaged in several great buildings, he took care to set proper persons over the works, among whom Jeroboam was one, and the workmen under his command seem to be chiefly of the tribe of Ephraim. How he acquitted himself in this capacity, we are not told; but the pretence of his being angry with Solomon, and fomenting jealousies among the people, was the building of Millo. Millo was a deep valley, between the old Jerusalem and the city of David, part of which David filled up, and thereupon made both a fortress, and a place for the people to assemble. Another part of it Solomon filled up, to build a palace for his queen, the daughter of Pharaoh. The prodigious expence which this work cost, gave Jeroboam an opportunity to infuse a spirit of sedition into his brethren of the tribe of Ephraim; to complain heavily of hard labour they were forced to submit to, and the taxes they were obliged to pay; and to represent the gerous enemy of all was Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, a bold and enterprising man, whom Solomon had made overseer of his buildings, and who, for his great abilities, was the chief ruler in the house of Joseph, that is in the tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh. ^a The prophet Ahijah, as he was walking in the fields, happened to meet him; and, having acquainted him from God, that he had appointed him to be Solomon's successor in ten tribes out of twelve, and that, if he would adhere to his service, the government should be established in his family: as he was but ill affected to Solomon before, and now encouraged by the prophet's promises, he began to stir and solicit the people to a revolt. ^b The king having intelligence of this, was thinking to take him into custody; but he made his escape, and fled ^c unto Shishak king of Egypt, where he continued for the small remainder of Solomon's life, ^d who having reigned forty years, died whole thing as a work of vanity, merely to gratify a proud foreign woman, and a silly doating king; and, by these insinuations, he wrought in the people a disaffection to Solomon, and his government; Patrick's Commentary; and Cabnet's Dictionary, under the word Millo.

^a Ahijah was a native of Shiloh, and one of those who wrote the annals of king Solomon's reign, (2 Chron. ix. 29). He is thought to have been the person who spake twice to Solomon from God; once, while he was building the temple, at which time he promised him his protection, (1 Kings vi. 12.) and at another time, when he had fallen into all his irregularities, and God expressed his indignation against him in bitter threats and reproaches, (1 Kings xii. 6.) His prediction to Solomon, that he would one day be perverted by women; and that to Jeroboam, that heifers (meaning the two golden calves which he set up) would alienate him from the service of God, are both taken notice of by Epiphanius, in his Life and Death of the prophet.—Cabnet's Dictionary under the word Ahijah.

^b How Solomon came to know what was thus transacted between Ahijah and Jeroboam alone, is a question of no great difficulty: for perhaps the prophet made no scruple to report what he had delivered in the name of the Lord; perhaps Jeroboam himself, being puffed up with this assurance, could not contain, but told it to some of his confidants, who spread it abroad; or perhaps his servants, though they heard not the words that the prophet spake, yet, seeing him rend the garment into twelve parts, and give ten to him, might speak of this strange and unaccountable action, which Solomon, as soon as he came to hear of it, might easily understand, because the same prophet, very likely had told him but just before, that the kingdom should be rent from him, and given to his servant (1 Kings xiv. 8).—Patrick's Commentary.

^c All the kings of Egypt, from the time of Abraham, are in the sacred history, called by the name of Pharaoh, unless Rameses, that is mentioned in Gen. xlvii. 11, be the name of a king, not a country; so that this is the first we meet with, called by his proper name from the rest of the Pharaohs. Who this Egyptian prince was, the learned are not agreed. The opinion is pretty general, that it was the famous Sesostris, mentioned in Herodotus, and of whom we have spoken before; but his life could hardly be extended to this period. Our great Usher sets him a vast way backward, even to the time of the Israelites' peregrination, and some chronologers carry it farther: but, be that as it will, it is very probable, that the prince had taken some offence at Solomon, otherwise he would hardly have harboured such seditious refugees as Jeroboam was.—Patrick's and Le Clerc's Commentaries.

^d Josephus indeed tells us, (Antiq. b. S. c. 3.) that Solomon lived to a great age, that he reigned eighty years, and died at ninety-four; but this is a manifest error in that historian, which our saying, that the Scriptures give us only an account of Solomon while he continued in a state of piety, but that Josephus's computation takes in the whole of his life, is a poor and forced way of reconciling. The authority of Josephus must never be put in balance with that of the holy Scriptures, from whence may be learned that Solomon lived to the age of fifty-eight, or thereabout; because we may very well presume, that his immoderate about the fifty-eighth year of his age; was buried in the city of David; and was succeeded by his son ^e Rehoboam.

Rehoboam, as soon as his father was dead, went to ^f Shechem, where all the chief of the people were met together to proclaim him king; but as the nation had been burdened with some heavy taxes during his father's reign, before they would agree to recognise him, they ^g desired a redress of their grievances, and in hopes of awing him into a compliance, sent for Jeroboam out of Egypt to appear at the head of the assembly.

pursuit of sensual pleasures both shortened his life, and left an eternal stain upon his memory: otherwise the character, which the author of Ecclesiasticus gives of this prince, is very beautiful:—'Solomon reigned in a peaceable time, and was honoured; for God made all quiet round about him, that he might build an house in his name, and prepare his sanctuary for ever. How wise wast thou in thy youth, and as a flood filled with understanding! Thy soul covered the whole earth, and thou fillest it with dark parables. Thy name went far into the islands, and for thy peace thou wast beloved. The countries marvelled at thee for thy songs, and proverbs, and parables, and interpretations. By the name of the Lord, which is called the Lord God of Israel, thou didst gather gold as tin, and didst multiply silver as lead; but thou didst bow thy loins unto women,' &c.—Eccles. xlvii. 13, &c.

^e Notwithstanding the vast multitude of wives that Solomon had, the Scriptures make mention of no more than three children, this son, and two daughters, that are spoken of 1 Kings vi. 11, 15. and, what is strange, in the beginning of his story, it takes no notice as usually it does, of his mother's nation, or family, though in the conclusion of it, (1 Kings xiv. 21—31,) it twice reminds us, that she was an Ammonites by birth, and that her name was Naamah. Rehoboam was born in the first year of his father's reign, and was therefore much about forty-one when he entered upon the government; but he was an unskilful and imprudent man, and therefore made a very false step at his first accession to the throne. The author of Ecclesiasticus gives us no advantageous character of him, when he terms him 'A man void of understanding, who turned the people away with his counsel,' (ch. xlvii. 23.) Nay, his own son makes but a faint apology for him, when he tells the people, that he was 'young' (young in understanding,) 'and tender hearted, and could not withstand his enemies,' (2 Chron. xiii. 7.) and therefore some have imagined, that his father Solomon had him in his thoughts, when he said, in his Preacher, 'I hated all my labour, which I had taken under the sun, because I was to leave it to a man that should come after me; and who knoweth whether he shall be a wise man, or a fool; yet shall he have rule over all my labour, wherein I have laboured; this also is vanity,' ch. ii. 18, 19.—Cabnet's and Patrick's Commentaries.

^f This city stood not only in the centre of the kingdom of Israel, but in the middle of the tribe of Ephraim, wherein there was the greatest number of malcontents. It was therefore very probably by the management of Jeroboam, or some of his friends, who durst not perhaps venture themselves at Jerusalem, that this city was made choice of for the place of a general convention, because they might more securely propose their grievances, which they were resolved to do, and use a greater freedom of speech than they could at Jerusalem, where the family of David was more powerful, more numerous, and better supported.—Cabnet's Commentary; and Pool's Annotations.

^g What the particular grievances were that these people desired to have redressed, we may gather from 1 Kings iv. 7, &c., namely, the tribute Solomon exacted for his buildings, the expenses of his family, and the maintenance of his chariots and horses, which being for the honour of the nation, ought to have been borne more contentedly by a people enjoying such a large share of peace and plenty, and from a prince who had brought in such vast riches to his subjects, as made silver to be of no value at all in his days, (ch. x. 21.) but people are more sensible of their pressures than of their enjoyments, and feel the least burdens when they are most at ease. It is observable, however, that among all their complaints, they take no notice of Solomon's idolatry, or the strange worship which he had introduced, though this, one would think, should have been reckoned among the greatest of their grievances.—Patrick's Commentary.

The people accordingly presented their address; but instead of a gracious answer, which his father's old counsellors by all means advised, as the only way to engage them to his interest for ever, some ^a young politicians, that had been ^b brought up with him, were of a contrary opinion, namely, that such concessions would look like fear and pusillanimity; that hard words would frighten them into obedience; and that, instead of redressing, his business was to tell them, that he intended to increase their grievances. This counsel Rehoboam had the imprudence to follow; which so disgusted the people, that they threw off all allegiance, and declared for another king. When Rehoboam came to understand this, he ^c sent Adoram his collector, to appease them, and probably to assure them that their taxes should be abated; but this pacification came too late. Their passions were so exasperated, that they fell upon the collector, and stoned him to death, without so much as once hearing what he had to say. Rehoboam seeing this, thought it high time to consult his own safety, by ^d hastening to his chariot, and fleeing to Jerusalem;

^a They were not so young, but they might have known better; for as Rehoboam was one and forty years old when he entered upon his kingdom, so these gentlemen having been brought up with him, must have been much about the same age; but they were raw and unexperienced, and unacquainted with the humours of the people; and therefore they gave the king such unseasonable advice.—Patrick's Commentary. [Houbigant, however, thinks he was but sixteen years old when he began to reign; and brings many forcible arguments to prove that the number, forty-one, must be a mistake. Capellus was the first who notified the number forty-one as an error. Boothroyd follows Houbigant in adopting the reading of the Greek appendix to 1 Kings xii., and observes, Rehoboam is said to have been young on his accession: if he had been forty-one, Solomon must have been married before his father's death, and married to an Ammonitess before he took Pharaoh's daughter, which is contrary to the narrative. Compare 2 Chron. x. 8. and xiii. 7. Dr A. Clarke also coincides in this reading. And we may add, if Solomon is allowed to refer to his own son in Eccles. ii. 18, 19, 'Yea I hated all my labour which I had taken under the sun; because I should leave it unto the man that shall be after me. And who knoweth whether he shall be a wise man or a fool? yet he shall have rule over all my labour wherein I have laboured.' Then the conclusion is, that Rehoboam was still a youth, and had not arrived at that age when it could be known whether he would prove a wise man or a fool, and this work is generally admitted to have been penned only a short time before Solomon's death.]—E.D.

^b It was a common custom among the kings of the east, to have their sons educated among other young lords that were of the same age, which, as it created a generous spirit of emulation, and both endeared the prince to the nobles and the nobles to the prince, could not but tend greatly to the benefit of the public. Sesostrius, the most famous prince that ever Egypt produced, is said to have been educated in this way. And by the gallant youths that were his cotemporaries and fellow pupils, it was, that he afterwards did so many surprising actions. The same custom was in use among the Persians, as we may learn from the life of Cyrus; and of Alexander the Great we are told, that his father Philip had him trained up in his youth, among those young noblemen who became his great captains in the conquest of all Asia. So that Solomon's method and design, in the education of his son, was wise and well concerted, though it failed of success.—Calmet's Commentary.

^c It was certainly a piece of great imprudence to send any one to treat with them, when they were so highly exasperated; but to send him that was an obnoxious man, as having the principal care of the very tributes they complained of, was downright infatuation; because nothing is so natural, as to hate those that are the instruments of our oppression, or any ways employed in it.—Patrick's Commentary.

^d This is the first time that we read of a king's riding in a chariot. Saul, David, and Solomon, rode in none; but after the

by which means he secured the two tribes of Judah and Benjamin; but all the rest of the Israelites made choice of Jeroboam. And thus was this great and goodly kingdom, almost in its infancy, split into two parts; and, for ever afterwards, went under different denominations, the kingdom of Judah, and the kingdom of Israel, though the latter included the whole before.

As soon as Rehoboam was got safe to Jerusalem, he began to meditate revenge for the affront put upon himself in the person of Adoram his collector; and therefore, to reduce the rebel tribes by force of arms, he put himself at the head of an hundred and eighty thousand chosen troops of the two tribes, which continued faithful to him. But while they were on their march, the ^e prophet Shemaiah, by the direction of God, advised them to desist and return every one to his own home; because by the divine will and pleasure it was, that this division of the kingdom came to pass. Hereupon all the army, with Rehoboam's consent, was disbanded; and he, to secure the dominions that were left him, repaired and fortified fifteen frontier towns; built several strongholds in the heart of his country; furnished them with good garrisons and provisions; and erected magazines in several cities, out of which the soldiers might, on all occasions, be supplied with arms.

Jeroboam, on the other hand, was not idle, but enlarged and beautified Shechem, and made it a royal city. After he had resided there for some time, he went to the other side of Jordan, and repaired Penuel, which was anciently a fortified place, and there resided likewise, in hopes of gaining the affections of the two tribes and a half. Amidst all these endeavours to settle himself firm on the throne, there was one thing he thought he had reason to apprehend, namely, that his subjects might return to their allegiance to the house of David, in case they were permitted to go up, thrice every year, as the law directed, to worship at Jerusalem; he therefore made a bold alteration in religion, and set up two golden calves, with altars belonging to them, the one in Bethel which was the most southern, and the other in Dan, which was the most northern part of the country, the better to suit the conveniency of all their votaries. The regular priests, however, would not comply with him in these idolatries, and therefore he inhibited them the exercise of their own religion, banished them his kingdom, seized on their possessions, and appointed ^f any, division of the kingdom, mention is frequently made of the use of them, both by the kings of Judah and Israel.—Patrick's Commentary.

^e This prophet was very well known in the reign of Rehoboam: he is supposed to have wrote the annals of that prince; and of what authority he was in Judah, we may gather from this passage, where he is said to have prevailed with the king, and an hundred and fourscore thousand men, to lay down their arms, and return home, merely by declaring, that the division which had happened was by the order and appointment of God.—Calmet's Commentary.

^f The Hebrew words Miketzoth Haam, do properly signify out of all the people, and not the lowest of the people. This exposition Bochart has justified by a great many examples of the uses of these words in other places: so that their meaning must be, not that Jeroboam employed the refuse of the people only, but that he employed any, though they were not of the tribe of Levi, though they had no previous qualifications to recommend them to officiate as priests about his idols. To employ the meanest of the people only in this office, had been bad policy, and exposing his new institution to contempt; but to admit any that who was so minded, to officiate about these new erected idols: by which means a great accession of strength accrued to Rehoboam's party; for the priests that were banished resorted all to Jerusalem, and as many of the other tribes as had any regard to the true worship of God, followed them.

To give the better countenance to his new-invented religion, Jeroboam himself was accustomed sometimes to officiate; and therefore, on a ^a solemn feast, which he had appointed at Bethel, as he stood by the altar for that purpose, a certain ^b prophet, who came from Judah, foretold him, that that very altar which he had erected, should one day be polluted, and destroyed by a child, born of the house of David, ^c whose name, in future offered themselves of what rank or quality soever; to lay open the priesthood, and destroy the needless distinction of men and things, as the modern phrase is, this had in it the air of free-thinking, and must therefore be a very grateful thing, and ingratiate himself, no doubt with the people.—Patrick's Commentary.

^a As the Jews had their feast of tabernacles on the fifteenth day of the seventh month, so Jeroboam had a feast on the fifteenth day of the eighth month, which he instituted of his own accord. Some suppose indeed, that as this feast was appointed by God to be observed after the gathering in of the fruits, which might be sooner ripe in Jerusalem than in the northern parts of the country, so Jeroboam might pretend, that the eighth would be a better time for it than the seventh, because then he might have this farther design in the alteration of this month, namely, that the people of Judah, when their own feast was over a month before at Jerusalem, might have an opportunity to come to his, if their curiosity led them. But the plain case is, that he did every thing he could in opposition to the established religion, and his chief intention was to alienate the people from Jerusalem.—Bedford's Scripture Chronology, b. 6. c. 2.

^b Who this prophet was, commentators are not agreed. The Jews would generally have it to have been Iddo; but unless we may suppose that what is here related fell out in the latter end of Jeroboam's reign, Iddo could not be the person; because Iddo was alive in the days of Ahijah, son of Rehoboam, whereas the prophet here spoken of, died, in a manner, as soon as he had delivered his prophecy. Others therefore have thought, that this prophet who came to rebuke Jeroboam was Ahijah, the same who had foretold him of his exaltation to the crown of Israel: but besides that Ahijah was alive after the time that this prophet was slain, Ahijah was certainly a native of Shiloh, and lived in Shiloh, which is in the tribe of Ephraim, and part of Jeroboam's dominions; whereas it is expressly said of this prophet, that he came from Judah: so that there is no foundation, so much as for a conjecture, what the name of this man of God was.—Patrick's and Calnet's Commentaries.

^c This is one of the most remarkable prophecies that we have in sacred writ. It foretells an action that exactly came to pass above three hundred and forty years afterwards. It describes the circumstances of the action, and specifies the very name of the person that was to do it; and therefore every Jew, who lived in the time of its accomplishment, must have been convinced of the divine authority of a religion founded upon such prophecies as this; since none but God could foresee, and consequently none but God could foretell events at such a distance.—Le Clerc's and Calnet's Commentaries. The Jews on whose behalf this prophecy was delivered, would guard it most sacredly; and it was the interest of the Israelites, against whom it was levelled, to impugn its authenticity, and expose its falsehood, had this been possible. This prediction not only showed the knowledge, but also the power of God. He gave, as it were, this warning to idolatry, that it might be on its guard and defend itself against this Josiah, whenever a person of that name should be found sitting on the throne of David; and no doubt it was on the alert, and took all prudent measures for its own defence: but all in vain, for Josiah in the eighteenth year of his reign, literally accomplished this prophecy, as we may read, 2 Kings xxiii. 15—20. And from this latter place we find that the prophecy had three permanent testimonials of its truth. 1. The house of Israel; 2.

ages, should be Josias; and for the proof of the truth of his prediction, he added, that immediately it should be split. Incensed at this freedom of speech, Jeroboam stretched out his hand, and called to those that stood by, to seize the prophet; but as he stretched it out, his arm grew so stiff, that he could not pull it back again, and the altar, being split asunder, let the fire, and the ashes that were thereon, fall to the ground.

Jeroboam by this means was sensibly convinced of his impiety, and entreated the prophet to intercede with God for the restoration of his hand. The prophet in this particular complied with his request; but when the king desired his company to dine with him, on purpose to make him a recompense for his miraculous cure, he declined the invitation, upon account of a positive divine injunction, that he should make no stay in the place, not so much as to eat or drink in it, or ^d return by the same way.

In the town of Bethel there lived an old prophet, who, when his sons came and told him what the man of God from Judah had done, ^e what had passed between him and the king, and what way he had taken in his return home, went in pursuit of him; and under the pretence of a fresh revelation which he had had, countermanning the injunction which the other thought himself under, invited him to his house. ^f After some small demur the ^d Why this prophet was forbid to eat or drink with the people of Bethel, the reason is obvious, because he was to have no familiarity with idolaters; but why he should not 'return by the same way that he went,' is not so very evident. There is a passage in Isaiah concerning Sennacherib, which helps, as some think, to elucidate this matter, where God tells him, that 'he would turn him back by the same way that he came.' (Isaiah xxxvii. 29, 34.) that is, he should return home without doing any thing: all his threats, and all his great projects should have no effect against Jerusalem. And in like manner, when God commanded the prophet not to return by the same way, it was as much as if he had said, 'See that thou be constant, and steadfast in executing the charge committed to thee; let nothing hinder or divert thee, but take abundant care, that thou do thy business effectually.' But this construction is a little too much strained; nor can I see, why we may not say, that God enjoined his prophet not to return by the same way, lest Jeroboam, or any other of the inhabitants of Bethel, either to satisfy their curiosity upon an occasion so uncommon, or to do him some mischief for his severe denunciations against their altar and way of worship, might send men after him to bring him back.—Calnet's and Le Clerc's Commentaries.

^e By this it appears, that these sons of the old prophet were present when Jeroboam stood at the altar, and therefore joined in that idolatrous worship, though their father did not, and yet was too timorous to reprove it.—Patrick's Commentary.

^f In 1 Kings xiii. 20, it is said that the word of the Lord came unto the prophet that brought him back. "A great clamour," says Dr Kennicott, "has been raised against this part of the history, on account of God's denouncing sentence on the true prophet, by the mouth of the false prophet: but if we examine with attention the original words here, they will be found to signify either, he who brought him back; or, whom he had brought back; for the very same words, אשר השיבו asher heshibo, occur again in verse 23, where they are translated, whom he had brought back; and where they cannot be translated otherwise. This being the case, we are at liberty to consider the word of the Lord as delivered to the true prophet thus brought back; and then the sentence is pronounced by God himself, calling to him out of heaven, as in Gen. xxii. 11. And that this doom was thus young prophet believed him, went with him, sat down to meat, and refreshed himself; but in his return, he paid dear for his disobedience; ^a for ^b a lion met him and slew him, but when it had so done, it neither tore his body, nor meddled with his ass; which, when the old prophet understood, he took, and buried him in his own sepulchre, and gave his children in charge, that whenever he died, they should lay him in a place contiguous to this prophet; because he was confident, that whatever he foretold concerning the altar of Bethel, and ^c that form of idolatry, which Jeroboam had set up, would most certainly come to pass.

Not long after this, Abijah, the son of Jeroboam, a young ^d prince of promising hopes, fell sick: whereupon Jeroboam prevailed ^e with his queen to disguise herself pronounced by God, and not by the false prophet, we are assured in verse 26. 'The Lord hath delivered him unto the lion, according to the word of the Lord, which he spake unto him.' Josephus expressly asserts that the sentence was declared by God to the true prophet. The Arabic asserts the same.—Ed.

The Athenians put their ambassadors to death, whom they had sent into Arcadia, though they had faithfully performed their business, because they came another way than that which had been prescribed to them.—Ælian, Var. Hist. b. vi. c. 5.—Ed.

^b Not far from Bethel there was a wood, out of which the two she-bears came that destroyed two and forty children, for mocking the prophet Elisha, (2 Kings ii. 24.) And it is not unlikely that out of the same wood came the lion which slew this prophet.—Patrick's Commentary.

^c There is something particular in the expressions of the text: 'The saying, which he cried by the word of God against the altar of the Lord, against the altar of Bethel, and against all the houses of the high places, which are in the cities of Samaria, shall surely come to pass,' (1 Kings xiii. 32.) But how can they be called the cities of Samaria, when Samaria itself was not now built, nor had the separate kingdom of Jeroboam as yet obtained that name? But this only shows that the author or compiler of these books of Kings, whether it was Ezra or Jeremiah, lived long after the time of Jeroboam, and writes of things and places as they were in his own days. He knew full well, that Samaria was built by Omri, fifty years after Jeroboam, since himself had given the account of its foundation; but he was minded to speak in the phrase then current, and to make himself intelligible to those that read him; and for this reason no doubt it is, that in 2 Kings xxiii. 18, the false prophet of Bethel is said to have come from Samaria, though at that time there was no city of that name.—Calmet's Commentary.

^d In 1 Kings xiv. 13, it is said, that 'in him there was found some good thing towards the Lord God of Israel;' from whence the Jewish doctors have devised the story, that he broke down an hedge (it had better been a wall, I should think) which his father had made, to keep people from going up to Jerusalem at the three great feasts. But however this be, we may be permitted fairly to infer thus much from the words:—That he was the only person in the family who expressed a dislike of the worshipping of calves, an inclination and intention to abolish it, whenever he should come into power, and to permit, if not oblige his subjects to go up to Jerusalem, to worship according as the law prescribed.—Pool's Annotations.

^e Jeroboam might be for having his wife go to consult the prophet at Shiloh, because this was a secret not to be intrusted with any body else; a secret which had it been divulged, might have endangered his whole government; because, if once his subjects came to understand, that he himself had no confidence in the calves which he had set up, but in any matter of importance had recourse to the true worshippers of God, it is not to be imagined that an inducement this would have been for them to forsake these senseless idols, and to return to the worship of the God of Israel, whom they imprudently had forsaken. The queen then was the only person he could have confidence in. As a mother, he knew, that she would be diligent in her inquiry; and, as a wife, faithful in her report; but there were sundry reasons why in the dress of an ordinary woman; to go to the prophet Ahijah, who was then at Shiloh; and to inquire concerning the fate of the child. The prophet, at that time was blind; and therefore they thought that they might very easily impose upon him: but before the queen came, God had discovered the whole matter to him; and therefore as soon as she entered the door, he called her by her name, and then delivered the message which God had directed him to do. f Therein he unbraided Jeroboam he might desire her to disguise herself. For though Shiloh, lay within the confines of Ephraim, yet there is sufficient ground to think, that it was subject to the house of David, and belonged to the kingdom of Judah. It was certainly nearer Jerusalem than Shechem, which Rehoboam had lately fortified, and made his place of residence: and therefore Jeroboam thought it not safe to venture his queen, in a place that was under his rival's government, without her putting on some disguise. He knew too, that the prophet Ahijah was greatly offended at him, for the gross idolatry he had introduced; and therefore he thought, as justly he might, that, if the prophet perceived her to be his wife, he would either tell her nothing, or make things much worse than they were. The only way, therefore, to come at the truth, was (as he thought) to do what he did; but herein appears his infatuation, that he should not think the person, whom he held capable of resolving him in the fate of his son, able to see through this guile and disguise.—Calmet's Commentary, and Pool's Annotations.

f It is mentioned in the text, that Jeroboam's wife carried with her a present to the prophet, and we learn from several passages of Scripture, that it was customary on consulting a prophet, to present him with a gift generally consisting of some kind of provisions, which the condition of that class of persons might render more acceptable than any money or other kind of present. What the wife of Jeroboam carried was certainly unsuitable to the dignity and resources of a queen, and had she gone openly in that character, her present would in all probability have been rejected. Instances of presents not being accepted, when they are considered inferior to what the rank and ability of the offerer could have produced, are mentioned by many travellers. An ambassador at the court of Persia, once abruptly took leave, on the ground that he had been insulted by the trifling presents the Schah had given him; in consequence of which the royal presents were ordered to be set down in a catalogue, alongside of those of the ambassador; each article was rated at an extravagant value, and the whole was made to be worth double the money of the ambassador; but he, conscious of the imposition, refused to accept it, as unworthy of the rank of a king. Lander, too, mentions an African from whom he had expected to obtain important service to the cause of his mission, but was unexpectedly and grievously disappointed, to find that the sable monarch gave him a very cold reception. The reason was, that the king had been persuaded by some of his attendants, that the present of Lander was far inferior to what Captain Clapperton had made him a few years before, and, therefore, sending notice to the traveller that he considered his gift below the character of one who was in the service of the king of Britain, refused to see him. Had the wife of Jeroboam then gone to the prophet with the present she had selected, there is every reason to conclude, that its trifling nature would have led to its rejection; but it must be remembered that she went to Ahijah personating a country woman, and that nothing could be more suitable to such a character than the articles of which her present consisted. Few and simple as they appear to be, they were very nearly the same as those which D'Arvieux received from the mother and sister of an Arab Emir, whom he visited, and from whom he received, early in the morning after his arrival in their camp, a present of pastry, honey, fresh butter, with a basin of sweet meats of Damascus. Whatever the origin of the custom which authorized that the presents made to prophets should consist always of provisions for their table, it is evident, from the experience of D'Arvieux, that the present made to Ahijah by the wife of Jeroboam, was quite in unison with the character she had assumed, and, although presents have frequently been refused in the east, on account of their value being disproportionate to the ability of the donor, no objection could have been found on this account to the present of Jeroboam's queen, had not her real condition been supernaturally with ingratitude to God, who had made him king; charged him with impiety and apostasy, in setting up images for the objects of religious worship; foretold the expiration of his race, ^a and the death of the child then sick; threatened sore judgments to the people of Israel, for their conforming to the idolatry which had begun, and, with this doleful message, he sent her away, who as soon as she entered the palace door, according to the prophet's prediction, found the child dying. But all these judgments and miraculous events wrought no reformation in wicked Jeroboam.

Nor was his rival Rehoboam king of Judah, much better. He, for three years indeed, kept up the true worship of God at Jerusalem, but it was more out of a principle of state policy than of true religion. For, when the time of Jeroboam's subjects coming over to him upon that account was at an end, he threw off the mask, and discovered his inclination to idolatry. And as his example was followed by his subjects, they soon exceeded all that went before them. For they not only set up images and groves upon every hill, and under every green tree, but to add to their gross impiety, introduced the detestable ^b sin of Sodom, and all the other wickednesses that the ancient Canaanites were expelled for.

Under these provocations it was not long before God sent against them Shishak, king of Egypt, who, in the fifth year of Rehoboam, ^c invaded his dominions with a

^a 1 Kings xiv. 10. Sometimes, when a successful prince has endeavoured to extirpate the preceding royal family, some of them have escaped the slaughter, and secured themselves in a fortress, or place of secrecy, while others have sought an asylum in foreign countries, from whence they have occasioned great anxiety to the usurper. The word, shut up, strictly speaking, refers to the first of these cases; as in the preservation of Joash from Athaliah, in a private apartment of the temple, (2 Kings xi.) Such appears also to have been the case in more modern times. "Though more than thirty years had elapsed since the death of Sultan Ahmet, father of the new emperor, he had not in that interval, acquired any great information or improvement. Shut up, during this long interval, in the apartments assigned him, with some eunuchs to wait on him, and women to amuse him, the equality of his age with that of the princes who had a right to precede, allowed him but little hope of reigning in his turn; and he had besides, well grounded reasons for a more serious uneasiness." (Baron Du Tott, vol. i. p. 115.) But when David was in danger, he kept himself close, (1 Chron. xii. 1.) in Ziklag, but not so as to prevent him from making frequent excursions. In later times, in the east, persons of royal descent have been left, when the rest of a family have been cut off, if no danger was apprehended from them, on account of some mental or bodily disqualification. Blindness saved the life of Mohammed Khodabende, a Persian prince of the sixteenth century, when his brother Ismael put all the rest of his brethren to death. (D'Herbelot, p. 613.) This explanation will enable us more clearly to understand 2 Kings xiv. 26; Deut. xxxii. 36.—Harmer, vol. iv. p. 211.—Ed.

^b There are several passages in Scripture, such as 1 Kings xv. 12. 2 Kings xxii. 7. Rom. i. 26, 27, &c., from whence it appears that this kind of wickedness did frequently attend idolatry. Among the heathen, the most filthy things were committed in their groves, those places of darkness and obscurity, by the worshippers of Venus, Bacchus, and Priapus; and when the Israelites fell into the same religion, they must, of course, have fallen into the same practices; because, whatever they did of this kind was done in devotion, and honour to their gods, who, as they imagined, were highly delighted with such obscenities.—Patrick's Commentary.

^c It may seem something strange, that Shishak, who was so nearly allied to Rehoboam, should come up against him, and very numerous army; and, having ravaged the country, taken most of the fortified places, and entered Jerusalem without opposition, plundered the temple and palace of their rich furniture and moveables, he took away all the money that was found in the king's treasure, and the treasure of the sanctuary, and, at the same time, carried off the golden shields which Solomon had made; in the room of which, Rehoboam, by this depredation, was reduced so low, that he ^d was forced to make brazen ones, for the use and ornament of his guards.

We have little or nothing more recorded of Rehoboam, but that he reigned twelve years after this conquest and devastation by Shishak; that he had eighteen wives, and threescore concubines, and by them eight and twenty sons, and threescore daughters; that most of these sons who were grown to maturity in his lifetime, he made governors in the chief of the fenced cities in his kingdom; that he appointed Abijah, who was the eldest by his favourite wife ^e Maachah, to succeed him in his throne, and, ^f after a continued war with his rival Jeroboam, died in the fifty-eighth year of his age, and in the take his royal city: but Rehoboam, we must remember, was not the son of Pharaoh's daughter, and therefore no relation to Shishak. But, even had he been never so nearly related, as kingdoms, we know, never marry, so it is likely that Jeroboam, who had lived long in Egypt, stirred him up to invade his rival, that thereby he might establish himself in this new kingdom: and for this reason it was, that, when the armies of Egypt had taken the fenced cities of Judah, they returned, without giving Jeroboam or his dominions any the least disturbance.—Patrick's Commentary.

^d This shows to what low condition the kingdom of Judah was reduced. These shields were a matter of state and grandeur; and therefore it concerned them, if they were able, to have them of the same value that they were before. And, as they were carried before the king to the house of the Lord, it seemed likewise to be a matter of religion, that their value should not be diminished. Now in making these three hundred shields we are told, that three pounds of gold went to one shield, (1 Kings x. 17.) This, at four pounds per ounce, or forty-eight pounds sterling to the pound, amounts to no more than £432,000, and therefore it was a miserable case, that they were reduced from so much wealth to so much poverty, that neither reasons of state, nor religion, could raise so small a sum on so great an occasion.—Bedford's Scripture Chronology, b. 6, c. 2.

^e 1 Kings xv. 2. It has been conjectured by Mr Taylor, that the phrase "and his mother's name was," &c., when expressed on a king's accession to the throne, at the beginning of his history, does not always refer to his natural mother, but that it is a title of honour and dignity, enjoyed by one of the royal family, denoting her to be the first in rank. This idea appears well founded from the following extracts. "The olo kani is not governess of the Crimea. This title, the literal translation of which is, great queen, simply denotes a dignity in the harem, which the klan usually confers on one of his sisters; or if he has none, on one of his daughters, or relations. To this dignity are attached the revenues arising from several villages, and other rights." (Baron Du Tott, vol. ii, p. 64.) "On this occasion the king crowned his mother Malacotawit, conferring upon her the dignity and title of iteghe, that is, as king's mother, regent and governess of the king when under age."—Bruce's Travels, vol. ii. p. 581. Fragments to Cabinet.—Ed.

^f But how does this agree with what we read in 1 Kings xii. 23, &c., namely, that God commanded Rehoboam, and his people, not to fight against the Israelites, and they obeyed? Very well, if we will but observe, that though the Jews were commanded not to make war upon the Israelites, yet they were not commanded not to defend themselves, in case the Israelites should make war upon them; and, considering that they were now become two rival nations, they might, upon the borders, be continually endeavouring to gain ground upon each other, and so run into frequent acts of hostility, without ever once engaging in a pitched battle.—Patrick's Commentary.

seventeenth year of his reign, and was buried in the city of David.

^a Abijah, who succeeded his father in the kingdom of Judah, in the eighteenth year of Jeroboam king of Israel, was a prince of an active and martial spirit; and therefore resolving to put an end to the long dispute between the two kingdoms of Judah and Israel, he raised an army of four hundred thousand men, while Jeroboam, whose territories were of larger extent, had got together one of eight hundred thousand. This notwithstanding, Abijah determined to give him battle; but, before they came to the onset, he thought it not improper to get upon an eminence, and ^b to expostulate with the Israelitish army the injustice of their cause in revolting from his father Rehoboam; the right he claimed on his side, since God had given the whole kingdom to David, and his sons for ever; and the reasonable expectance he had of the divine assistance in what he was going about, since the religion of Jeroboam was false and idolatrous, whereas he, and the men of Judah, had the pure worship of the living God, his temple, and his ordinances, among them.

Jeroboam was no wise solicitous to answer him in those points; but while he continued speaking, ordered a detachment to march round, and intercept his retreat: which when the men of Judah perceived, they addressed themselves to God in prayer for success, and, while the priests blew the trumpets, the soldiers gave a great shout, and charged the Israelites so vigorously, that they soon gave way, and as the enemy gave no quarter lost, in the whole action, no less than five hundred thousand men, the greatest slaughter that ever was heard of. ^c

^a Dr Kennicott observes that the name of this king of Judah is expressed three ways; in 1 Kings xiv. and four other places it is Abijam or Abia; in two others it is Abihu; but in eleven other places it is Abiah, as it is expressed by St Matthew (i. 7.) Ἰεροβοὰμ ὁ ἐγενήθη πῶν Ἀβιά; and this is the reading of thirteen respectable editions of the Hebrew bible. The Syriac is the same. The Septuagint in the London Polyglot has Ἀβιά, Abihu, but in the Complutensian and Antwerp Polyglot it is Ἀβιά, Abiah. Though the common printed Vulgate has Abiam, yet the Editio Princeps of the Vulgate, some MSS., and the text in the Complutensian and Antwerp Polyglot, have Abia; which without doubt is the reading that should in all cases be followed.—Ed.

^b None of the great captains and commanders, whose speeches are recorded in heathen authors, ever expressed themselves more movingly than this king of Judah did. But some have found fault with him for speaking not so honourably of his father's military skill and courage, which he might as well have omitted, because, allowing it to be true, he seems to have served no purpose in mentioning it. But this notwithstanding, the speech is very lively, and excellently well calculated to cause a revolt in Jeroboam's army.—Patrick's Commentary. See the speech at large in 2 Chron. xiii. 4, &c.

^c The numbers here given from 2 Chron. xiii. 3, 17, seem almost incredible. It is very possible that there is a cipher too much in all these numbers, and that they should stand thus: Abijah's army, 40,000; Jeroboam's 80,000; slain 50,000. Calmet, who defends the common reading, allows that the Venice edition of the Vulgate, in 1478; another in 1489; that of Nuremberg in 1521; that of Basil, by Froben, in 1538; that of Robert Stevens, in 1516; and many others, have the smaller numbers. Dr Kennicott says: "On a particular collation of the Vulgate version, it appears that the number of chosen men here slain, which Pope Clement's edition in 1592, determined to be 500,000, the edition of Pope Sixtus, printed two years before, determined to be only 50,000; and the two preceding numbers in the edition of Sixtus, are 40,000, and 80,000. As to different printed editions, out of fifty-two from the year 1462 to

This victory Abijah took care to improve by pursuing Jeroboam, and taking from him so many strong cities, among which Bethel, where one of the golden calves had lately been set up, was one, that he was never thenceforward able to make head against his adversary, who by this, and some other successful achievements, grew great and powerful. But his reign was but short: he reigned not quite three years, before he died, and was buried in the city of David; and the reason that some have assigned for God's thus shortening of his days, was his not destroying of idolatry, when, by taking of Bethel, he had it in his power. For, however he might plead his possession of the temple and priesthood, to make his argument good against Jeroboam; yet the character which the sacred historian gives him, is ¹ 'that he walked in all the sins of his father; nor was his heart perfect with the Lord his God, as the heart of his great grandfather David.'

Asa, however, who in the twentieth year of Jeroboam king of Israel, succeeded his father in the throne of Judah,

1592, thirty-one contain the less number. And out of fifty-one MSS., twenty-three in the Bodleian library, four in that of Dean Aldrich, and two in that of Exeter College, contain the less number, or else are corrupted irregularly, varying only in one or two numbers.⁷

This examination was made by Dr Kennicott before he had finished his collation of Hebrew MSS., and before De Rossi had published his Varie Lectiones Veteris Testamenti; but from these works we find little help, as far as the Hebrew MSS. are concerned. One Hebrew MS. instead of ארבע מאות אלה. arba meoth eleph, 400,000, reads ארבע עשר אלה. arba eser eleph, 14,000. In all printed copies of the Hebrew, the numbers are as in the common text, 400,000, 800,000, and 500,000. The versions are as follows:—The Targum or Chaldee, the same in each place as in the Hebrew. The Syriac in verse third has 400,000 young men for the army of Abijah, and 800,000 stout youths for that of Jeroboam. For the slain Israelites, in verse 17th it has 500,000, falsely translated in the Latin text quinque milia, 5000, both in the Paris and London polyglots; another proof among many that little dependance is to be placed on the Latin translation of this version in either of the above polyglots. The Arabic is the same in all these cases with the Syriac, from which it has been translated. The Septuagint, both as it is published in all the polyglots, and as far as I have seen in MSS., is the same with the Hebrew text. So also is Josephus. The Vulgate or Latin version is that alone that exhibits any important variations; we have had considerable proof of this in the above mentioned collations of Calmet and Kennicott. I shall beg liberty to add others from my own collection. In the Editio Princeps of the Latin bible, though without date or place, yet evidently printed long before that of Fust, in 1462, the places stand thus: ver. 3. 'With him Abia entered into battle; and he had of the most warlike and choice men 40,000; and Jeroboam raised an army against him of 80,000 men.' And in ver. 17: 'and there fell down wounded 50,000 stout men of Israel.' In the Glossa Ordinaria, by Strabo Fuldensis, we have 40,000 and 80,000 in the two first instances, and 500,000 in the last.—Bib. Sacr. vol. ii. Antv. 1634. In six ancient MSS. of my own, marked A, B, C, D, E, F, the text stands thus. In A we have 40,000 for the army of Abijah, and 80,000 for that of Jeroboam, and 50,000 for the slain of the latter. B, 40,000, 80,000, 50,000. The numbers being here expressed in words at full length, there can be no suspicion of mistake. C, 400,000, 800,000, 500,000. This is the same as the Hebrew text very distinctly expressed. D, This in the first two numbers is the same as the others above; but the last is confused, and appears to stand for 55,000. E, 40,000, 80,000, 50,000. F, 400,000, 800,000, 500,000. This also is the same as the Hebrew. The reader has now the whole evidence which I have been able to collect, before him, and may choose; the smaller numbers appear to be the most correct. Corruptions in the numbers in these historical books we have often had cause to suspect and complain of.—Dr A. Clarke, 2 Chron. xiii. 3—17.—Ed.

was a prince of a different temper. As he enjoyed the felicity of a settled peace for the ten first years of his reign, he wisely made use of it in reforming many abuses that had been tolerated in former reigns. He expelled the Sodomites, broke down the idols, and demolished their altars in all the cities of Judah; ^a but he had not yet power and authority enough to destroy the high places. The vessels of silver and gold which ^b both he and his father had consecrated to the service of the temple, he presented to the priests; and by all the enforcements of regal authority, compelled his subjects to be religious.

This time of peace he likewise made use of, to fortify several cities on the frontier parts of his kingdom, and to train up his subjects in the art of war; insomuch that, in a short time, he had an army of three hundred thousand men of Judah armed with shields and pikes, and two hundred and fourscore thousand men of Benjamin, armed with shields and arrows, all persons of courage, and resolved to defend their country.

In this situation of affairs, Zerah, the ^c king of Arabia

^a This seems to be contradicted by a passage in 2 Chron. xiv. 3, where we are told, 'that Asa took away the altars of the strange gods, and the high places;' but, for the right understanding and reconciling of this, we may observe, that there were two kinds of high places, the one tolerated for religious purposes, the other abominable from their first institution; the one frequented by devout worshippers, the other made the receptacle of the wicked and idolatrous only. Now these were the altars and high places which Asa took away, even where the people sacrificed to strange gods; but those where God alone was worshipped had obtained so long, and were looked upon with so sacred a veneration, that, for fear of giving a general offence, though he knew they were contrary to a divine injunction, he durst not adventure to abolish them. The truth is, these high places were famous either for the apparition of angels, or some other miraculous event; had either been places of abode for the ark of the Lord, or such as some prophet or patriarch of old had been accustomed to pray and sacrifice in; and therefore they were looked upon as consecrated to the service of God; nor was there strength enough in the government to overcome this inveterate prejudice, till Hezekiah arose, who, to prevent the calamities that were coming upon the nation, had the courage to effect a thorough reformation.—Patrick on 1 Kings xv. 14; and Cabinet on chap. xiv. 23.

^b According to the piety of ancient times, his father had devoted some part of the spoils he had taken in the war against Jeroboam to the service of the temple, but had not time to make good his vow, or, upon some account or other, had neglected it, so that his son took care to supply that defect. And inasmuch as himself had taken large booty in his war with the Arabians, of this he likewise bestowed a considerable part upon holy uses.—Patrick's Commentary.

^c The Scripture takes no notice of what was the cause of this war between Zerah and Asa, nor are interpreters well agreed what the country was from whence this enemy came. The country, in the original, is called Cush, though we translate it Ethiopia. Now, there are three countries, different from one another, all called by the name of Cush: 1. the land of Cush upon the river Gihon; 2. Cush upon the eastern shore of the Red Sea; and, 3. Cush, situated above Thebais, and in the Upper Egypt. It is very probable, then, that the country here spoken of must not be Ethiopia, properly so called, because we can hardly imagine, how an army of a million of men should be permitted to march through Egypt, as they must have done to invade Judea, without some opposition: and therefore the country must be the land of Cush, which lay in Arabia Petraea, upon the east shore of the Red Sea, and, at the extremity to the point of that sea, inclining towards Egypt and Judea. And whereas some have made a doubt, how so small a country could have produced so large an army, it is no hard matter to suppose, that a great part of the army might perhaps have been mercenaries.—Cabinet's Commentary on 2 Chron. xiv. 9; and Dictionary, under invaded Judea with an almost innumerable army, but was vanquished by Asa with a much inferior force. For, as soon as the battle began, God struck the Arabians with such a panic fear, that they began to flee; and Asa and his army pursued them, took the spoil of their camp, carried away their cattle, smote the cities that were in league with them, and so returned in triumph to Jerusalem.

After so signal a victory, Asa continued in peace for the space of five years more; in which time he thought himself obliged, both in gratitude to God, and in compliance to the encouragement ¹ which his prophet Azariah had given him, to set himself about a thorough reformation in religion. To this purpose he executed all that could be convicted of sodomy: he destroyed all the idols that were to be found, not only in Judah and Benjamin, but in any of the conquered countries likewise: he repaired the altar of burnt-offerings, and summoned, not only the natives, but strangers likewise, to the worship of the true God. On a solemn festival, which he had appointed, he ordered seven hundred oxen, and seven thousand sheep, part of the spoil which he had taken from the Arabians, to be sacrificed; and, at the same time, engaged in a covenant with his subjects, which was confirmed by oath, that whoever should forsake the true worship of God should have ² the sentence of the law executed upon him, and be infallibly put to death.

His own mother had been a patroness of idolatry; and therefore, to show his impartiality, he removed her from court, and forbade her coming near the queen, for fear of infecting her; and understanding that she had set up an idol in a grove consecrated to an obscene deity, ^d he

the word Cush; and Wells' Geography of the Old Testament, vol. i. c. 4. [Dr Hales, however, is of opinion that Zerah was king of the African Ethiopia, now long known by the name of Abyssinia, and that his immense army, amounting to a million of men, and three hundred chariots, but which Josephus reduces, more probably, to 90,000 infantry, and 100,000 cavalry, (Ant. viii. 12.) consisted of Abyssinians and Lybians, called in Scripture Lubim.—Analysis, vol. ii. p. 380, second edition.]—Ed.

^d The words in the text, both in 1 Kings xv. 13, and 2 Chron. xv. 16, according to our translation, are to this effect.—That 'Asa removed his mother Maachah from being queen, because she had made an idol in a grove, both of which he cut down and burnt.' The word which we render idol is in the original Miphetseth; but then the whole difficulty turns upon this,—what the proper signification of this word is. The Vulgate translation has cleared this matter pretty well, by rendering the passage, that this queen-mother 'was the high priestess in the sacrifices of Priapus;' and when the Septuagint, according to the Vatican copy, informs us, that she held an assembly in this grove, and that her son Asa cut down all the close arbours or places of retreat, as the word Συδος, which we render assembly, may have a more carnal meaning, and the other καταδύους, properly signifies hiding places, or places of retirement for wicked and obscene purposes: we may from hence infer, that both the Latin and Greek translators took the Miphetseth of Maachah to be some lewd and lascivious deity, which loved to be worshipped in filthy and abominable actions; and that this could be no other than the Roman Priapus, whose worshippers were chiefly women, seems to be implied in the very etymology of the word, which properly signifies terriclamentum, or, a device to frighten other things away; for this was exactly the office of Priapus in all gardens. 'Let Priapus be placed as a guardian in the fruitful gardens, that with his keen prunghook he may frighten the birds.' (Tiul. Elig. 1.) But then the question is, who the patriarch was, for most idols were made for some patriarch or other, that the Roman Priapus is thought to represent? And the learned burned the idol, and the grove both, and threw their ashes into the brook Kidron,¹ as Moses did before by the molten calf.

The fame of this reformation, and the blessings wherewith God had hitherto distinguished Asa's reign, made the subjects of Baasha, who was now king of Israel, come over in great numbers to Jerusalem; which Baasha perceiving, was resolved, if possible, to put a stop to it; and therefore he fortified Raamah, a town in the tribe of Benjamin so conveniently situated, that, by keeping a good garrison there, he might hinder all passing to and fro without leave, and so cut off all communication between his people and the people of Judah.

Asa hearing of this, and knowing the intent and purpose of the stratagem, was resolved to give him a diversion, if he possibly could, on the other side. To this end he took all the ^a silver and gold that was in the author, from whom I have compiled this note, is of opinion, that it might properly enough denote Lot, who lay with his two daughters when he was drunk, and of the former begat Moab, the primogenitor of that nation, who were the greatest worshippers of this obscene deity; though, for several reasons that he there enumerates, upon presumption that Priapus was the same with Baal-Peor, which signifies a naked or uncovered god, he is more inclinable to think it was Noah, of whom it was said, that 'he was a husbandman, and planted a vineyard, and that he drank of the wine, and was drunken, and uncovered within his tent,' (Gen. ix. 20, 21.; Jurieu's History of Doctrines and Worship, part 4. c. 2. and 3.) Most of the ancients are of opinion, that Astoreth, which all allow to be the same with Astarte, was the Greek Kύριος, and the Roman Venus. Tully, in his third book On the Nature of the Gods, tells us expressly, that Astarte, among the Tyrians, was the fourth Venus, who was married to Adonis, and upon his, and some other authorities, many moderns have gone into the same sentiment: but, as it is certain, that the Tyrians had their theology from the Phœnicians, the testimony of St Austin cannot but have some weight in this case, since he affirms, with the greatest assurance, that Juno without all doubt, was, by the Carthaginians, called Astarte; (Quæst. 26, indiv.) That Juno was the great deity and patroness of Carthage, is the received opinion of the Gentile world. "Which Juno is said to have preferred to all other regions of the earth, with the exception of Samos." (Virg. Æn. 1.) And therefore, since we find Baal, who is the same with Jupiter, so frequently in Scripture joined with Ashtaroth, which is the same with Astarte, we can hardly refrain thinking, that she must be the Roman Juno; and they, consequently, husband and wife; how extravagant soever, therefore, the frolie of Heliogabalus, mentioned by Herodotus, was, in sending for the goddess of the Carthaginians to be married to his god, who was the Jupiter of the Phœnicians; yet, from this piece of history, we may inform ourselves, that the goddess of the Carthaginians was no other than Juno, the supposed wife of Baal, or Jupiter; and therefore we find her, by the Phœnician historian Sanchoniatho called Baaltis, which is a feminine substantive, formed from the word Baal, and by the sacred writers, 'the queen of heaven,' (Jer. vii. 18. and xlv. 18.) We have sufficient grounds therefore to suppose, that this Astarte was Juno; but then what particular woman this Juno was, before she came to be deified, we are at a loss to know: only the conjecture of the learned author, from whom I have extracted this note, seems to be preferable to any other I have yet met with, viz. that as both Baal and Jupiter are generally allowed to be the patriarch Ham, so this Juno or Astarte, in all probability, was one of his wives, from whom the Canaanites and Phœnicians were descended. But in this we have the less certainty, because the sacred history says nothing of the adventures of the post-diluvian matrons, whereby we might be enabled to form a comparison between them and these fabulous goddesses.—Jurieu, ibid. p. 4. c. 5.

^a In cases of extreme danger, it was always held lawful to employ sacred things in the defence of one's country: but there was no such necessity in this case. God had appeared wonderfully in Asa's defence, against an enemy much more powerful temple, as well as what was found in his own exchequer, and sent it as a present to Benhadad king of Syria, requesting his assistance against Baasha. The largeness of the present soon had its effect: for Benhadad immediately attacked several cities in Israel with such success, that Baasha was forced to abandon his new designs of fortifying his frontiers towards Judah, in order to defend the other parts of his kingdom that were thus furiously invaded; which gave Asa an opportunity to demolish the works that were begun at Ramah, and with the materials that Baasha had prepared to build him two cities in his own dominions, Gebah and Mizpah.

This applying however to Benhadad for assistance was, in Asa, a thing inexcusable. It implied a distrust of God's power or goodness to help him, of which he had so lately so large an experience; and therefore the prophet Hanani was sent to reprove him for it: but instead of receiving his reproofs with temper and thankfulness, he was so exasperated with them, that he put the prophet in chains, and gave orders, at the same time, for the execution ^b of several of his subjects.

The truth is, towards the close of his reign, he grew very peevish and passionate, and uneasy with those that were about him; which, charity would be apt to think, proceeded from his distemper, a severe gout, in all probability, whose humour rising upwards, killed him in the one and fortieth year of his reign. He was succeeded by his son Jehoshaphat: but instead of being interred, as the manner of the Jews was, ^c he ordered his body to be than Baasha was. Nay, he had promised him his protection at all times, and success in all his undertakings, if he would but adhere to his service; and yet, forgetting all this, he strips the temple of its treasure, and bribes a heathen prince to come to his assistance, and break his league with another to whom he stood engaged: so that here were three offences in this one act of Asa's. For, 1st, he alienated things consecrated to God without necessity. 2dly, he did this out of a carnal fear and distrust of that God whose power and goodness he had lately experienced. And, 3dly, he did it with an intent even to hire Benhadad to a breach of his league and covenant with Baasha.—Pool's Annotations.

^b It is not said that he gave orders for the execution of his subjects, but that he oppressed them, or became a tyrant.—Ep. Gleig.

^c The words in the text are these,—'They laid him on the bed, which was filled with sweet odours, and divers kinds of spices, prepared by the apothecaries' art; and they made a great burning for him,' (2 Chron. xvi. 14.) But then the question is, whether the body itself was burned, or only some spices and odiferous drugs, to prevent any bad smell that might attend the corpse. The Greeks and Romans indeed, when they burned any dead bodies, threw frankincense, myrrh, cassia, and other fragrant things into the fire, and this in such abundance, that Pliny (Nat. Hist. c. 18.) represents it as a piece of profaneness, to bestow such heaps of frankincense upon a dead body, when they offered it so sparingly to their gods. The Jews, however, say the maintainers of this side of the question, were accustomed to inter, and not to burn their dead, though they might possibly learn from the Egyptians the usage of burning many spices at their funerals, as we find they did at the funeral of Zedekiah king of Judah, (Jer. xxxiv. 5.) but notwithstanding this, some very able commentators are of opinion, that all these spices and perfumes were burned along with Asa's body; and they remark, that among his other offences, the sacred history takes notice of this vanity of his, in ordering his body to be disposed of according to the manner of the Gentiles, and not of his own people. Though therefore they suppose that Asa was the first who introduced this custom; yet, in after ages, it became very frequent, and was thought the more honourable ceremony of the two, (2 Chron. xxi. 19, ibid. xvi. 14. Amos vi. 10.)—Patrick's and Calmet's Commentaries on 2 Chron. xvi. 14.

burned ^a with great quantities of perfumes and spices, and his bones and ashes to be collected, and buried in a sepulchre which he had provided for himself in the city of David.

During the long continuance of Asa's reign, sundry successions and revolutions happened in the kingdom of Israel, whereof the sacred history has given us but a short account. In the first or second year of Asa, died Jeroboam, of some acute disease, which the Scripture does not specify. His reign was famous, or infamous rather, for the revolt of the ten tribes, the public institution, of idolatry, and the terrible defeat which Abijah gave him, and which he himself seems not long to have survived. He was succeeded by his son Nadab, a person who took care to imitate his father in all his wickedness; but his reign was not long. In less than two years he was treacherously killed by Baasha, his captain general, who usurped his crown, and to maintain himself in that usurpation, put every one that was related to his predecessor to death; which was certainly a very wicked and barbarous act, though it proved the accomplishment of the prophecy ^b which Abijah had denounced against Jeroboam's house.

^a There is however no evidence from the text that Asa's body was buried. The aromatics and duly prepared ointments with which it was surrounded were most probably placed along with it in the sepulchre. The burning then must have been of other aromatic woods, most likely at the mouth of the sepulchre, or some little distance from it. This was evidently a ceremony of respect, and designed to do honour to the dead.—Boothroyd on 2 Chron. xvi. 14.—Ed.

^b 1 Kings xiv. 10, 11. The prophecy runs thus:—'Therefore behold, I will bring evil upon the house of Jeroboam, and will cut off from Jeroboam him that pisseth against the wall, and him that is shut up and left in Israel, and will take away the remnant of the house of Jeroboam, as a man taketh away dung till it be all gone. Him that dieth of Jeroboam in the city, shall the dogs eat; and him that dieth in the field shall the fowls of the air eat; for the Lord hath spoken it.' The only difficulty here is, how Baasha's exaltation to the kingdom of Israel can be ascribed to God, (as it is 1 Kings xvi. 2.) 'Forasmuch as I have exalted thee out of the dust, and made thee prince over my people Israel,' when it is manifest that he got it by his own treachery and cruelty.' But to this it may be replied, that though the manner of invading the kingdom was from himself, and his own wicked heart; yet the translation of the kingdom from Nadab to Baasha, simply considered, was from God, who by his decree and providence, ordered it, and disposed of all occasions, and of the hearts of all the soldiers and the people so, that Baasha should have opportunity of executing his judgments upon Nadab, and such success thereupon as should procure him a present and quiet possession of the kingdom. So that his accession to the kingdom was from the divine decree, but the form and manner of his accession was from himself, from his own ambition and covetousness; and as it was wicked and cruel, is therefore charged upon him as a wilful murder, ver. 7.—Poole's Annotations.

^c And yet Baasha's expedition against Asa, in order to build Rama, is said to be in the six and thirtieth year of the reign of Asa, (2 Chron. xvi. 1.) Now to reconcile this, some would have that six and thirtieth year to relate, not to Asa's reign, but to the date of the kingdom of Judah, from the division of the kingdom of Israel, at Rehoboam coming to the crown, and to be in fact no more than the fourteenth year of the reign of Asa. But that cannot be, since this expedition of Baasha was some time after Asa had defeated the king of Ethiopia, or Arabia, and yet this defeat happened in the fiftenth year of king Asa's reign: so that that six and thirtieth year of Baasha's going up to build Ramah, can, by no good computation, be the fourteenth year of king Asa's reign. And therefore, without any more to do, we may, with Josephus, and others, adventure to say, that the oc-died and was succeeded by his son Elah, a vicious and debauched prince, that, in the second year of his reign, as he was carousing in his steward's house, was assassinated by Zimri, a considerable officer of horse, who, to secure the kingdom to himself, ^d cut off all Baasha's friends and relations: but he had not taken care, as Baasha did, to gain the army which was then besieging ^e Gibbethon, over to his interest, so that when they heard of the news of the king's death, they declared for Omri their general. He immediately raised the siege, and marching to Tirzah, the then royal city, soon made himself master of it; so that Zimri seeing all lost, and despairing of any quarter from the enemy, retired to the palace, ^f which he set on fire, and, after a reign of seven days only, was consumed in it.

Omri, however, found it not so easy a matter to get the throne, as he expected. Half the Israelites declared for Tibni, the son of Ginah, which occasioned a civil war for four years, till having vanquished and slain his rival Tibni, he came to reign without a competitor. But his reign must be acknowledged to have been very wicked, when we find it recorded of him, that he not only walked in the way of Jeroboam, ¹ 'but did worse than all before him.' He very probably began to introduce other and more abominable idolatries than were then in use, which are therefore called ² 'the works of the house of Ahab.' He compelled the people to worship the golden calves; and by severe laws, which are called ³ 'the statutes of Omri,' restrained them from going up to Jerusalem: and because the royal palace at Tirzah was destroyed, he bought of one Shemer a piece of rising ground, whereon he built a palace for his own habitation, which, in a short time increasing to a city, was, from its first owner, called in Hebrew Shomerom, but, according to the Greek and our translation, ⁴ Samaria, and was ever after made a place of the king's residence, and the metropolis of the Israelitish kingdom.

Reason of this difference proceeds from the mistake of some transcriber.—Hovell's History in the notes.

^d One part of the threat which the prophet Jehu denounces against Baasha is, as we see, that God would, 'make his house like the house of Jeroboam,' (1 Kings xvi. 3.) and that exactly came to pass. For as Nadab, the son of Jeroboam, reigned but two years, so Elah, the son of Baasha, reigned no more: and as Nadab was killed by the sword, so was Elah: so wonderful a similitude was there between Jeroboam and Baasha, in their lives and in their deaths, and in their sons and in their families.—Patrick's Commentary.

^e This was a city in the tribe of Dan, and given to the Levites for their habitation, (Josh. xix. 44, and xxi. 23.) but they seem to have quitted it, as they did the rest of the cities, when Jeroboam would not suffer them to exercise their office, and the Philistines, it is likely, then seized upon it, as being adjoining to their country. It seems, however, to have been a place of no inconsiderable strength, since we find, that it maintained a siege for three kings' reigns successively, though with some interruption, 1 Kings xvi. 15, 16.

^f Some interpreters would rather have it, that Omri set the royal palace on fire, in order to burn Zimri in it, who had retired thither. The Hebrew words indeed will bear that construction; but the other sense seems more likely. Nor has profane history forgot to preserve the memory of some princes, who have chosen to die in this manner, rather than fall by the sword, whereof Sardanapalus is one of the most ancient and most notorious examples.—Cabal's Commentary.

^g It is somewhat wonderful, that when Omri bought this place of Shemer, whereon he intended to build a city, he did not call it by his own name, unless we may suppose, that, when Shemer

In the eight and thirtieth year of king Asa, Ahab succeeded his father Omri, and in wickedness excelled all his predecessors. But of him we shall treat at large in our next chapter, and choose to conclude here with this observation,—That though, while Asa reigned in Judah, Israel was in the hands of seven or eight several princes, namely, Jeroboam, Nadab, Baasha, Elah, Zimri, Tibni, Omri, and Ahab; yet such was their hardness in sin and idolatry, that in all these changes, they never once thought of returning to the house of David, or the worship of the true God at Jerusalem.

CHAP. II.—Difficulties Obviated, and Objections Answered.

THE Jewish doctors have a tradition, that after Rehoboam, the son of Solomon, had left Shechem in haste, and made the best of his way to Jerusalem, Jeroboam called a council, consisting partly of pious, and partly of wicked men; that, in this council, he proposed whether they would agree and subscribe to all that he should appoint; that to this they declared their assent, and he thereupon constituted himself king; that when he proposed farther, whether, if he should establish idolatry, they would agree and consent to it, the pious party were shocked, and began to express their indignation; but that their wicked neighbours in the council, pacified them by whispering in their ears, “that Jeroboam had no intention to set up idolatry, but only mentioned it in a comparative sense, and with a design to try the extent of their obedience.” So that by this fraud, the pious people in the council were drawn in, and even Ahijah himself prevailed on to subscribe implicitly, to whatever Jeroboam should think fit to enact; by which means he took an occasion, as the iniquity of the times favoured him not a little, to establish idolatry by a law.

Solomon, we all agree, was a man of great fame for his knowledge, and yet in the very maturity of his age, he discovered a strong inclination to idolatry, which could not but make a bad impression upon the minds of his subjects, when they saw the preference that was given to it by so wise a prince. His son Rehoboam was the issue of a woman that sprung from an infamous nation, an Ammonitess by birth, who, as far as it appears, was never a proselyte; and, having a great hand in her son’s education, might give him a deep tincture of her own sold it, he let him have the greater bargain of it, upon condition that it should be continued in its first owner’s name. However this be, it is certain, that as Samaria was situated in the midst of the tribe of Ephraim on a fruitful and pleasant hill, it soon became the regal and capital city of the kingdom of Israel; nor did its king omit any thing to make it as strong, as fine, and as rich as possible. What fate it underwent by Benhadad king of Syria; by Salmanassar king of Assyria; and by one of the Maccabean family; by Herod the Great, who rebuilt and beautified it; by Augustus Caesar, and by the Emperor Adrian, under whom it finally fell; we shall see, in a great measure, in the course of this history. It is conjectured by Bochart, who traced the ruins of it, to have been once larger than Jerusalem; but now it consists of nothing but a few cottages and convents, inhabited by some Greek monks.—Bells’ Geography of the Old Testament, vol. 3.

sentiments: for, in his reign, we read, that ¹ ‘the people built them high places, on every green hill, and under every green tree, and did according to all the abominations of the nations which the Lord cast out before the children of Israel;’ which they durst not have done, had the king discountenanced them by his own example.

After a succession of such idolatrous princes, in the reign of king Josiah, ² ‘the book of the law’ was found in the house of the Lord, at which Hilkiah, the high priest, seemed to express an uncommon joy and wonder: and though this might possibly be the authentic copy, ³ which, by God’s command, was laid up in the sanctuary, yet how much the reading of it in any copy was at any time disused, we may gather, from what the historian tells us of the king, namely, that ⁴ ‘when he had read the words of the book of the law, he rent his clothes;’ and by a parity of reason we may infer, that what through the bad example of their kings, who gave life and encouragement to idolatrous practices, and what through the negligence of the people, in not perusing the books wherein the transactions of former times were recorded, the generation we are now speaking of might have forgot the history of Aaron’s molten calf, and the punishment pursuant thereupon, and might therefore be induced to worship another without any dread or apprehension of danger.

How the figure of a calf, or any other animal, can be a symbol of a deity, it is difficult to conceive. But a certain learned ⁵ author, who seems a little singular in his opinion, will needs have it that the golden calves which Jeroboam made, were an imitation of the cherubim, in his account these were winged oxen, Moses had placed upon the ark of the covenant, whereon the glory of the Lord sat enthroned. These cherubim in the tabernacle of Moses, and afterwards in Solomon’s temple, were placed in the sanctuary, and secreted from vulgar sight: but Jeroboam, to make his religion more condescensive, placed his calves in open view, so that every one who looked on them might, through them, worship the God of Israel, without repairing to the temple of Jerusalem.

This notion, if it were true, would make the transition easy from the worship at Jerusalem to the worship at Dan or Bethel; but we can hardly imagine, that Jeroboam had either so harmless or so conformable a design in setting up these golden images. Whatever his design was, it is certain that the Scripture, all along, represents him as of all others, the principal person that ⁶ ‘made Israel to sin; that ⁷ drew Israel from serving the Lord, and made them sin a great sin.’ And therefore we may observe, that whenever it describes a bad prince, one part of his character is, that he imitated the son of ⁸ ‘Jeroboam the son of Nebat, who,’ as the prophet upbraids his wife, ‘went and made him other gods, and molten images to provoke me to anger, and to cast me behind his back,’ saith the Lord.

The truth is, Jeroboam had lived a considerable time in the land of Egypt, had contracted an acquaintance with the king thereof, and formed an interest among the people; and therefore finding himself under a necessity of making an alteration in the established religion of his country, he thought it the wisest method to do it upon the Egyptian model, that thereby he might endear himself to that nation; and in case he met with opposition from his rival Rehoboam, might hope for assistance from that quarter. For as the Egyptians had two oxen which they worshipped, one called Apis, at Memphis, the metropolis of the Upper Egypt; and another called Mnevis, at Hierapolis, a principal city of the Lower; so he made two calves of gold, and placed one of them in Bethel which was in the south, and the other in Dan, which was in the north part of the country of Israel.

There were these farther reasons likewise that might determine him in the choice of these two places. Dan was a town famous¹ for the Teraphim of Micah, unto which there had been a great resort for many ages; and Bethel was, in every one's opinion, a holy place, that which Jacob had consecrated after he had been vouchsafed the vision of the ladder, and where God had so frequently appeared to him, that he thought he had reason to call it² 'the gate of heaven.'

Jeroboam, no question, was not insensible of the advantage his rival enjoyed, in having the temple in his possession; and might many times wish that he had been able to have built one that might have stood in competition with it; but this was impossible. Seven years and a half had Solomon been in completing the temple at Jerusalem, notwithstanding the multitude of hands that he employed, and the vast preparations of money and materials that his father had left him. To build one less magnificent, had been inglorious to Jeroboam; and to build one any ways adequate, was more than he could hope to see finished in his days. The people were grown weary of such public expensive works. The tax had been heavy and burdensome to them.³ Thy father made our yoke grievous,⁴ was the complaint they brought against Rehoboam. "Upon this the whole revolt was founded. And therefore, in the present state of Jeroboam's affairs, a new temple was, of all projects, the most unpopular, and the likeliest to create a total defection; since it was running directly into his rival's error, and, in effect, declaring, that⁵ his little finger should be found heavier than Solomon's loins had ever been.

In the mean time his subjects deserted apace; and, for want of a place of religious worship to resort to, were returning to Jerusalem, and to their allegiance to the house of David at once. Something therefore was necessary to be done, in order to remedy this growing evil; and, because Jeroboam readily foresaw, that, to support himself in his usurpation, he might possibly want the assistance of the Egyptians, the best policy that at present occurred to his thoughts, was, to do a courtesy to them, in setting up a form of worship much like theirs, and, at the same time, to gratify his own subjects in the choice of such places of worship as had been famous in the days of old, and whose reputed sacredness,⁶ as well as proximity, might commute for the want of a temple.

Gezer, we own, lay at a considerable distance from Egypt, which, since the time of Sesostris, had seldom extended its conquests into foreign lands; and therefore, to account for its conduct here, we must observe, that Gezer was so ancient a town in Canaan, that when Joshua⁷ conquered it, it had a king of no small note; that in the division of the land,⁸ it fell to the tribe of Ephraim, was bordering upon the northern part of the country of the Philistines, and not far from the Mediterranean sea; that it was one of the eight and forty cities which, together with their suburbs, were given to the Levites; an inland town, but at no great distance from the sea-port of Joppa; that when the Ephraimites took possession of it,⁹ they suffered the Canaanites to cohabit with them, who gave them no small disturbance, and towards the latter end of David's reign, expelled them thence; that when Solomon came to the throne, he applied himself chiefly to the building of the temple, nor thought it worth while to disturb the peace of his reign for the recovery of a few revolted cities; that when a match was proposed between Solomon and Pharaoh's daughter, Pharaoh thought he could not do a more acceptable service, or show the benefit of his alliance better, than in taking Gezer, and some adjacent places; that, for this purpose, he set out with a large fleet of ships, landed at Joppa, besieged Gezer, and because it made an obstinate defence,¹⁰ burned it to the ground, and slew all the Canaanites that were in it, but that not long after he began to rebuild it; and when his daughter was espoused to Solomon, gave him this, and some other places he had taken along with it, as part of her portion; for it is a mistaken notion, that princes' daughters had no portion in those days.

Among the Jews, indeed, the custom was for the men to give the dower, or to make some present to the parents, for the favour of having their daughter in marriage. But this custom prevailed only among the inferior sort: ladies of the first distinction were, in all nations, wont to bring their husbands fortunes proportionate to their quality: for Saul, we read, declared that the man who should slay Goliath, should not only have his daughter in marriage, but together with her, plenty of riches and other valuable emoluments. Antiochus the great promised to settle upon his, the kingdoms of Judea and Samaria, as a dower to Ptolemy king of Egypt; and to name no more, Agamemnon, in times of an elder date, though not so great affluence, offered no less than¹¹ seven good towns with his, without any reserved rent,

¹⁰ The speech which Josephus makes for Jeroboam, upon this occasion, is to this purpose:—"I need not tell you, my countrymen, that God is everywhere, and not confined to any certain place, but wherever we are, he hears our prayers and accepts our worship, in one place as well as another; and therefore I am not at all for your going up to Jerusalem at this time, to a people that hate you. It is a long tedious journey, and all this only for the sake of religion. He who built that temple was but a man, as every one here is, and the golden calves that I have provided for you, the one in Bethel, and the other in Dan, are consecrated, as well as the temple, and brought so much nearer to you, on purpose for the convenience of your worship, where you may pay your duty to God, in such a manner as best pleases you," &c.—Jewish Antiquities, b. 8, c. 3

In order to understand what is meant by scorpions here, we must observe that the Jews sometimes, in inflicting the punishment of whipping for notorious offences, tied sharp bones, pieces of lead, or thorns to the end of the thongs, which from the pain and torture they occasioned were termed scorpions.—Burder's Oriental Literature.—Ed.

or other deduction from her husband. So that Pharaoh did no more than conform to the practice of other great princes, in endowing his daughter with the places he had taken from the Philistines, in all probability, for that very purpose.^a

How he came to swerve so soon from this alliance, as to give protection and countenance to his son-in-law's avowed enemies, need be no wonder at all to him who considers by what various springs kingdoms are governed; how the interest of nations shifts about, according to the different situation of their affairs, and of how little weight and validity all leagues and treaties are, when once national interest comes to be thrown into the counterbalance.

But this is not all. The Pharaoh who received Jeroboam in his exile, in all probability, was not the king whose daughter Solomon had married, but a prince of another line, and of different views. The woman whom Solomon married, was one of the dynasty of the Diospolites, whose ancestors had lived at Thebes; but in the year that Solomon finished the temple, there happened a revolution in Egypt, wherein this dynasty, or race of kings, lost the throne, and was succeeded by that of the

^a It does not, from all this, follow, that ladies of the first distinction were, in that age and in all nations, wont to bring their husbands fortunes in proportion to their quality, or that such was the general practice even of great princes. Saul's declaration shows that he meant to give his daughter, in reward for the most important service, which could be rendered to the state; but he kept not his promise. Afterwards he gave a younger daughter to David, but it was for a price, even for the slaughter of 200 of his enemies. It was of the utmost importance to Antiochus and Agamemnon to conciliate, at any price, Ptolemy and Achilles; and therefore they offered great dowries with their daughters to purchase the friendship of these formidable enemies; but this was not the case with respect to Pharaoh and Solomon. Pharaoh's giving up Gezer, therefore, to Solomon, as a dowry with his daughter, is a proof that David and Solomon were two of the greatest monarchs of their age; that he thought himself honoured by the alliance; and that the sacred historical account of Solomon's glory is not exaggerated. Among the Jews, and generally throughout the east, marriage was considered as a sort of purchase, which the man made of the woman he desired to marry; and therefore in contracting marriages, as the wife brought a portion to the husband, so the husband was obliged to give her or her parents money or presents in lieu of this portion. This was the case between Hamor, the father of Shechem and the sons of Jacob, with relation to Dinah, (Gen. xxxiv. 12.) and Jacob having no money offered his uncle Laban seven years' service, which must have been equivalent to a large sum, (Gen. xxix. 18.) Saul did not give his daughter Michal to David, till after he had received an hundred foreskins of the Philistines (1 Sam. xviii. 25.) Hosea bought his wife at the price of fifteen pieces of silver, and a measure and a half of barley, (Hos. iii. 2.) The same custom also obtained among the Greeks and other ancient nations, (Potter's Antiq. vol. 2. p. 279.) and it is to this day the practice in several eastern countries, particularly among the Druses, Turks, and Christians, who inhabit the country of Hauran, and also among the modern Senite Arabs, or those who dwell in tents. (See Burckhardt's Travels in Syria, De La Roque Voyage dans la Palestine, and Burder's Oriental Customs.) Young girls, Mr Buckingham informs us, are given in marriage for certain sums of money, varying from 500 to a 1000 piastres, among the better order of inhabitants, according to their connexions or beauty; though among the labouring classes it descends as low as 100 or even 50. This sum being paid by the bridegroom to the bride's father adds to his wealth, and makes girls, particularly when handsome as profitable to their parents, as boys are by the wages they earn by their labour.—Buckingham's Travels among the Arab Tribes.—Bp. Gleig, Horne's Introduction.—Ed.

Taanites, of whom Semendis, the father of Shishak, was the first king.^b These kept their court at Zoan, an ancient town not far from the borders of Canaan, and therefore very convenient for the reception of any refugees that should come from thence. For as it was the interest of the former kings of Egypt to keep up a good understanding with the house of David; so now it became equally the interest of the present race to make use of all instruments to embarrass them, lest, by joining with the deposed family, that might, at any time, occasion another revolution in Egypt. And this, by the by, suggests the reason whereof the Scripture is silent, why Shishak invaded the kingdom of Judah with a vast army, but never pretended to annoy Israel; namely, because he thought it advisable to disable Rehoboam from assisting the deposed family in Egypt, but to encourage Jeroboam, who being an usurper himself, was unquestionless a friend and ally to those princes that were in the like circumstances.

Who the queen of Sheba was, and in what climate the country from whence she came to visit Solomon lay, are points wherein the learned are not so well agreed: but whether her name was Nicaule, Candace, Marqueda, or Balkis, for different authors give her these several names, it matters not much, if we can but find out what this Sheba was, whereof she is said to have been queen.

Josephus, and, from his authority, many more are of opinion, that Sheba was the ancient name of Meroe, an island, or rather peninsula in Egypt, before Cambyses, in compliment to his sister, (other historians call her his mother,) gave it her name. He tells us likewise, that she was queen both of Egypt and Ethiopia; ^c and the Ethio-

^b I know not on what authority this is said, but it seems to be a mistake. There can be no doubt but that it was Shishak, who afterwards invaded Judah, that gave shelter to Jeroboam when obliged to flee from the vengeance of Solomon; but if Shishak was the Chephrenes of Herodotus, which is by much the most probable opinion, neither he nor his immediate predecessor was either the first or the last of any dynasty of Egyptian kings. Solomon had indeed married either his sister, or, which is more probable, his aunt; but, as Bishop Patrick judiciously observes, "kingdoms never marry;" and therefore there was nothing unnatural or uncommon in his conduct on this occasion.—Bp. Gleig. See also Hales' Analysis v. 4. p. 446, second edition.—Ed.

^c The Ethiopians, who held that this queen of Sheba was of their country, tell us, that she returned big with child of a boy which she had by Solomon; that when this child was of age to learn, she sent him to Solomon, who brought him up as his own son; that in his education, he took care to provide the ablest masters for him, and then sent him back to his mother, whom he succeeded in the kingdom; that the kings of Ethiopia were descended from Solomon by this young prince, whom they call Meilie, or Menilehec; and that of his family there were four and twenty emperors, down to Basilides, who reigned about the middle of the seventeenth age. (See Ludolph's History of Ethiopia.) [Mr Bruce confirms this report of Ludolph's, bringing sufficient proofs that the Abyssinians believe their present royal family to be lineal descendants of Solomon and the queen of Sheba. The tradition of the country certainly accounts better than any other hypothesis that could be easily framed, for that mixture of Judaism with Christianity which characterizes the religion of Abyssinia; and our author justly observes, that the trade carried on by the Israelites with the Cushites and shepherds on the coast of Africa, would naturally "create a desire in the queen of Azab, the sovereign of that country, to go herself, and see the application of the immense treasures that had been exported from her country for a series of years, and the prince who so magnificently employed them." The Abyssinians, he says, "call this queen Maqueda;" but the Arabians, who contest with them the honour of having had this woman for pians indeed have a tradition, that upon her return, she had a son by Solomon, whose posterity reigned there many years, and, to this very day, they have preserved a continual list of their names and successors.

There are these exceptions however to be made to the opinion of the Jewish historian, namely, that whereas he cites Herodotus, as speaking of his queen Nicaule, Herodotus makes mention of none but only Niconis, queen of Egypt; nor does he say one syllable of her pretended journey to Jerusalem. Whereas he says of this Nicaule, that she was queen of Egypt and Ethiopia both; the sacred history is plain, that in the time of Solomon there reigned in Egypt that Pharaoh, whose daughter he married, and in his son Rehoboam's time, Shishak. Whereas he tells us, that the ancient name of Meroe, before the time of Cambyses, was Sheba; for this he seems to want authority, since ¹ Diodorus, and other historians, represent this city as built new from the ground, and not repaired by Cambyses.

The more probable opinion therefore is, that this queen of Sheba came from a country so named, which lay not in Ethiopia nor Africa, but in the southern part of Arabia Felix; because it is generally allowed, that the Sabæans lived in Arabia, and that their country was usually called by the Orientalists the kingdom of the south, in allusion to which, our Saviour styles this princess ² 'the queen of the south;' because their country borders upon the southern ocean, beyond which the ancients knew no farther land; and therefore our Saviour, according to the common mode of speaking, says of this princess, that 'she came from the utmost parts of the earth;' because, in this country, ³ women were known to govern as well as men; because the common produce of it was gold, silver, spices, and precious stones, the very presents which this princess made Solomon; and, if any popular traditions may be credited, ⁴ because the Arabians talk of their queen Balkis, who went to visit Solomon, and show travellers the place of her nativity to this very day.

Now if this princess came from Arabia, there is reason to believe, that she was originally descended from Abraham, by his wife Keturah, one of whose sons ⁵ begat Sheba, who was the first planter of this country; and consequently that she might have some knowledge of revealed religion, by tradition at least, from her pious ancestors. To this purpose the Scripture seems to intimate, that the design of her visit to Solomon was, not so much to gratify her curiosity, as to inform her understanding in matters relating to piety, and divine worship. It was Solomon's fame, ⁶ 'concerning the name of the Lord,' that is, concerning his knowledge of the Supreme Being, and the proper manner of worshipping him, that excited her to take so long a journey; and therefore, our Saviour says, that as she came so far to hear his wisdom (his wisdom concerning what? Concerning the nature and worship of Almighty God,) she would, at the day of judgment, 'rise up against that generation' which refused to listen to him.

Now, if this was the end of this queen's visit to Solomon, who can say, but that she left her country to good purpose, since it was to 'find ⁶ wisdom, and to get understanding, the merchandise of which is better than the merchandise of silver, and the gain thereof than fine gold; ⁷ the price which is above rubies, ⁸ and all that can be desired is not to be compared to it?' But even upon the supposition, that her errand was to acquire knowledge of an inferior kind, or even to make trial of Solomon's sagacity, by proposing some enigmatical questions to him; yet, who knows not, that it was the practice in those days for persons of the first rank and figure in life to exercise their wits in this manner?

Without knowing the custom of the princes of the east, their pomp, and sumptuousness of living, one might be tempted to wonder, what possible use Solomon might make of this milliad of wives and concubines that he had: but as he was between forty and fifty years old before he ran into this excess, we cannot but think, that he kept this multitude of women more for state than any other service. ¹³ Darius Codomannus was wont to carry along with him in his camp, no less than three hundred and fifty concubines in time of war; nor was his queen at all offended at it, because these women used to reverence their sovereign, tell us, that her name was Balkis, the daughter of Hadhad, son of Scharlabil, the twentieth king of Jemen, or Arabia Felix, and that she reigned in the city of Mareb, the capital of the province of Sheba. Their histories are full of fabulous stories concerning her journey to Solomon's court, and her marriage with him, but more particularly concerning the bird hudhud, in English a hawking, which Solomon made use of to send into Arabia upon occasion, and to bring him despatches from thence.—Calmet's Dictionary, under the word Nicaule.

^a It is generally supposed, that these words of Clandin relate to these people: "this sex rules over the Medes and the effeminate Sabæans, and a great part of Barbary is subject to the arms of queens."

and adore her as if she had been a goddess. F. Le Comte, in his history of China, tells us, that the emperor there has a vast number of wives chosen out of the prime beauties of the country, many of which he never so much as saw in his whole life; and therefore, it is not improbable, that Solomon, as he found his riches increase, might enlarge his expenses, and endeavour to surpass all the princes of his time in this, as well as all other kinds of pomp and magnificence.

A man of Solomon's great wisdom, one would think, should have converted those women that were about him to the true religion rather than have suffered himself to be perverted by them to a false one. The Scripture tells us, indeed, that ¹ 'he went after Ashtaroth the goddess of the Zidonians and ^a Milcom the abomination of the Ammonites, and ^b Chemosh the abomination of Moab;' but surely he could never be so far infatuated, as to prefer those idols before the God of Israel. These women, no doubt, as they had got an ascendancy over him, ² might abate his zeal against idolatry, and prevail with him for a public toleration of their religion: they might obtain money of him for the making of their idols, the support of their priests, and expense of their sacrifices; nay, and perhaps might sometimes persuade him, in compliance, to go with them to their worship, or to partake of their lewd and riotous feasts; but that they should ever be able to alter his notions concerning the true God, or prevail with him to believe, that the images they worshipped were informed with any kind of divinity, is a thing incredible.

In the course of this prevarication, however, he continued so long, that it is now become a famous question, Whether he be in a state of salvation or no? Those that maintain the negative, are apt to suggest, that though the Scripture gives us a particular account of his fall, yet it takes no notice of his recovery; that without the grace of God he could not repent, and yet his actions were such as justly deserved a forfeiture of that grace; that had he repented, he would have pulled down the idolatrous temples which he had erected, whereas we find them standing many years after him; and therefore they conclude, that as he did not ³ 'sorrow after a godly sort,' for his impieties, because in his whole behaviour to the very last, they can discern no carefulness wrought in him, no clearing of himself, no indignation, no fear, no vehement desire, no zeal, no revenge, which the apostle has made the proper characteristics of a true repentance. The promise, however, which God makes to David concerning his son Solomon, may incline us to think favourably of his salvation: ⁴ 'I will be his father, and he shall be my son. If he commit iniquity, I will chasten him with the rod of men, and with the stripes of the children of men, but my mercy shall not depart away from him.' And therefore we may presume, that towards the conclusion of his life he grew sensible of his transgressions, ⁵ though the sacred writer takes no notice of it, on purpose to leave a blot on his memory, and a frightful example of human weakness to all posterity; that the temples which he had built to heathen idols, he pulled down and demolished, ⁶ though they were afterwards raised again upon the same places, by other impious princes; and that, after his fall, he wrote his book of Ecclesiastes as a monument of his repentance, and acknowledgment of his own apostasy, and a warning and admonition to all others, that, however they may think of ⁷ 'doing whatever their eyes desired, of keeping nothing from them, and of withholding their hearts from no joy,' yet in the event, they would find, what his experience had taught him so late, that all 'was vanity and vexation of spirit'; that there was no profit in any kind of wickedness under the sun, but ⁸ 'that to fear God, and keep his commandments, was the whole duty of man.'

It is making a wrong judgment of things, to think, that the customs of ancient times, and of different countries, should agree with those of our own age and climate. We, indeed, when we have any thing to declare or relate, do it, for the most part, in express words: but the people of the east, especially those who took upon them the character of prophets, were fond of discovering their minds in ^c signs and emblematical actions; because they

^c This is the first symbolical action that we meet with in any prophet; but, in after ages, instances of this kind became more frequent. Thus Jeremiah 'made himself bonds and yokes, and put them upon his neck,' (Jer. xxvii. 2.) to signify the near approaching captivity of Jerusalem. Isaiah, to denote the captivity of Egypt and Ethiopia, walked naked, that is, without his upper garments on, 'and barefoot for three years, in the streets,' (Is. xx. 2, 3.) Ezekiel, to make the people sensible that they were to be carried away into a strange land, was ordered to make a breach in the wall of his house, and through that, to remove his household goods, 'in the daytime, and in their sight,' (Ezek. xii. 3, 4.) The false prophet Zedekiah made himself a pair of iron horns, and said to Ahab, 'With these shalt thou push the Syrians,' (1 Kings xxii. 11.) And the like practice continued under the New Testament likewise; for Agabus having bound his hands and feet with St Paul's girdle, told the company, that, 'so should the Jews at Jerusalem bind the man unto whom it belonged,' (Acts xxi. 11.) Samuel having exhorted the people to return to the Lord with all their hearts, and to put away the strange gods from among them, said, 'Gather all Israel to Mizpah, and I will pray for you unto the Lord. And they gathered together to Mizpah, and drew water, and poured it out before the Lord, and fasted on that day, and said there, We have sinned against the Lord.' (1 Sam. vii. 5, 6.) The sacred historian does not explain in words the meaning of this drawing of water and pouring it out, nor was there any occasion for his doing so; the action of itself expressing with sufficient clearness that a deluge of tears was due for their offences. But it is not in Israel alone that information was given by action, or that when words were employed, action was added, to fix their meaning,

^a This god is the same with Moloch, which, both in Hebrew and Ethiopic, signifies, a king; but then there are various sentiments concerning the relation which this God had to the other pagan deities. Some believe, that Moloch was Saturn, others Mercury, others Venus, and others again Mars or Mithra. But F. Calmet, in his dissertation before his commentary upon Leviticus, has made it more than probable, that this god was the sun, who is called 'the king of heaven,' as the moon may be said to be the queen thereof, for its make and manner of worship.—See vol. ii. p. 160, in the notes.

^b Chemosh, or Chamos, comes from a root, which, in Arabic, signifies to make haste; and from hence some have imagined, that he is the same with the sun, whose motion is supposed to be so hasty and rapid; though some, from the Hebrew root, which signifies, contractatus, or handled, will have him the same with the Roman Priapus, who is called 'Pater contractationum nocturnarum;' while others from the near resemblance of the Hebrew Chamos with the word Comos, have rather thought it to be Bacchus, the god of drunkenness; but in either acceptance it may be supposed to represent either Noah or Lot.—Jarvis's History of Doctrines and Worship, part 4.

looked upon such representations more lively and affecting than any that proceeded from the mouth only could be.

When the prophet was sent to anoint Jehu to be king of Israel, the question which the rest of the captains put to him, ¹ 'Wherefore came this mad fellow to thee?' sufficiently indicates their scorn and contempt of him: and, in like manner, Ahijah might have addressed himself to a man of Jeroboam's haughty spirit to small purpose, had he not, by some previous action, drawn his observation, and made him attentive to the message he was going to deliver. Now, if any such symbolical act was necessary at this time, the tearing of his garment was more proper than any, because, in the case of Saul, Samuel had applied it to denote the alienation of his kingdom: ² 'The Lord hath rent the kingdom of Israel from thee this day, and hath given it to a neighbour of thine, that is better than thou: and if rending the garment was no insignificant symbol upon this occasion, the newer the garment was, the more it would declare, that what the prophet did was by a divine command, and upon mature deliberation.

This may, in some measure, suffice to rescue Ahijah from the imputation of madness, in tearing his garment to pieces. And to come now, in the last place, to the case of the other prophet who came from Judah to denounce judgments against the altar of Bethel, and was slain in his return, for disobeying the divine injunction, this we may think was a small offence, that hardly deserved so severe a fate; but then we should do well to consider, that ³ whenever God, in an extraordinary manner discovers his will to a prophet, he always makes such a sensible impression upon his mind, that he cannot but perceive himself actuated by a divine spirit; and, consequently, cannot but be assured of the evidence of his own revelation. This evidence the prophet that was sent to Bethel had; for as he was able, by the power that was given him, to work miracles, he could not but be sensible of his divine mission, and that the particular injunction, of 'his not eating or drinking in the town of Bethel,' was as much the will of God as any other part of his commission.

Now, the design of God, in this prohibition, was, to express his abhorrence of that idolatrous place; and therefore the other pretended revelation of the ^b old prophet who lived therein, was justly to be suspected, not only because it was repugnant to God's main design, but because it came from a person who had given no great testimony of his sincerity in choosing to live in a place notoriously infected with idolatry, and yet making no public remonstrances against it. The consideration of this one circumstance should have made the young prophet diffident of what the other told him, at least till he had shown him some divine testimony to convince him; for it argued a great deal of levity, if not infidelity of his own revelation, to listen to that of another man, in contradiction to what he had abundant reason to believe was true.

The short of the matter is:—The prophet from Judah had sufficient evidence of the truth of his own revelation; had sufficient cause to suspect some corrupt ends in the prophet that came to recall him; and had sufficient reason to expect an interposition of the same power that gave him the injunction to repeal it. And therefore his crime was an easy credulity, or complying with an offer merely to gratify a petulant appetite, that he knew was repugnant to a divine command; and the lesson we are to learn from God's severity in this instance is:—Not to suffer our faith to be perverted by any suggestions that are made against a revelation that is of uncontested divine authority, but ⁴ 'if an angel from heaven,' as the Apostle puts the case, should preach any other gospel,

¹ 2 Kings ix. 11. ² 1 Sam. xv. 28. ³ Stillingfleet's Orig. Sacrae. and to impress it on the memory. Herodotus informs us (b. iii. c. 46.) that the Samians, in their distress, having arrived at Sparta, and obtained an audience of the magistrates, made a long speech in the language of suppliants; to which they received for answer, that "the beginning of their discourse was already forgotten, and the conclusion of it not understood." At a second interview the Samian orators simply produced an empty leathern bag, saying, that it contained no bread; to which the Spartans replied, that they observed the bag and determined to assist them. Again, we are told by Clemens Alexandrinus, as quoted by Bishop Warburton, that "Identhura, a king of the Scythians, as Pherecydes Syrus relates the story, when ready to oppose Darius, who had passed the Ister, sent to the Persian a symbol instead of letters, namely, a mouse, a frog, a bird, a dart, and a plough," or, as it is otherwise reported, five darts, without the plough. This symbol was understood by Gobryas, one of the Persian chiefs, to signify that the army of Darius should never recross the Ister, unless like birds they could fly into the air, like mice burrow in the earth, or like frogs take refuge in marshes. (See Herodotus, b. iv. c. 13.) As the symbol is mentioned by Clemens, I should think its meaning was, that the Scythians would dispute every inch of ground, and at last leave the country a barren desert to the Persians, rather than submit to their yoke. But whatever be the precise meaning of this particular symbol, it is obvious, that in those ages all important messages were at least accompanied by significant actions. They still are so among all savage nations; and Bishop Warburton has clearly traced the practice from its origin in necessity. Where languages are rude and confined, speakers are obliged to call in the aid of significant actions to make themselves understood; and as every impression made through the eye takes a faster hold of the mind than impressions made through the medium of the other senses, orators have in all ages, and in every country, given force to their speeches, by what was originally necessary to make scanty and equivocal languages understood.—See Divine Legislation, b. iv. sect. 4; and b. vi. sect. 5. with the note G. at the end of that book.—Bishop Glegg.—Ep.

^b The learned are divided in their sentiments concerning this prophet at Bethel. Some will needs have him to have been a false prophet, highly in esteem with king Jeroboam, because he prophesied to him soft things, and such as would humour him in his wickedness. To this purpose they tell us, that going to visit the king one day, and finding him in a deep concern upon account of the menaces and reproaches which the man of God from Judah had denounced against him, he undertook to persuade him, that that prophet was an impostor, and to elude the force of the miracle he had wrought, by telling him, that there was nothing extraordinary in his altar's falling down, considering that it was new built, not thoroughly settled, loaded with sacrifices, and heated with fire. And as for the matter of his arm, that was occasioned only by his having overwrought himself in pulling the sacrifices along, and lifting them up upon the altar, which might make his hand numb for a while, but, upon a little rest, it came to itself again; and so, with plausible distinctions, and loose insinuations, he shuffed off the miracle, and made the king more obdurate in wickedness than ever. Others think more favourably of the old prophet, namely, that he was a true prophet of God, though some say a wicked one, not unlike the famous Balaam, who sacrificed every thing to his profit. Whilst others say, he was a weak one, who thought he might innocently employ an officious lie to bring the prophet of Judah back, who was under a prohibition indeed, but such a one, as in his opinion, related only to the house of Jeroboam, and such others as were of an idolatrous religion.—Josephus's Jewish Antiquities, b. 8. c. 3.

than what we have received, to detest and denounce him accused.'

Here, however, we may take occasion to admire the unsearchable secrets of the divine justice. Jeroboam revolts from his lawful sovereign, forsakes the worship of the true God, engages the people in gross idolatry, and is himself hardened with the menaces and miracles of the prophet that was sent to him. A false prophet deceives an innocent man with a lie, and draws him into an act of disobedience, contrary to his inclination; and yet this wicked Jeroboam, and this seducing prophet, go unpunished, while the other, who might mean no ill perhaps in turning back, is slain by a lion, and his body deprived of the sepulchre of his fathers. We must acknowledge indeed, that the depths of the judgments of God are an abyss that our understandings cannot fathom. But nothing certainly can be a more sensible proof of the truth of another life, and of the eternal recompenses or punishments that attend it, than to see the righteous so rigorously treated here for very slight offences; Moses excluded the land of promise¹ for a diffident thought; ² Lot's wife changed into a statue of salt for her looking back; and ³ David, for a vain curiosity, punished with the death of no less than seventy thousand of his subjects. And if God be thus severe to his own servants; ⁴ 'if judgment thus begins at the house of God, where shall the ungodly and the sinner appear?' As sentence against every evil man, therefore, is not speedily executed, this is our proof, this is our assurance, that ⁵ 'God will bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good, or whether it be evil.'

CHAP. III.—Of Solomon's Riches, and his Trade to Ophir.

He who only looks into the map, and there observes, in how small a compass the land of Canaan is comprised, may be apt to think that the kings of that country were petty princes, ruling over an indigent obscure people, unable to bear any great expense, and incapable of making any considerable figure, except now and then, at the head of their armies. But he will soon perceive his mistake, when he comes to reflect on the immense riches which David left his son Solomon; on the vast expense of Solomon's magnificent living; and on the several branches of his revenue, which enabled him to sustain that expense.

The Scripture informs us, that out of the revenues of the crown, David left Solomon, merely for the purpose of building the temple, ⁶ 'a hundred thousand talents of gold, and a thousand thousand talents of silver;' out of his privy purse, ⁷ 'three thousand talents of gold, and seven thousand talents of silver;' and out of the benevolence of the princes, ⁸ 'five thousand talents, and ten thousand drams of gold, and ten thousand talents of silver.' Now, since it is generally agreed, that a talent of silver was equivalent to three hundred and forty-two pounds, three shillings, and ninepence; and a talent of gold amounted to no less than five thousand four hundred and twenty-five pounds sterling, what an immense sum must all these talents of gold and silver amount to? Some of the best authors of weights and measures have computed, that if all the walls, pavements, lining, and covering of the temple had been made of massy gold, even with the wages of the workmen and vessels belonging to it, they would not have come up to the value here specified; and therefore, upon this supposition, they have advanced a notion, that the Hebrews had two kinds of talents; a larger, which was called 'the talent of the sanctuary,' and a smaller, which was the common talent, and one half less than the other, by which all such exorbitant sums, as they say, ought to be reckoned. But what grounds they have for this distinction we cannot perceive,⁹ since it nowhere appears, either in the Scriptures, or in any other history, that the Jews, especially before the captivity of Babylon, had any more talents than one; and that their talent, whether of silver or gold, arose to a sum tantamount to what we have stated it at, there are several instances in the Old Testament, that may convince us.

To this purpose we may observe, that when Amaziah, king of Judah, hired a hundred thousand men out of Israel, to fight against the Edonites, he gave no more than ¹⁰ an hundred talents of silver for them, which would have been but a very trifling price indeed, had the talent here been of less value than three thousand shekels: that when Omri, king of Israel, bought the mountain whereon was built the city of Samaria, he paid for it no more than ¹¹ two talents of silver; and yet these two talents were ten thousand nine hundred and fifty pounds, a proper sum for such a purchase; that when Sennacherib king of Assyria had obliged Hezekiah to pay him ¹² three hundred talents of silver, and thirty talents of gold, that good king exhausted, not only his own treasure, and the treasure of the house of the Lord, but was forced likewise to cut the gold off from the doors and pillars of the temple: and to name no more, that when Pharaoh Necho ¹³ 'put the land to a tribute of an hundred talents of silver, and a talent of gold,' Jehoiakim was necessitated to levy a tax extraordinary upon his subjects, that every one might contribute according to his power: but neither of these remarks, namely, that these two kings were thus straitened about the payment, would the sacred historian have made, had the talent in his days, been of considerably less value ¹⁴ than Moses is known to rate it at. So that, upon the whole, we may conclude, that the Hebrew talent continued always the same, and amounted to a much greater sum, than those who are for debasing its value are willing to allow.

But, if the talent must be reckoned at so high a rate, how can we imagine, that David, who had no estate from his family, and whose dominions were far from being extensive, could ever be able to amass such an immense quantity of wealth? Now, in answer to this, we should do well to consider, that, even before the death of Saul, David was at the head of some brave troops, with whom he used to make inroads into the enemies' country, and frequently bring from thence large booty; that, after Saul's death, he reigned forty years in all, and, in that space, made it his business to heap up riches, especially when he came to understand, that God had appointed his son and successor to build him a temple; that, in the time of his reign, he had wars with the Syrians, the Philistines, the Ammonites, the Moabites, and several other nations, from whom he returned always victorious, and always laden with their treasures, and a rich spoils; that, by this means, he enlarged his dominions, as far as ¹ the promise made to Abraham extends, even from the river Euphrates to the Mediterranean sea, on the one side, and to the Nile on the other; that the countries which he subdued, and made tributary to him, such as Arabia, Phœnicia, Mesopotamia, Idumæa, &c. were exceedingly rich, and productive of several mines of gold and other metals; and that the tributes which were wont to be exacted upon such occasions, were either annual imposts, or vast sums of money at once: if we may consider, I say, the spoils which he took from conquered nations, and the tribute which he raised from such as submitted to his empire, we shall have no cause to wonder at his leaving such immense treasures to his son.

But, besides these revenues from abroad, he had a large income from the taxes which his own subjects annually paid him, and the improvements he made of his own estates; which in those days were accounted, not only lawful and allowable, but even honourable and commendable in princes, as well as others. The sacred history has preserved ² the names of the officers whom he employed in this capacity; and, from the different provinces wherein they acted, we may, in some measure, form a judgment of the largeness of this branch of his income. He had officers set over the labourers, who were to till his grounds; officers to take care of the dressing of his vines, olive, and fig-trees; officers to inspect the gathering of his fruits, and the managery of wine and oil cellars; officers to look to the feeding of his camels and asses, his herds of cattle, and flocks of sheep; and officers who were to attend to the selling and exportation of all these. For David, we must know, had the command of the Mediterranean sea, and had established a commerce with the Phœnicians, Egyptians, Syrians, Philistines, and other nations, who took off his camels, asses, oxen, sheep, wine, corn, oil, fruits, and other commodities, in large quantities, and at very advantageous prices: all which, being put together, will make the amount of what David left his son no less than what the sacred writer has recorded.

was at in his chariots, in his horses, in his camels, in his armies, in his shipping, in his buildings, in his furniture, in his servants, for his table, and for his women, which came at length to no less than a thousand, and all to be maintained in the port of queens, we can hardly think, that a small revenue would ever have been sufficient to answer all these demands.

The Scripture indeed informs us, that Solomon's annual income was ⁴ 'six hundred, threescore and six talents of gold, besides what he had of the merchantmen, and of the traffic of spice-merchants, and of all the kings of Arabia, and of all the governors of the country:' but these six hundred threescore and six talents of gold ⁵ are thought, by most interpreters, to be no more than what arose from the tribute which he imposed upon conquered nations; over and above which he had a yearly tax paid by his own subjects; duties upon the import or export of all merchandise; mines of gold and silver, and other metals; the voluntary presents of other princes; and a trade to Ophir and Tarshish, which brought him in riches inestimable.

These were two branches of profit which his father had not, at least not in the same extent. Of the former it is said, that ⁶ 'every man that came to hear Solomon's wisdom, brought his present, vessels of silver, and vessels of gold, and garments, and armour, and spices, and horses, and mules,' and continued to do the same every year; and of the latter that he sent ⁷ vessels to Ophir, which, in one voyage, 'brought him four hundred and fifty talents of gold, together with alnug-trees, and precious stones;' and to Tarshish likewise, 'which brought gold, and silver, and ivory, and apes, and peacocks;' and as, by this means, he came to surpass all the kings of the earth for riches, it may be worth our while to inquire a little where the places, which produced such plenty of wealth, were in ancient times situated, and both how, and by whom, a trade so very advantageous might probably be carried on.

Amidst the vast variety of opinions concerning the situation of these two famous places, Ophir and Tarshish, ⁸ the learned Grotius has suggested a good expedient, one would think, how to find them out; namely, by considering what commodities were brought from thence, and then inquiring of merchants, who have been in the remoter parts of the world, where not only gold and precious stones, but ivory likewise, and alnug-trees, and whatever else we read of, was brought from thence, and is now to be found. But this expedient will not do; not only because the seats of traffic are frequently changing, and any country may, in time, be exhausted of the commodities it once abounded with; but because it is no easy matter to tell by the imperfect description we have of them, of what distinct species some of these commodities were. ⁹ The alnug-tree, for instance has been a puzzle to most interpreters; nor are they yet agreed, whether it was the coral, ebony, Brazil, pine, or citron wood; nay, some will have it to have been no particular tree at all, but only a general name for any wood whatever, that was excellent in its kind:

⁴ Besides the personal ornaments worn by those who went to battle in the eastern nations, it was customary to adorn their weapons and utensils of war with the richest metals. We learn from the history of David, that the Syrians, whom he subdued and slew in vast multitudes, wore shields of gold; and therefore we need not doubt, but that their quivers, the handles of their swords, &c., were of the same metal. He was victorious in about twenty battles over the richest enemies in the world; and therefore their personal spoils, rich arms, military chests, and gods of gold and silver, always carried to battle with them, could not but amount to an immense sum; and, in all probability, the spoils of their cities and countries to a much greater.—The History of the Life of King David.

and how then can those commodities, that are of so indefinite a signification, be any characteristic to the situation of any country?

Nor is there much more certainty to be gathered from the names of the places we are in quest of; for, though it be allowed, that Ophir was the country which at first was peopled by Ophir, one of Joktan's sons, who are said¹ to have inhabited the country from Mesha to Sephar, a mountain in the east; yet, where Mesha and Sephar are to be placed, we know no more than we do where Ophir lies. And, in like manner, though Tarshish may be supposed by some, to be a town or country, not far distant from Ophir, yet others will have it to be no proper name at all, but by ships of Tarshish, or from Tarshish, understand no more than vessels able to bear a long voyage, that is, large merchant ships, in opposition to small craft, intended for home trade in navigable rivers. So incompetent are the marks whereby we may descry the true situation of these unknown places! And therefore we can expect no other, but that the conjectures of learned men about them should be widely distant.

In relation to the land of Ophir, which is more particularly under our inquiry, Josephus and from him many others, places it in the Indies, in a country which he calls the golden coast, not unlikely the Chersonesus Aurea, known now by the name of Malacca, and is a peninsula opposite to Sumatra. The learned Bochart contends hard for the isle Taprobane, so famous among the ancients, which is now called Ceylon, and lies in the kingdom of Malabar, because this place (as he tells us) abounds with gold, ivory, and precious stones. Arius Montanus will needs remove it into Armenia; and when Christopher Columbus at first discovered the island Hispaniola in 1492, he used to make his boast, that he had found the Ophir of Solomon, because he perceived deep caverns in the earth, from whence he supposed that prince might have dug his gold. F. Calmet is no less singular in his opinion. He places Ophir somewhere in Armenia, not far from the sources of the Tigris and Euphrates;² and, to obviate the objection of the country's not bordering on the sea, and not being at distance enough for a three years' voyage, he supposes, that Solomon's fleet made a trading voyage of it; that in no one place it met with all the commodities it brought home; but, on the coast of Ethiopia, took in apes, ebony, and parrots; in Arabia, ivory and spices, and at Ophir, or the place of traffic where the people of Ophir resorted, gold: and though this Ophir might be no maritime country, yet this hinders not, says he, why the gold which it produced might not be brought by land carriage to some part of the Tigris or Euphrates, which, at that time, were a great way navigable. Grotius, as well as Calmet, is of opinion, that Solomon did not send his fleet to any part, either of the East or West Indies, but only to a part of Arabia, by Arian called Aphar, by Pliuy, Saphar, and by Ptolemy, Sapphera, situate on the main ocean; and that the Indians brought down their merchandises thither, to be bought by Solomon's factors, and shipped on board his fleet. And to name no more, of Africa, and more particularly, was that small country which is called Sophala; that Solomon's fleet went out of the Red sea, and from the harbour of Ezion-Geber, entered into the Mediterranean, by a canal of communication which joined the two seas; and that, having doubled the Cape of Guadarfay, and coasted along the African shore, it came at length to Sophala, and there met with plenty of all the merchandises and curiosities that the sacred history specifies.

Which of these conjectures, for conjectures they are all, make the nearest approaches to truth, it is hard to determine; only we may adventure to say,³ that, if any part of Arabia did furnish the world, in those days, with the best gold, and in the greatest quantity, as some good authors seem to say, they who would have the Ophir of the Holy Scriptures to be there situated, seem of all others, to have the best foundation for their conjecture; especially considering that the use of the compass not being then known, the way of navigation was, in those days, by coasting, which would carry a ship into Africa much better than either into the East or West Indies.

Before the reign of king David, to inquire a little into this history of the Ophir trade among the Hebrews, the Hebrews did not much apply themselves to maritime affairs. From the time of Joshua they had been almost perpetually engaged in wars, and had therefore had no leisure or opportunity to think of navigation. The Tyrians and Phœnicians were then in possession of all the commerce of the Mediterranean; and on the main ocean the Hebrews had not the least footing until David made a conquest of Idumea, and thereby became master of two sea port towns on the Red sea, Elah and Ezion-Geber; and seeing the advantage that might be made of the situation of these two places, wisely took the benefit of it, and there began this traffic.

After the death of his father, Solomon continued the trade to Ophir from these two ports, whither himself went in person; and having ordered more ships to be built, and the harbours to be repaired and fortified, he settled every thing else that might tend to the effectual carrying on of this traffic, not only to Ophir, but to all other parts to which the sea whereon those ports lay opened him a passage. But his chief care was to plant in those two towns such inhabitants as were best qualified to carry on his design; for which reason he brought thither, from the sea coasts of Palestine, as many sailors as he could get, but especially of the Tyrians, with whom his good friend and ally, king Hiram, supplied him in great numbers: so that in a short time he drew to these two ports, and from thence to Jerusalem, all the trade of Africa, Arabia, Persia, and India, which was the chief fountain of the immense riches for which his reign was so renowned.

After the division of the kingdom, the kings of Judah, who kept possession of these ports in Idumea, still carried on the trade, especially from Ezion-Geber, which they chiefly made use of until the time of Jehoshaphat; who having prepared a fleet to go to Ophir, in conjunction with Ahaziah king of Israel, had the misfortune to have them destroyed and dashed to pieces against a ridge of rocks which lay at the mouth of the harbour, before they could get to sea, which gave him such a distate against the place, that, from thenceforward, the station of his ships was at Elah, for from thence we read of his sending out a fleet next year for Ophir.

¹ When Jehoram succeeded his father Jehoshaphat, God, for the punishment of his exceeding great wickedness, suffered the Idumeans to revolt from him; who, having expelled his viceroy, chose them a king of their own, and, under his conduct, regaining their ancient liberty, they soon recovered the two ports of Elah and Ezion-Geber: but even while they had them, there was an interruption in the Ophir trade, until Uzziah king of Judah having retaken Elah, in the beginning of his reign, fortified it anew, peopled it with his own subjects, and restored the old traffic to Ophir, which continued all along until the wicked reign of Ahaz.

In the reign of Ahaz, Rezin king of Damascus, being assisted by Pekah king of Israel, took Elah by surprise; and having driven out the Jews that were settled there, put Syrians in their place, and was thinking of carrying on this trade, which the kings of Judah had been so enriched by, to his own advantage; when, the very next year, Tiglath-Pileser, king of Assyria, having by the procurement of Ahaz, invaded Damascus, and conquered Rezin, took possession of Elah, and reserved the property of trade to himself: so that the Jews, from thenceforward, had never any portion in it, which proved a great diminution to their wealth.

How the Assyrians managed this traffic, while it continued in their hands, or where they fixed their principal mart for it, we are nowhere told. In process of time, we find it wholly engrossed by the Tyrians, who, from the same port of Elah, by way of a ² town on the confines of Egypt and Palestine, made it all centre in Tyre, and from thence furnished all the western part of the world with the wares of Persia, India, Africa, and Arabia, to the great enriching of themselves, as long as the Persian empire subsisted, under the favour and protection of whose kings they enjoyed the full possession of this trade. ³ But when the Ptolemies prevailed in Egypt, by building several ports on the Egyptian or western side of the Red Sea, for Elah and Ezion-Geber lay on the eastern, and, by sending from thence fleets to all those countries where the Tyrians traded from Elah, they soon drew all this trade into their kingdom, and there fixed the chief mart of it at Alexandria, where it continued for a great many ages, until a way was found out, ⁴ about two centuries and a half ago, of sailing to those parts by the way of the Cape of Good Hope; after which, the Portuguese, for some time, managed this trade; but now the greatest share of it is fallen into the hands of the English and Dutch.

five and thirty years of age, succeeded him in the kingdom of Judah, and, in all acts of piety, as well as the reformation of religion, imitated, if not excelled, ^b the former part of his father's reign. At his first accession to the throne, he expressed his zeal for God's service, in the extirpation of those Sodomites, and the destruction of those idolatrous ^c high places and groves which remained in his father's reign; and perceiving that the people were grossly ignorant of the law, after he had fortified his frontier towns, and put his kingdom in a good posture of defence, he sent itinerant priests and Levites through all his dominions, with letters to the princes, and heads of each family, to receive them kindly, and to encourage them in expounding the law, and instructing his subjects in the knowledge of their duty.

By these means, he soon gained the hearts of his people, who, to support the dignity of his government, ^d

among the Israelites, like those of our nobility. Every one was called plainly by his own name: but their names signified great things, as those of the patriarchs. The name of God was part of most; which was in a manner a short prayer. Elijah and Joel are made up of two of God's names, joined in a different way. Jehoshaphat and Shephatiah signify the judgment of God: Jehozedek and Zedekiah, his justice: Johanan, his mercy, Nathanael, Elnathan, Jonathan and Nathaniah, all four, signify, God given, or the gift of God. Sometimes the name of God was understood, as in Nathan, David, Obed, &c., as is plain by Eliezer, God my helper: Uzziel, God my strength; and Obadiah, the Lord's servant. The Greek names also are of the same import; many are composed of the names of their gods; as Diodorus, Diogenes, Hermodorus, Hæphestion, Athenais, and Artemisia. ^e—Fleury's History of the Israelites, p. 20.—Ed.

^b In 2 Chron. xvii. 3. mention is made of the first ways of his father David; but it may very well be questioned, whether the word David be not slipped in here by the fault of some transcriber, in the place of Asa, because in 1 Kings xxii. 43, as likewise in 2 Chron. xx. 32, Asa is named, and not David. Now it is very well known, that in the beginning of his reign, Asa was very religious, but fell from his piety towards the conclusion of it; and therefore the sacred historian, by observing that Jehoshaphat followed his father in what he was in his first days, and not in his old age, might intend a just reflection upon Asa for his growing more negligent and remiss in the service of God, towards the decline of his life.—Patrick's Commentary; and Havel's History in the notes. [The word David is wanting in the Septuagint and six MSS. Boothroyd omits it, and considers it most probable that Asa is the true reading.—Ed.]

^c It is said of his father Asa likewise, that he removed the high places, together with the idols and the groves, which his father and mother had made, 1 Kings xv. 12, &c.: but then we are to observe, as we have noted before, that there were high places and groves of two sorts; some for the worship of the true God, which continued in Judah even under religious princes; and others for the worship of idols, which good kings took away, even though they left the other standing. The high places and groves of this latter kind, were those which Asa destroyed; but because towards the conclusion of his reign, when he grew more infirm in body, and more remiss in God's cause, some of his subjects, out of their vile attachment to idols, had made new ones, Jehoshaphat, upon his accession to the throne, had occasion enough to begin a reformation in this particular as well as many others.—Patrick's Commentary on 1 Kings xviii. 30; and Pool's Annotations on 2 Chron. xvii. 6.

^d It was customary for subjects to make their oblations to their princes, especially at the commencement of their reigns. It is said of some disaffected people, that they brought Saul no presents, even though he had been recognised as king, (1 Sam. x. 27.) But by the presents here spoken of, we may not improperly understand the tribute and customs which his subjects were obliged to pay him; only it was thought proper to call them presents, or voluntary gifts, as a name of a less odious sound and import, than that of tributes.—Calmet's Commentary on 2 Chron. xviii. 5.

A. M. 3301. A. C. 1003; OR, ACCORDING TO HALES, A. M. 4182. A. C. 929. 1 KINGS viii. TO THE END OF 2 CHRON.

brought him presents from every quarter, ^a and struck such a terror into his enemies, that instead of invading his dominions, the Philistines came voluntarily, and paid him a tribute, which had been suspended for some years, and the Arabians, whose riches consisted in cattle, sent him always seven thousand seven hundred rams, and an equal number of he goats, as an annual acknowledgment of their homage. For Jehoshaphat took care to make himself strong in arms, as well as wealth, having an army of above eleven hundred thousand men, ^b besides those that were in garrisons, and such fortified places as he had well furnished with plenty of all military stores.

In short, Jehoshaphat was rich and happy, great and honourable, beloved by his subjects, and revered by his enemies; only there was this great blemish in his reign, that he ^c married his son Jehoram to Athaliah, daughter to Ahab, king of Israel, which both displeased God, and involved him and his family in sundry troubles: but of these hereafter.

This Ahab, as we said, was one of the wickedest princes, and the most abominable idolaters, that ever sat on the throne of Israel: for he not only continued the worship of the calves which Jeroboam had set up, but having married Jezebel, the daughter of ^d Eth-baal, king of Tyre, to pleasure this woman he introduced the idolatry paid to the ^e god Baal, built him a temple in Samaria,

^a His enemies could not but be sensible, that it was in vain to assault him, while he continued firm in his religion; for they must have observed, that the prosperity of all the kings of Judah depended on that, and that they never fell into the hands of their enemies, but when they had first fallen from God.—Patrick's Commentary.

^b This is such a prodigious number that no judicious critic will attempt to defend it, and besides if Jehoshaphat was possessed of so great a force, it is not easy to account for the alarm which he felt when told that the Moabites and Ammonites were coming against him. Also in his prayer, uttered on that occasion, he says, 'We have no might against this great company that cometh against us, neither know we what to do.'—See Kennicott's Dissertation.—Ep.

^c The only shadow of excuse that can be alleged in behalf of Jehoshaphat's marrying his son in this manner, might be a fond conceit, that in case Ahab should die without issue male, he might have a chance to reunite the two kingdoms of Israel and Judah; but in this piece of worldly policy he found himself sadly disappointed.—Calmet's Commentary.

^d Eth-baal, or Ithobal, as he is called by profane writers, does equally signify the strength of Baal. In the catalogue of the kings of Tyre, he is said to be the eighth; and as both Tyre and Sidon were, from the beginning, subject to the same king, it is not improbable, that their kings resided sometimes at the one, and sometimes at the other city, and were therefore called the kings of Tyre or Sidon promiscuously. As the character of king and priest were frequently united in the same person, so is he supposed to have been the high priest of Astarte or Ashtaroth, the goddess of the Sidonians; and for this reason perhaps his daughter was so violently attached to that kind of idolatry, that when she came into power, she was for utterly extirpating all the priests and prophets of the Lord. The truth is, this queen was a monster in her kind; and therefore the name of Jezebel has passed into a proverb, to denote any cruel, impious, and impious woman.—Calmet's Commentary on 1 Kings xvi. 31.

^e Baal, in the Hebrew tongue, signifies Lord, and as Selden observes, was anciently the name of the true God, until the world grew wicked, and came to apply it to the sun; in after ages, to other stars; and in process of time, to any of their kings whose memory was dear to them. The same author observes, that the Phœnician Belus, or Baal, was the same with the European Jupiter, and as Sidon was situate on the sea side, their Baal was called by the Greeks the Jupiter of the sea. But more of erected an altar, and ^f made a grove, where all kinds of impurities were committed, the more effectually to proselyte the vicious and debauched to a religion so agreeable to their lusts; and as an instance of the daring impiety of this age, one Hiel, who lived at Bethel, the famous seat of all idolatry, ^g adventured to rebuild Jericho, in defiance of the curse which Joshua had pronounced above four hundred and fifty years before, against any man that should attempt it. But the presumptuous wretch found to his cost, that Joshua's prediction was verified in him, when he saw his eldest son die, as soon as he had begun the work, the rest of his children drop off; as he continued it, and his youngest son taken away at last, when he had completed it.

In the midst of this bold impiety, Israel however had the happiness to be blessed with an eminent prophet, Elijah, the ^h Tishbite, an inhabitant of Gilead, on the other side of Jordan; who being grieved to see such a general apostasy from the true religion, ⁱ prayed ear-this you may see in the writings of that great man.—Selden on the gods of Syria.

^f The Jewish law was so far from permitting men to plant any such groves, that it enjoins all its professors to destroy them: 'Ye shall destroy their altars, and break down their images, and cut down their groves, and burn their graven images with fire,' (Deut. vii. 5;) and therefore, though Josephus imputes the erection of these to the impiety of his wife Jezebel, who (as he tells us, Jewish Antiq. b. viii. c. 7.) "was a woman of a bold, enterprising humour, and of so impetuous and ungovernable a spirit, that she had the confidence to build a temple to Baal, the god of the Tyrians, to plant groves, for superstition, of all sorts of trees, and to appoint her priests and false prophets expressly for that idolatrous service;" yet her husband was nevertheless culpable for giving her that indulgence.

^g Jericho was one of the first places that Joshua took in the land of Canaan; and when he took it, he laid it under a Cherem, that it should never be rebuilt: but it is presumable, that as the sacred history was then very little read, Hiel might either be ignorant of this interdiction, or being a professed idolater himself, might probably, at the instigation of Jezebel, or to gain the favour of the court, do it in defiance of God, and to let the world see, that whatever was denounced in his name was of no significance at all, and for this reason met with his condign punishment.—Patrick's and Calmet's Commentaries.

^h Thesbe was a town on the other side of Jordan, in the tribe of Gad, and in the land of Gilead, where this prophet was born, or at least inhabited for some time. Since the Scripture makes no mention, either of the quality of his parents, the manner of his education, or his call to the prophetic office, some Jewish doctors have been of opinion, that he was an angel sent from heaven, in the midst of the general corruption of the world, to preserve the true worship of God. Others pretend, that he was a priest descended from the tribe of Aaron; that his father's name was Sabaca, and his birth altogether miraculous: whilst others again will needs have it, that he was Phinehas, the son of Aaron, who after having lived a long while concealed, appeared again in the world under the name of Elijah. But where the Scripture is silent, all particulars of this kind are of small authority. This, however, may be said with safety of him, that he was one of the chief, if not the prince of the prophets of his age; a man of a great and elevated soul, of a generous and undaunted spirit, a zealous defender of the laws of God, and a just avenger of the violation of his honour.—Calmet's Commentary.

ⁱ St James's words are these:—'Elias was a man subject to the like passions as we are; and he prayed earnestly that it might not rain, and it rained not on the earth for the space of three years and six months.' Our blessed Saviour makes mention of the like compass of time, (Luke iv. 25,) and yet neither of these are contradictory to what the sacred history tells us, namely, 'That the word of the Lord came to Elijah in the third year,' (1 Kings xviii. 1.) For we must remember, that as Egypt had no rain, but was watered by the river Nile; so the land of Canaan had generally none, except twice a year, which they called 'the nestly to God, that he would lay bare his arm, and show some visible token of his displeasure against so wicked a people: and accordingly, in a short time, he was sent to Ahab to let him know, that God intended to bring a sore famine, occasioned by want of rain,^a upon the land, which should last for above three whole years.

When the drought had continued some time, and the divine threat began to operate, Elijah retired to the ^b brook Cherith, where he concealed himself for the space of a whole year, and was miraculously fed by the ravens, which brought him bread and flesh twice every day, and for his drink he had the water of the brook; but when the water of the brook began to fail, God directed him to go to ^c Zarephtha, a town belonging to the territories of Sidon, where he had appointed a widow woman to entertain him.

early and latter rain.³ The former of these was in the month Nisan, which answers to our March; and the other in the month Marchesvan, which answers to our October. Now, at the beginning of the drought, Ahab might very probably impute the want of rain to natural causes; but when, after six months, neither the former nor the latter rain fell in their season, he then began to be enraged at Elijah, as the cause of the national judgment, and forced him, at God's command, to save his life by flight: and from that time the three years in the historian are to be computed, though from the first notice which Elijah gave Ahab of this approaching calamity, to the expiration of it, were certainly three years and a half. This calamity is said to have been procured by Elijah's prayers; but we must not therefore imagine, that his prayers were spiteful and malicious, but necessary rather, and charitable to the offenders; that by the sharp and long affliction which they produced, God's honour, and the truth of his word and threatenings, which was now universally contemned, might be vindicated; and that the Israelites, whose present impunity hardened them in their idolatry, might hereby be awakened to see their wickedness, their dependence upon God, and the necessity of their returning to his religion and worship.—Bedford's Scripture Chronology, b. 6. c. 2; and Poole's Annotations.

^a It is worthy of remark, that according to Menander, there occurred in the reign of Eth-baal, king of Tyre an extremely severe drought, which lasted from the month Hyperbeteus till the same month in the following year. After prayers were put up for averting the judgment with which the land was threatened, there ensued mighty claps of thunder, and, we may presume, a copious rain. As Eth-baal was contemporary with Ahab, the reader cannot fail to identify the drought now mentioned, with that which gave celebrity to the ministerial functions of the prophet Elijah.—Russell's Connexion, b. 2. c. 2.—Ed.

^b The brook Cherith, and the valley through which it runs, are both very near the river Jordan; but whether on the east or west side of the river, it is not so well agreed. Eusebius, or at least St Jerome, places it beyond Jordan, and so on the east side of it, but others generally agree in placing it on the west side, because God, in sending away Elijah, says to him, 'Get thee hence, and turn thee eastward, and hide thyself by the brook Cherith, that is before Jordan,' (1 Kings xvii. 3.) where the expression 'turn thee eastward,' seems to imply, that Elijah was on the west side of Jordan, for had he been on the east side, then to have gone to the brook, which ran on that side Jordan, would have been to have turned westward.—Wells's Geography of the Old Testament, vol. iii.

^c Zarephtha, or as it is called in the New Testament, Sarepta, was a town which lay between Tyre and Sidon, but somewhat nearer to the latter. Mr Maundrell, in his journey from Aleppo to Jerusalem, observes, that it is the same with what is now called Sarphan, distant about three hours' travel from Sidon, in the way to Tyre. Whatever it was formerly, the same author tells us, that at present it consists of no more than a few houses, on the tops of the mountains, about half a mile from the sea; though there is reason to believe, that the principal part of the city stood below, in a space between the hills and the sea, because there are still ruins there to be seen of a very considerable extent.—Wells's Geography of the Old Testament, part 1. c. 5. s. 2.

The famine had spread itself over the country of Sidon, as well as the land of Israel; and therefore, when the prophet drew near the town, he met the widow to whom he was directed; and when he requested of her to give him a little water, and withal a morsel of bread, she solemnly protested to him, that she had but an handful of meal in a barrel,^d and a little oil in a cruise, and was come out to pick up some sticks, wherewith to bake a cake^e for her and her son, which was to be the last meal they were ever like to eat. But the prophet, encouraging her to do as he bid her, gave her assurance, that her meal and her oil should not fail as long as the famine lasted; which accordingly proved true: for of that little store, she, and her son, and the prophet, lived for the space of two years; and when, in this space, her son fell sick and died, Elijah by his prayers restored him to life again, which^f gave the mother full conviction, that he was a person extraordinary sent from God.

After he had lived in this obscurity for above two years, God commanded him to return to the land of Israel, and to present himself before Ahab, because in a short time, he intended to send rain upon the earth. At this time the famine was so extreme about Samaria, that the king commanded ^g Obadiah, one of the officers of his household, and some others with him, to go all over the country in quest of some forage for the subsistence of his cattle; and to see that his orders were fully ex-

^d 1 Kings xvii. 12. As corn is subject to be eaten by worms, the easterns keep what they are spending in long vessels of clay, (Sandys' Travels, p. 117.) So it appears the woman of Zarephtha did. The word translated barrel, properly signifies a jar; and is the same with that used for the vessels in which Gideon's soldiers concealed their torches, and which they brake when they blew with their trumpets.—Harmar, vol. i. p. 277.—Ed.

^e Some of the Hebrew doctors, and herein they are followed by some Christians, are of opinion, that this widow's son was the prophet Jonas; that after his restoration, his mother gave him to Elijah; that ever after he attended on the prophet as long as he lived; and on a certain occasion was despatched by him to Nineveh, as every one knows. But besides that these traditions are destitute of any real proof, Jonah was an Hebrew, as he himself declares, (i. 9.) and a native of Gath-hepher, as we read (2 Kings xiv. 25.) whereas the widow's son was a native of Zarephtha, a town belonging to the kingdom of Sidon, and by birth a stranger to the race of Israel.—Calmet's Commentary.

^f The woman had sufficient reason to believe, that Elijah was a prophet, or person sent from God, when she saw the miraculous increase of the meal and oil; but upon his not curing her son when he lay sick, but rather suffering him to die, her faith began to droop; whereas, upon seeing him revive, her faith revived with him; and through the joy of having him restored to her again, she accounted this latter miracle much greater than the former.—Le Clerc's Commentary.

^g There are some Jewish doctors who think that this Obadiah was the same with him whose writings we have among the twelve minor prophets. They pretend that he was married to that woman of Shunem, where Elisha used to lodge; that he was a disciple of the prophet Elijah, and the last of the three captains whom king Ahaziah sent to apprehend him; and that for this reason he had compassion on him, though he destroyed the others that came before him, with fire from heaven, (2 Kings i. 9, &c.) but all these things are pure apocrypha. Obadiah himself, in his discourse with Elijah, sufficiently tells us who he was, namely, a person truly religious, who worshipped God alone, had a singular affection for his servants; enough, one would think, to have made Ahab disearn, if not persecute him, had he not found him so highly useful in the management of his domestic affairs, as to connive at his not worshipping Baal, or the calves; especially as we read nothing of his going up to Jerusalem, which was a defect that God perhaps might think proper to dispense with.—Calmet and Patrick's Commentaries.

executed, himself went along with some of them.^a Obadiah, of all the king's domestics, was the most religious. He in the time of Jezebel's^b persecuting the prophets of the Lord, concealed an hundred of them, by fifty in a cave, and there sustained them with necessaries. When Elijah met him, Obadiah saluted him with great respect; but when the prophet required him to go and acquaint the king that he was there, and desired to speak with him, Obadiah at first excused himself, upon apprehension that Elijah might vanish, and leave him the object of the king's indignation, who had taken such vast pains to find him out; but when the other assured him that he would not stir, he went and brought the king to him. The king, at the first interview, began to upbraid him with being the cause of the calamity that the nation suffered; but Elijah boldly returned the charge, and having taxed him with the worship of false gods, which was the source of all their wo, he undertook to prove that they were no more than false gods, if so be the king would be pleased to summon all the people to meet upon mount Carmel, and to bring thither the 450 priests of Baal, together with the 400 priests of Astarte, who were supported at Jezebel's table.

Elijah had told Ahab, that 'there should be neither dew nor rain upon the earth, but according to his word;' and therefore the king being persuaded, perhaps, that the national remedy was in his hands, neglected not to issue out writs for the convention of the people, and

^a Of the dreadful extremities to which the inhabitants were reduced, for want of provender for their beasts of burden, an idea may be formed by the extraordinary circumstance of the haughty Ahab proposing to his prime minister Obadiah, to go in person, and by different routes, in search of grass for the horses and mules, both of which were held in the highest estimation. The places where Obadiah was recommended by his royal master to look for provender was in the vicinity of springs and running waters—a recommendation founded on a correct knowledge of the state of the parched and barren regions of the east, where the few spots of verdure that occur are found so generally to afford water, that the presence of the one is almost always a sure indication of the nearness of the other; and the circumstance of two personages of such elevated rank setting out from the palace in search of such places, is one of the strongest proofs that could be given of the simplicity of ancient manners, when the greatest princes were in the habit of stooping to perform the meanest and commonest offices. Among the tribes of Asia and Africa, the same habits are to this day observed by the most powerful chiefs, who are so far from deeming it derogatory to their royal dignity to engage in an expedition to obtain either grass or water, that no employment could be considered more suitable to their character, or more likely to secure for them the good-will and esteem of their subjects.—Jameson's Eastern Manners.—Ed.

^b Elijah, in his appeal to the people, tells them, 'I, even I, only remain a prophet of the Lord,' (1 Kings xviii. 22.) and therefore we can hardly imagine, that all these hundred, whom Obadiah preserved, were men actually inspired and invested with a prophetic character, but only such as were the disciples of the prophets, and candidates for that office. For it is not unlikely, that even to Jezebel's time, there were remaining in Israel schools of the prophets, which she endeavoured to destroy, as well as those that were bred up in them, that there might be none left to instruct the people in the true religion. These she certainly looked upon as enemies to her idolatry, and might possibly persuade her husband, that they were disaffected to his government and favourers of the kings of Judah, because they worshipped the same God, and thought that the proper place of his worship was Jerusalem; and therefore the greater was the piety and courage of Obadiah, in rescuing so many victims from the hands of this furious and enraged woman.—Patrick's and Le Clerc's Commentaries.

ordered the priests to attend. When they were all met together, Elijah, having first upbraided them with their vile prevarication, in mixing the worship of God and the worship of Baal together, made them a fair proposal, to this effect. "Since there can be no more than one infinite, supreme, almighty, and independent being, let us, at this time, make the experiment who this being is. You, who are the worshippers of Baal, have all the advantages on your side, the favour and protection of the court, 450 priests of one kind, and 400 priests of another; whereas I, who am the manager of God's cause, am but one poor banished man; and yet let two oxen be brought before us. Let the priests of Baal choose their ox, dress it, cut it in pieces, lay it on the altar; but let there be no fire thereon; and I, in like manner, will do so to my ox. Let them pray unto their gods, and I likewise will call on the name of Jehovah; and then let the God, who, by consuming the sacrifice^c with a sudden flash of fire, shall make it appear, that he hath heard the prayers, be owned by this whole assembly to be this one, this true, supreme, independent Being."

This was a proposal that none could gainsay; and therefore the priests of Baal prepared their altar, sacrificed their bullock, placed it on the altar, and began to call upon their god: but Baal continuing deaf to their invocations, they betook themselves to odd gesticulations: they sometimes jumped over the altar,^d some-

^c This is not the first time, wherein God had declared his approbation of his worshippers, by sending down fire to consume the sacrifices, (Lev. ix. 24, and Judg. vi. 21.) and though perhaps it may be possible for evil spirits, who may have great knowledge how to manage meteors and exhalations to their purposes, to make fire descend from the clouds; yet, since they can do nothing without a divine permission, it is absurd to think, that, in a matter of competition between him and false gods, he should give evil spirits any license to rival him in his miracles.—Le Clerc's Commentary.

^d 1 Kings xviii. 26. 'They leaped upon the altar which was made.' Baal, whose idolatrous worship is here referred to, was the same as Apollo, or the Sun. Callimachus has given us a remarkable instance of the universal veneration which was paid by the ancient pagans, at his altar in the temple of Delos. Amongst other ceremonies in the worship of this idol, it was customary to run round his altar, to strike it with a whip, and with their hands or arms bound behind them, to bite the olive. For of Delos, the poet says:—

Then, ever-honour'd isle, what vessel dares Sail by regardless? 'twere in vain to plead Strong driving gales, or, stronger still than they,
Swift-wing'd necessity: their swelling sails
Here mariners must furl; nor hence depart.
Till round thy altar, struck with many a blow,
The maze they tread, and backward bent their arms,
The sacred olive bite.

Hymn to Delos, v. 433.

The former part of this ceremony plainly alludes to singing and dancing round the altar. The latter part seems to accord with what is said of Baal, (1 Kings xviii. 26—28.) where we read of the priests of Baal who leaped upon the altar they had made, which the Septuagint renders ran round; 'and they cried aloud, and cut themselves, after their manner, with knives and lancets, till the blood gushed out upon them.' Their running round the altar signified the annual rotation of the earth round the sun. Striking with a whip the altar, cutting themselves with knives and lancets, crying aloud to their deity, were symbolical actions, denoting their desire that he would show forth his power upon all nature in general, and that sacrifice in particular then before him. Having thus surrounded the altar of Apollo, and by these actions declared their belief in his universal power, they used to bend their own arms behind them, and so take the sacred olive into their mouths: thereby declaring, that not their own arm or power which was bound, but from his whose altar they surround-times danced round it, and, according as their custom was, began ^a to cut themselves with knives and lancets, but all to no purpose: whereupon the true prophet ^b fell a bantering and ridiculing them, as justly he might; but their senseless idol knew nothing of the matter.^c

ed, and from him they expected to obtain that peace, whereof the olive was always a symbol. (Gen. viii. 11.) There are some evident allusions to these abominable idolatrous practices in the Old Testament; and for which the Jews are severely reprimanded by the prophets, for following such absurd and wicked ceremonies. 'Thus saith the Lord concerning the prophets that make my people err, that bite with their teeth, and cry, Peace,' (Micah iii. 5:) and respecting Ashdod, the prophet says, 'I will take away his blood out of his mouth, and his abominations from between his teeth.' (Zech. ix. 7.) "Theseus, on his return from Crete, put in at Delos, and having sacrificed to Apollo, and dedicated a statue of Venus, which he received from Ariadne, joined with the young men in a dance, which the Delians are said to practise at this day. It consists in an imitation of the mazes and outlets of the labyrinth; and, with various involutions and evolutions, is performed in regular time. This kind of dance, as Dicaearchus informs us, is called by the Delians the Crane; he danced it round the altar Keraton, which was built entirely of the left side horns of beasts." (Plutarch vita Theseus.) This was a circular dance, and probably called the crane, because cranes commonly fly in the figure of a circle. This dance, after a lapse of 3000 years, still exists in Greece, under the name of the Candiote. See an account of it in M. Guy's Hist. Lit. de la Grece, Lett. 13, and a plate in Leroy Baines des plus beaux monumens de la Grece.—Ed.

^a A strange method, one would think, to obtain the favour of their gods! and yet, if we look into antiquity we shall find, that nothing was more common in the religious rites of several nations than this barbarous custom. To this purpose we may observe, that as Plutarch, on Superstition, tells us, the priests of Belona, when they sacrificed to that goddess, were wont to besmear the victim with their own blood; that the Persian Magi, according to Herodotus (b. 7. c. 191.), used to appease tempests, and allay the winds, by making incisions in their flesh; that they who carried about the Syrian goddess, as Apuleius (b. 8.), relates, among other mad pranks, were, every now and then, cutting and slashing themselves with knives, till the blood gushed out; and that even to this day, some modern travellers tell us, that in Turkey, Persia, and several parts of the Indies, there are a kind of fanatics, who think they do a very meritorious thing, and what is highly acceptable to the deity, in cutting and mangling their own flesh. "But the gods ought not to be worshipped at all," says Seneca, as he is quoted by St Austin de Civ. Dei (b. 6. c. 10.), "if they delight in such. The fury of a restless and excited mind to gain the favour of the gods is so great, that not even the most hideous tyrants can exercise their cruelty so savagely," &c. Calmet's and Le Clerc's Commentaries.

^b The words of the prophet are very cutting and sarcastical. "Cry aloud, for he is a god" no doubt, though he may be deaf, or a great way off, so that he cannot hear unless you cry aloud; or "either he is talking," about business, or "pursuing his pleasures;" or perhaps "he is in a journey, and not at home;" or "peradventure he sleepeth, and must be awakened." The two last notions of "being asleep, and not at home," how absurd soever they may be when applied to the deity, were certainly such as several idolaters conceived of their gods, as appears from these passages in Homer. In the former of these, Thetis, says he, cannot meet with Jupiter, because he was gone abroad, and would not return in less than twelve days. "For Jupiter yesterday went away to a feast among the Æthiopiens, and all the other gods are along with him, but on the twelfth day he will return again to Olympus." And in the conclusion of that book, he shows in what manner the gods went to sleep:—"But Jupiter, the Olympian prince of lightning, went up to his couch, where it was his wont to repose when gentle sleep hung heavily on his eyelids," &c.

^c Elijah's taunts were not the groundless effusions of satire and ridicule, but were founded on the absurd and grovelling notions entertained of the objects of their worship by the heathen; who, both in ancient and modern times, ascribed to their gods all the attributes of humanity; and considered that their favour was to

This farce of devotion they continued till the day was above half spent; when Elijah, desiring the people to draw near, and take twelve stones, according to the number of the tribes, ^d repaired the altar of the Lord, which had been broken down, and then laying his bullock on the wood, ^e poured a great quantity of water three times on the sacrifice, on the wood, and on the altar; so that the water filled the trench, which was dug round the altar to receive it. It was now much about the time of he procured, and their presence and attention obtained, by means similar to those practised in securing the ear and the good-will of men. The heathen deities had all of them certain employments assigned them,—one had the management of the winds, another of the water, the cares of which were supposed necessarily to occupy and distract their minds at particular periods; and some were also engaged in long and distant expeditions, from which they had to return before they could answer the supplications of their votaries.—Even in the present day, the same notions prevail among the heathen, of the limited powers of the deities. Thus Siva, the principal god of the Hindoos, once fell into a profound reverie, which was supposed to be the cause of great public calamities and portentous occurrences that befell the land. On a particular season of the year, he is constantly occupied with the pleasures of the chase, to gratify him with which, his statue, together with that of his favourite wife, is taken from his temple, placed on a car, and carried out to the open fields. Sometimes he suddenly departs on long journeys, and sometimes he falls asleep, which he did on one occasion particularly, when he had assumed the form of a porter, and, wearied with his task, resigned himself under a tree to the influence

—From these circumstances, it appears that the sarcastic observations of the prophet were thrown out in ridicule of the prevailing ideas of the priests and devotees of Baal; and they were rendered the more cutting, by his recommending them 'to cry aloud,' the very last attempt to gain the ear of their deity they would have dreamt of making, as it is considered the greatest impropriety to disturb any one in a temple or sacred place, when he is meditating, or to trouble him when engaged in the pleasures of the chase—in prosecuting a journey, or the enjoyment of repose. The proposal was made by Elijah, as if, in the extremity of their distress, they should break through the ordinary rules of respect for their God, more particularly as the occasion so greatly concerned his honour; and, as if he wished to afford the spectators the strongest proofs, according to the popular notions, of the impotence and insignificance of the idol, to whom they had been taught to prostrate themselves with blind homage.—Jamieson's Eastern Manners.—Ed.

^d The altar, which the sacred author here calls 'the altar of the Lord,' was certainly one of those which were built in the time of the judges, and first kings of Israel; when, for want of a fixed place of worship, such structures were permitted. Both Tacitus (b. 2. c. 74.) and Suetonius, speak of the God of Carmel, whom Vespasian went to consult when he was at Judea. His priest Basilides promised him all manner of prosperity and success in his undertakings; but, as the two historians tell us, there was neither temple nor statue upon the mountain, but one altar only, plain but very venerable for its antiquity. Some are of opinion, that this Basilides was a Jew, and priest of the Most High God; but it seems more reasonable that he was a pagan priest, and probably the same who met Vespasian in the temple of Serapis in Egypt. However this be, the altar of Carmel seems to have had its origin from this altar of the true God, which the ancient Hebrews first erected, and Elijah afterwards repaired; which even the heathens held in such veneration, that when they came to be masters of the country, they would not place so much as an image by it.—Calmet's Commentary.

^e This the prophet did to make the miracle more conspicuous and convincing, to show, that there was no fallacy in it, no fire concealed in or about the altar, but that the lightning, which was to consume the sacrifice, came from heaven, and came at his invocation; for so Josephus tells us, that Elijah invited the people to draw near, even that they might search, and spy everywhere if they could find any fire that was conveyed under the altar.—Jewish Antiquities, b. 8. c. 7; Calmet's and Le Clerc's Commentaries.

offering the evening sacrifice, when, having prepared all things, he approached the altar, and prayed in this manner: 'Lord God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, show this day, that thou art the God of Israel, that I am thy servant, and that it is by thy commandment that I have done this thing.' ^a Hear me, O Lord, hear me, that these people may understand, that thou art the Lord God, and that their hearts may be converted from their idol unto thee.' And no sooner had he ended this short prayer, but a fire fell from heaven, ^b and consumed not only the burnt-offering, but the wood and stones, nay, the very dust of the place, and the water that was in the trench; insomuch, that, when the people saw the miracle, they fell on their faces, and in admiration and acknowledgment of it, owned that the God of Elijah was the true God: ^c whereupon he ordered them to seize on the priests of Baal as a pack of cheats and impostors, to carry them down from the mountain, and to slay them all at the brook Kishon.

After this just execution was finished, the prophet returned to the top of the mountain, from whence he might view the Mediterranean sea; where, having prayed for rain, ^d

^a He was the more earnest and fervent in his prayer, as Abarinel thinks, because he had undertaken to make the experiment of God's power on his own accord, and without any particular command from him, nothing doubting, but that he would appear to vindicate his own honour, even though he offered sacrifice on a high place, which was not agreeable to the law.—Patrick's Commentary. There is no ground whatever, for supposing that Elijah in this affair acted on his own responsibility; on the contrary, he expressly declares in his prayer, that he had acted according to the commandment of God.—Ed.

^b 1 Kings xviii. 38. Bishop Patrick apprehends that God testified his approbation of Abel's sacrifice by a stream of light, or a flame from the shekinah, which burned it up. In this opinion many ancient writers concur; remarking that footsteps of it may be met with in many other cases. (See Gen. xv. 17. Lev. ix. 24. Judg. vi. 21. 1 Chron. xxi. 26. 2 Chron. vii. 13. Ps. xx. 3, marginal reading.) Some relics of it are to be found among the heathen; for when the Greeks went on shipboard to the Trojan war, Homer represents Jupiter promising them good success in this manner. (Iliad, ii. 354.) And thunder sometimes accompanying lightning, Virgil makes him establish covenants in that manner. After Æneas had called the sun to witness, Latinus lifts up his eyes and right hand to heaven, saying, "Let the (heavenly) father hear what I say, who established covenants with thunder." (Æneid, xii. 200.) From some early instances of this kind the heathen seem to have derived their notions, that when a sacrifice took fire spontaneously, it was a happy omen. Pausanias says, that when Seleucus, who accompanied Alexander in his expedition from Macedonia, was sacrificing at Pella to Jupiter, the wood advanced of its own accord towards the image, and was kindled without fire. See also Lev. ix. 24. 1 Chron. xxi. 26. 2 Chron. vii. 1.—Ed.

^c The process of this consumption is very remarkable, and all calculated to remove the possibility of a suspicion that there was any concealed fire. 1. The fire came down from heaven. 2. The pieces of the sacrifices were first consumed. 3. The wood next, to show that it was not even by means of the wood that the flesh was burned. 4. The twelve stones were also consumed, to show that it was no common fire, but one whose agency nothing could resist. 5. The dust, the earth of which the altar was constructed, was burned up. 6. The water that was in the trench, was by the action of this fire entirely evaporated. 7. The action of this fire was in every case downward, contrary to the nature of all earthly and material fire. Nothing can be more simple and artless than this description, yet how amazingly full and satisfactory is the whole account.—Dr J. Clarke,—1*p.*

^d 1 Kings xviii. 42. 'And Elijah went up to the top of Carmel, and he cast himself down upon the earth, and put his face between his knees.' The devout posture of some people of the Levant greatly resembles that of Elijah. Just before the descent of the rain, he cast himself down upon the earth, and put his face between his knees. Chardin relates that the dervises, especially those of the Indies, put themselves into this posture, in order to meditate, and also to repose themselves. They tie their knees against their belly with their girdles, and lay their heads on the top of them, and this, according to them, is the best posture for recollection.—Harmer, vol. ii. p. 506.—Ed.

As soon as queen Jezebel understood what Elijah had done, and more especially, how he had caused all the prophets of Baal to be slain, she vowed revenge, and ^e sent him word, that his life the next day should certainly pay for theirs: whereupon, not thinking himself safe in Ahab's dominions, he withdrew to a town in the southern parts of the tribe of Judah, called Beersheba, where he dismissed his servant, and, pursuing his journey farther into Arabia Petraea, walked all day: but in the evening, being extremely fatigued, he laid himself down under a juniper tree, sick with the world, and desirous to leave it. He had not, however, slept long, before an angel, between his knees. Chardin relates that the dervises, especially those of the Indies, put themselves into this posture, in order to meditate, and also to repose themselves. They tie their knees against their belly with their girdles, and lay their heads on the top of them, and this, according to them, is the best posture for recollection.—Harmer, vol. ii. p. 506.—Ed.

^e When Elijah's servant reported to his master, that he saw a little cloud arising out of the sea like a man's hand, he commanded him to go up and say to Ahab, 'Prepare thy chariot, and get thee down, that the rain stop thee not.' This circumstance was justly considered as the sure indication of an approaching shower, 'for it came to pass in the mean while, that the heaven was black with clouds and wind, and there was a great rain.' Mr Bruce (Travels, vol. iii. p. 669) has an observation which greatly corroborates this relation. He says, "there are three remarkable appearances attending the inundation of the Nile: every morning in Abyssinia is clear, and the sun shines; about nine, a small cloud not above four feet broad, appears in the east, whirling violently round, as if upon an axis; but arrived near the zenith, it first abates its motion, then loses its form, and extends itself greatly, and seems to call up vapours from all opposite quarters. These clouds having attained nearly the same height, rush against each other with great violence, and put me always in mind of Elijah's foretelling rain on Mount Carmel. The air, impelled before the heaviest mass, or swiftest mover, makes an impression of its own form, in the collection of clouds opposite, and the moment it has taken possession of the space made to receive it, the most violent thunder possible to be conceived instantly follows, with rain; and after some hours the sky again clears."—Ed.

^f In this country, loose and long garments were in use; and therefore, when the people were minded to run, or make any great expedition, their custom was to gird them round their waist: but why the prophet condescended to become, as it were, the king's running footman upon this occasion, was to show the world, that his extraordinary power, in working miracles, and the conquest he had thereby gained over his enemies, had not made him proud, and to satisfy the king of his readiness to do him all the honour imaginable; that he was far from being his enemy, and only desired he would become the true worshipper of God, who was, as he could not but see, the Lord God of Israel.—Patrick's Commentary.

^g This certainly was the effect of her blind rage, and not of any prudence in her: for prudence would have advised her to conceal her resentment until she had been ready to put her designs in execution; whereas this sending him word, was giving him notice of his danger, and admonishing him to avoid it. But, since he had the confidence to come where she was, she might think perhaps, that he was as courageous as she was furious; that upon this notice he would scorn to fly; and she too, in her pride, might scorn to kill him secretly or surreptitiously, resolving to make him a public sacrifice.—Patrick's Commentary, and Poole's Annotations.

who had brought him meat and drink, awoke him, and bade him eat heartily, because he had a long journey to take. The prophet did as he was ordered, and in the strength of that repast, walked ^a 40 days and 40 nights, until he came to Mount Horeb, the place where God at first delivered the law to Moses. Here he betook himself to a cave, intending very probably to spend the remainder of his days in retirement; but he had not been long in the place, before he had a vision, wherein God having first, by several ^b emblems, made him sensible of his almighty power and presence, ^c gave him to understand, that the number of his true worshippers was greater than he imagined, ^d and that he would not fail to take vengeance on the house of Ahab for their abominable idolatry. To this purpose he ordered him to return into his own country by the way of Damascus, where he was to anoint Hazael king of Syria, Jehu king of Israel, and to appoint Elisha his successor in the prophetic office; intimating hereby, that these men ^e would be proper instruments, in his almighty hand, whereby to punish the idolatry of Israel, and to assert the righteousness of his own cause.

This was a matter of some comfortable expectation to Elijah: and therefore leaving Horeb, in his return by the way of Damascus, ^f he found Elisha at plough, and as he passed by, ^g cast his mantle upon him; which the

The Greeks, on the contrary, performed their sacred rites bareheaded. St Paul, therefore, writing to the Corinthians, who were Greeks, says, 'every man praying or prophesying with his head covered dishonoureth his head.' (1 Cor. xi. 4).—Ed.

^d Yet I have left me seven thousand in Israel, all the knees which have not bowed unto Baal, and every mouth which hath not kissed him.' (1 Kings xix. 18.) Bowing the knee was an act of worship, and so was kissing the idol. This was done two ways, either by applying their mouth immediately to the image, or kissing the hand before the image, and then stretching it out, and, as it were, throwing the kiss to it.—Ed.

^e The words in the text are, 'And it shall come to pass, that him that escapeth the sword of Hazael, shall Jehu slay; and him that escapeth from the sword of Jehu shall Elisha slay' (1 Kings xix. 17.) Where it is easy to observe, that these things are not mentioned according to the order of time wherein they fell out, for Elisha was a prophet before Hazael was king, and Hazael was king before Jehu, but they are spoken of according to the decree of God, who, as Abarbanel observes, appointed every one to execute that which was proper for him to do: "Thus he intended," continues that learned commentator, "that Hazael should destroy the idolaters of Israel in battle, and therefore he mentions that first, because it is a general calamity: but as Jezebel, the children of Ahab, and the priests of Baal, went not to fight, and consequently could not fall in battle, he ordained Jehu to cut off them, and all the worshippers of Baal, in the manner that we find he did: but as he did not know the disposition of little children, he left them to be punished by Elisha, who by the spirit of prophecy, foresaw that they would become idolaters." But in this there seems to be more subtilty than needs, since the plain sense of the words is no more than this:—"That God, in his providence, had appointed three persons to punish the Israelites according to their deserts; and that one or other of these should infallibly execute his judgments upon them." The only difficulty is, how the prophet Elisha can be said to slay, when, by profession, he was a pacific man, and never engaged in war? But when we consider the two and forty children which he destroyed, besides others, whom, upon the like occasion, he might destroy; the sore famine, which, by God's appointment, he sent upon the Israelites, (2 Kings vi. 25.) and the many cutting prophecies and imprecations called in Scripture 'the sword of the mouth,' (Is. xlix. 2, and Rev. i. 16.) which he denounced against them, and which were fulfilled, we shall find reason enough to justify the expression.—Pool's Annotations.

^f So far was this from being any argument of his poverty, that it was in reality a token of his wealth and great riches: for he who could keep twelve yoke of oxen at plough, was in this respect no inconsiderable man, and yet according to the manner of these early times, he looked after his own business himself; for nothing was of greater esteem, not only among the Hebrews, but among the ancient Greeks and Romans likewise, than agriculture, and such persons as were of the best quality were called ἀγρονομοί, men who did their work themselves, and left not the care of it to others. Elisha therefore was taken from the plough to be a prophet, in like manner as among the Romans afterwards, some were taken from thence to be consuls and dictators.—Patrick's Commentary.

^g The mantle was the proper habit of prophets (2 Kings i. 8.), and therefore Elijah's casting it upon him was the ceremony

^a From Beersheba to Mount Horeb is, at the most, not above 150 miles, and the prophet, it seems, had advanced one day's journey into the wilderness; so that he had not now more to finish than any active man might have done in four or five days at most: how came the prophet then to make forty of it? To this some reply, that he, as the Israelites of old, was kept wandering up and down this pathless wilderness forty days, as they were forty years, till, at length, he lit upon this sacred mountain. Others suppose that he went about by private ways, and perhaps sometimes rested, and lay hid, in order to prevent discovery. But, when he was got into the wilderness, one would think he might have been safe, and proceeded straightway, if he knew the straight way to the place intended. I was thinking, therefore, that there would be no solecism, if we should say, that the time of going to, staying at, and coming from, the mount of Horeb, is to be included in these forty days, though, in a short narration, words may be so expressed, as if the journey only had taken up all that time.—Patrick's, Calmet's, and Le Clerc's Commentaries.

^b Elijah being now come to the same place, where God had delivered the law to his servant Moses, God was minded to communicate the like favour to his servant the prophet, namely, to unveil his majesty to him, and give him some signal of his immediate presence: but there is something very remarkable in the words of the text. 'And behold the Lord passed by, and a strong wind rent the mountains, and brake in pieces the rocks, but the Lord was not in the wind; and after the wind, an earthquake, but the Lord was not in the earthquake; and after the earthquake, a fire, but the Lord was not in the fire; and after the fire, a still small voice,' (1 Kings xix. 11, &c.) And various are the speculations which this appearance of the divine majesty hath suggested to interpreters. The generality of them have looked upon this as a figure of the gospel dispensation, which came, not in such a terrible manner as the law did, with storms, thunders, lightnings, and earthquakes (Exod. xix. 16.), but with great lenity and sweetness, wherein God speaks to us by his Son, who makes use of no other but gentle arguments and soft persuasions. But, if we take this to be a symbolical admonition to Elijah, according to the circumstances he was then in, we may reasonably suppose, that herein God intended to show him, that, though he had all the elements ready armed at his command to destroy idolaters, if he pleased to make use of them, yet he had rather attain his end by patience, and tenderness, and long-suffering, signified by that small still voice, wherein the Deity exhibited himself, and consequently, that the prophet should hereby be incited to imitate him, bridling that passionate zeal to which his natural complexion did but too much incline him.—Le Clerc's, Calmet's, and Patrick's Commentaries.

^c 'And Elijah wrapped his face in his mantle and went out,' (1 Kings xix. 13.) The Jews accounted it a token of reverence to have their feet bare in public worship, and to have their heads covered. This was accordingly the practice, not of the priests only, but of the people also; and the latter practice remains so to this day. Thus, on the divine appearance to Moses in the bush, it is said, 'he hid his face, for he was afraid to look upon God' (Exod. iii. 6.); and on the extraordinary manifestation of the divine presence to Elijah, 'he wrapped his face in his mantle.' On the same account perhaps the angels were represented in vision to Isaiah as covering their faces with their wings in the presence of Jehovah (Is. vi. 2.). The ancient Romans performed their sacred rites with a covering on their heads. Thus Virgil:

Our way we bend

To Pallas, and the sacred hill ascend;

There prostrate to the fierce virago pray,

Whose temple was the landmark of our way,—

other understanding to be a call to the prophetic ministry, "as soon as he had settled his private concerns, here used for his inauguration: though, as it was customary for servants to carry their masters' garments after them, others understand it only as a token that Elisha was to be his servant, to attend upon him, and succeed in his office. However this be, it is probable, that when he cast his mantle upon him, he said something to Elisha, whereby he acquainted him with his design, though the particular words, in so short an history, are not expressed.—Poole's Annotations, and Le Clerc's Commentary.

a 1 Kings xix. 21. Elijah is commanded (ver. 16.) to anoint Elisha prophet in his room. 1. Though it is generally believed that kings, priests, and prophets, were inaugurated into their respective offices by the rite of unction, and this I have elsewhere supported; yet this is the only instance on record where a prophet is commanded to be anointed; and even this case is problematical, for it does not appear that Elijah did anoint Elisha. Nothing is mentioned in his call to the prophetic office, but the casting the mantle of Elijah upon him; wherefore it is probable that the word anoint, here signifies no more than the call to the office, accompanied by the simple rite of having the prophet's mantle thrown over his shoulders. 2. A call to the ministerial office, though it completely sever from all secular occupations, yet never supersedes the duties of filial affection. Though Elisha must leave his oxen, and become a prophet to Israel; yet he may first go home, eat and drink with his parents and relatives, and bid them an affectionate farewell. 3. We do not find any attempt on the part of his parents to hinder him from obeying the divine call: they had too much respect for the authority of God, and they left their son to the dictates of his own conscience. Wee to those parents who strive, for filthy lucre's sake, to prevent their son from embracing a call to preach Jesus to their perishing countrymen, or to the heathen, because they see that the life of a true evangelist is a life of comparative poverty, and they had rather he should gain money than save souls. 4. The cloak, we have already observed, was the prophet's peculiar habit; it was probably in imitation of this that the Greek philosophers wore a sort of mantle, that distinguished them from the common people; and by which they were at once as easily known as certain academical characters are by their gowns and square caps. The pallium was as common among the Greeks as the toga was among the Romans. Each of these was so peculiar to those nations, that Palliatus is used to signify a Greek, as Togatus is to signify a Roman. 5. Was it from this act of Elijah, conveying the prophetic office and its authority to Elisha by throwing his mantle upon him, that the popes of Rome borrowed the ceremony of collating an archbishop to the spiritualities and temporalities of his see, and investing him with plenary sacerdotal authority, by sending him what is well known in ecclesiastical history by the name of pallium, pall, or cloak? I think this is likely, for as we learn from Zech. xiii. 4, and 2 Kings i. 8, that this mantle was a rough or hairy garment, so we learn from Durandus that the pallium or pall was made of white wool, after the following manner:—The nuns of St Agnes, annually on the festival of their patroness, offer two white lambs on the altar of their church, during the time they sing Agnus Dei, in a solemn mass; which lambs are afterwards taken by two of the canons of the Lateran church, and by them given to the pope's subdeacons, who send them to pasture till shearing time; and then they are shorn, and the pall is made of their wool, mixed with other white wool. The pall is then carried to the Lateran church, and there placed on the high altar by the deacons, on the bodies of St Peter and St Paul; and, after an usual watching or vigil, it is carried away in the night, and delivered to the subdeacons, who lay it up safely. Now, because it was taken from the body of St Peter, it signifies the plenitude of ecclesiastical power; and, therefore, the popes assume it as their prerogative, being the professed successors of this apostle, to invest other prelates with it. It was at first confined to Rome, but afterwards it was sent to popish prelates in different parts of the world. 6. It seems, from the place in Zechariah quoted above, that this rough cloak or garment became the covering of hypocrites and deceivers; and that persons assumed the prophetic call; and God threatens to unmask them. We know that this became general in the popish church in the beginning of the 16th century; and God stripped those false prophets of their false and wicked pretensions, and exposed them to the people.—See Dr Clark's Commentary.—Ed.

went with Elijah, and was his servant as long as he lived; so that Elijah did not think it necessary to go to Damascus, upon the account of Hazael, nor to speak with Jehu in Israel; but left these affairs to be transacted with Elisha, whenever a fit opportunity should offer.

Not long after this, but upon what provocation it is not said, Benhadad raised a vast army against Ahab king of Israel, and marched directly into his country, with a design to invest Samaria, his capital city. But before he did that, he sent him an haughty message, demanding all that belonged to him, in satisfaction for some presumed affront. Ahab was in no condition to oppose him, and therefore he tamely submitted himself to his mercy: but this tameness only inflamed Benhadad's insolence, so that, in his next message, he demanded all things to be immediately put into his hand; which, when the king of Israel understood, he called a general council of the kingdom to advise what to do. They unanimously agreed to stand by their king to the last extremity; which, when Benhadad's ambassadors told him, he fell into a great rage, and immediately ordered his army to invest Samaria; but while he lay before the town, ^b God, who was justly provoked at this proud Syrian, sent ^c a prophet to Ahab, not only to assure him of victory, but to instruct him likewise ^d in what method he was to attain it; which succeeded so well that Benhadad himself had much to do to escape with his life.

The same prophet, however, gave the king of Israel great caution to recruit his army, and be upon his guard, against the beginning of the next year, because then the

^b 1 Kings xx. 12. 'And it came to pass, when Benhadad heard this message, as he was drinking, he and the kings, in the pavilions.' &c. The pavilions here spoken of were nothing more than mere booths or common tents, notwithstanding Benhadad and the kings were drinking in them. That great and even royal persons occasionally refreshed or indulged themselves in this manner, is clear from the following paragraph in Dr Chandler's Travels in the Lesser Asia, (p. 149.) "While we were employed on the theatre of Miletus, the aga of Suki, son-in-law by marriage to Elez Oglu, crossed the plain towards us, attended by a considerable train of domestics and officers, their vests and turbans of various and lively colours, mounted on long tailed horses, with showy trappings, and glittering furniture. He returned, after hawking, to Miletus, and we went to visit him, with a present of coffee and sugar; but were told that two favourite birds had flown away, and that he was vexed and tired. A couch was prepared for him beneath a shed made against a cottage, and covered with green boughs to keep off the sun. He entered as we were standing by, and fell down on it to sleep, without taking any notice of us."—Harmer, vol. iii. p. 50.—Ed.

^c Who the prophet was, who upon this, and another message afterwards, was sent to Ahab, the Scripture nowhere informs us. It is somewhat odd, that during this whole war with Benhadad, neither Elijah nor Elisha, the two principal prophets of Israel should appear, though other prophets, whereof there seems to be a considerable number, make no scruple of executing their office; whether it was, that this war commenced before Jezebel's persecution of the prophets, or that this impious queen abated her persecution, and let them have some respite, when she had exterminated Elijah as she thought.—Cibulc's Commentary.

^d The instruments in attaining this victory were to be 'the young men of the princes of the provinces,' with Ahab at the head of them, (1 Kings xx. 14.) The Hebrew word has some ambiguity in it, and may signify, either the 'sons,' or the 'servants' of the 'princes of the provinces,' either young noblemen themselves, or their father's pages, who were equally brought up delicately, and quite unaccustomed to war. It was by these young men, and not by old experienced officers that this battle was to be won: that thereby it might appear, that the victory was wholly owing to God's gracious and powerful providence, and not to the valour, or fitness of the instruments.—Poole's Annot.

Syrians designed him another visit; which accordingly came to pass. For some of his generals having persuaded the king of Syria, that the gods of the Israelites a 'were gods of the hills,' and, therefore, to fight them with advantage, was to fight them in a champaign country, he raised another army of equal force with that he had lost the year before, and came and sat down before Apheck, a city in the tribe of Asher. Ahab, however, was prepared to receive him, and though with a force far inferior to the Syrians, marched out to meet them, gave them battle, put them to the rout, and slew upon the spot 100,000 of them.

The vanquished b betook themselves to Apheck, but were far from finding any security there; for the providence of God pursued them, and by the fall of the walls of that city, destroyed 27,000 more of them: so that, terrified with this judgment, Benhadad went to hide himself in some place where he thought he could not be easily found; but was, at length, prevailed on by his chief officers to send ambassadors to Ahab, in the humblest manner, clothed c in sackcloth, and with ropes

a That there were many gods, who had each their particular charge and jurisdiction; that some presided over whole countries, whilst others had but particular places under their tuition and government; and were some of them gods of the woods, others of the rivers, and others of the mountains, was plainly the doctrine of all heathen nations. Pan was reckoned the god of the mountains, for which reason he was styled, Ἄρειος, mountain roamer; and in like manner the Syrians might have a conceit that the God of Israel was a God of the mountains, because Canaan, they saw, was a mountainous land; the Israelites, they perceived, delighted to sacrifice on high places; their law, they might have heard, was given on the top of a mountain; their temple stood upon a famous eminence, as did Samaria, where they had so lately received a signal defeat. For their farther notion was, that the gods of the mountains had a power to inject a panic fear into an army, whenever they pleased. Nay, that they did not only assist with their influence, but actually engage themselves in battle, in behalf of their favourites, is a sentiment as old as Homer, and what Virgil has not forgot to imitate. "Monsters of all sorts of gods, along with the dog-headed Anubis, hurl hostile weapons against Neptune, Venus, and Minerva: in the midst of the contest rages the god of war, clothed in steel: around them flutter in the air, the black fates of death: Discord herself is seen in a rent garment, leaping in joy amid the carnage: and Bellona is following her, armed with a bloody whip." (Æneid. 8.) It was a prevalent notion among the heathens, not only that all deities were local, but that they had no power, anywhere but in that country, or place, over which they presided. It is very likely that the small Israelitish army availed themselves of the heights and uneven ground to fight with greater advantage against the Syrian cavalry.—Horne's Introduction, and Dr Clarke.—Ed.

b Apheck, or Aphaea, as it is called by profane authors, was situated in Libanus, upon the river Adonis, between Heliopolis and Biblos; and in all probability is the same that Paul Lucas, in his Voyage du Levant, (vol. i. c. 20.) speaks of, as swallowed up in a lake of Mount Libanus, about nine miles in circumference, wherein there are several houses all entire, to be seen under water. The soil about this place, as the ancients tell us, was very bituminous, which seems to confirm their opinion, who think that subterraneous fires consumed the solid substance of the earth, whereon the city stood, so that it subsided and sunk at once, and a lake was soon formed in its place.—Cabnet's Commentary and Dictionary under the word Apheck.

c This was the posture in those times, wherein supplicants presented themselves when they petitioned for mercy. The sackcloth upon their loins was a token of their sorrow for what they had done; and the halters about their necks, a token of their subjection to whatever punishment Ahab should think fit to inflict upon them: for which reason Bessus, according to Curtius, (b. 7.) was brought to Alexander with a chain about his neck.—Patrick's and Cabnet's Commentaries.

about their necks, to make their submission upon what conditions he pleased. d The conditions that Ahab insisted on, were only, that the Syrians should restore all the country which they had taken from Baasha, king of Israel, and grant e him some privileges in Damascus their capital, as a token of their homage and subjection; which the other very readily consented to, and so a league was concluded between them: but a league so offensive to God, that he sent a prophet immediately to reprove Ahab for it; and to let him know, "That had he destroyed Benhadad, as God had put it in his power, his dominions should have been annexed to the kingdom of Israel; but that since f he had acted otherwise, his life should pay for the life of Benhadad: for he should be slain in battle with the Syrians, who instead of being held in subjection to the Israelites, should, in a few years, as they were in the reign of Hazael, become their masters, take their towns from them, and make ravages in their country." But instead of humbling himself at the denunciation of this heavy sentence, or expressing any sorrow for his fault, Ahab became but more sullen and obstinate, and in a short time, g added this farther offence to his other great crimes.

Not far from the royal palace of Jezreel, in a place convenient for a kitchen-garden, there was one Naboth, d 1 Kings xx. 32. Approaching persons with a sword hanging to the neck, is, in the east, a very humble and submissive act. Thevenot has mentioned this circumstance (part i. p. 289.) in the account he has given of the taking of Bagdad, by the Turks, in 1638. When the besieged entreated quarter, the principal officer went to the grand vizier, with a scarf about his neck, and his sword wreathed in it, and begged mercy. The ropes mentioned in this passage were probably what they suspended their swords with.—Harner, vol. ii. p. 258.—Ed.

e The privilege which Benhadad gave to Ahab is thus expressed: 'Thou shalt make streets for thee in Damascus, as my father made in Samaria;' but then the learned are not agreed what we are to understand by 'streets.' Some suppose, that they were courts of judicature where Ahab was to maintain a jurisdiction over Benhadad's subjects. Others think that they were public market places, where commodities were sold, and the toll of them paid to Ahab; but the most general opinion is, that they were citadels or fortifications, to be a bridle of restraint upon this chief city of the Syrians, that they might make no new eruptions into the land of Israel. A great privilege this! But what Benhadad, when he found himself set at liberty, refused to comply with.—Patrick's and Cabnet's Commentaries.

f If it should be asked, wherein lay Ahab's great offence, for which God threatens to punish him so severely? The answer is,—that it consisted in suffering so horrid a blasphemer as Benhadad was, to go unpunished, which was contrary to an express law, (Lev. xxiv. 16.) If it should be urged, that this was nothing to Benhadad, since the law concerned the Israelites only, the reply is, that this law extended not to those only that were born in the land, but as it is there expressed to strangers likewise that were among them, and in their power, as Benhadad certainly was. God had delivered him into Ahab's hands for his blasphemy, as he had promised, (1 Kings xx. 28.) and therefore this act of provi-dence, compared with the law, did plainly intimate, that he was appointed by God for destruction; but so far was Ahab from punishing him as he deserved, that he treats him like a friend and a brother, dismisses him upon easy terms, and takes his bare word for the performance, without the least care for the reparation of God's honour.—Poole's Annotations.

g The account of Ahab's coveting Naboth's vineyard, as Abrahimel observes, is immediately set after his treatment of Benhadad, to show his extreme great wickedness in sparing him, as Saul did Agag king of the Amalekites, and killing Naboth, that he might get possession of his vineyard. For this was an high aggravation of his crime, that he basely murdered a just Israelite, and let an impious enemy escape.—Patrick's Commentary.

a citizen thereof, who had a vineyard, which Ahab was very desirous of obtaining ^a and therefore ^b offered the owner of it an equivalent, either in land or money; but the owner, upon the account of its being his paternal inheritance, refusing to part with it, gave Ahab such uneasiness, that he took his bed for mere discontent, and was so sullen and uneasy, that he would not eat his meat. But when his wife Jezebel came to understand the cause, she first upbraided him with his pusillanimity, or not knowing how to exert the authority of a king, and then to cheer him up, bid him drive away all melancholy, for that she had found out an expedient how to put him in the possession of Naboth's vineyard. To this purpose she wrote letters from Samaria in Ahab's name, and sealed with his signet, ^c to the principal men of

Jezebel, ordering them ^d to proclaim a fast, to bring ^e Naboth before the judges, and to suborn two false witnesses, who should depose against him, that he had ^f blasphemed God and the king, that so he might be carried out of the city, and stoned. ^g All this was done according to this wicked woman's desire; and, as soon as Ahab understood that Naboth was dead, he went to Jezebel, and took possession of his vineyard: but upon his return to Samaria, the prophet Elijah, by God's direction, met him, and having upbraided him with this his last flagitiousness, in slaying the innocent, and seizing on his inheritance, he denounced this heavy sentence against him, 'That in the same manner that dogs had licked Naboth's blood, they should lick his;' that all his posterity should die by the sword, and be exposed without the honour of a decent funeral; and that, as to his wife Jezebel, she should be devoured by 'dogs ^h near the

a 1 Kings xxi. 2. 'Give me thy vineyard.' The request of Ahab seems at first view fair and honourable. Naboth's vineyard was nigh to the palace of Ahab, and he wished to add it to his own for a kitchen garden, or perhaps a grass plot, gan yarak; and he offers to give him either a better vineyard for it, or to give him its worth in money. Naboth rejects the proposal with horror: 'The Lord forbid it me, that I should give the inheritance of my fathers to thee.' No man could finally alienate any part of the parental inheritance: it might be sold or mortgaged till the jubilee, but at that time it must revert to its original owner, if not redeemed before: for this God had particularly enjoined, (Lev. xxv. 14—17, 25—28.) therefore Naboth properly said, ver. 3, 'The Lord forbid it me, to give the inheritance of my fathers.' Ahab most evidently wished him to alienate it finally, and this is what God's law had expressly forbidden: therefore he could not, consistently with his duty to God, indulge Ahab; and it was high iniquity in Ahab to tempt him to do it; and to covet it showed the depravity of Ahab's soul.—En.

b By this it appears, that though the kings of Israel did rule their subjects in a very arbitrary and despotic manner, yet they did not as yet take the liberty to seize on their lands and hereditaments; and therefore what Samuel prophesies of the kings of Israel, that 'they would take their fields, their vineyards, and their olive-yards,' (1 Sam. viii. 11,) does not extend to any true and lawful, but a presumed and usurped right only in their kings.—Cabnet's Commentary.

c 1 Kings xxi. 8. 'Seal.' Seals are of very ancient invention. Thus Judah left his seal with Tamar as a pledge. The ancient Hebrews wore their seals or signets in rings on their fingers, or in bracelets on their arms. Sealing rings, called annuli, signatorii, sigillares, and chirographi, are said by profane authors to have been invented by the Lacedæmonians, who, not content to shut their chests, armouries, &c., with keys, added a seal also. Letters and contracts were sealed thus: first they were tied up with thread or a string, then the wax was applied to the knot, and the seal impressed upon it. Rings seem to have been used as seals in almost every country. Pliny, however, observes that seals were scarcely used at the time of the Trojan war; the method of shutting up letters was by curious knots, which invention was particularly honoured, as in the instance of the Gordian knot. We are also informed by Pliny, that in his time no seals were used but in the Roman empire: but at Rome testaments were null without the testator's seal and the seals of seven witnesses.—(Digest, l. xxxvii. tit. de Bonorum Possessione, Wilson's Archæol. Dict. art. Seal.) The very ancient custom of sealing dispatches with a seal or signet, set in a ring, is still retained in the east. Pococke says, (Travels, vol. i. p. 186, note,) "in Egypt they make the impression of their name with their seal, generally of cornelian, which they wear on their finger, and which is blacked when they have occasion to seal with it." Hanway remarks (Travels, i. 317.) that "the Persian ink serves not only for writing, but for subscribing with their seal; indeed many of the Persians in high office could not write. In their rings they wear agates, which serve for a seal, on which is frequently engraved their name, and some verse from the Koran." Shaw (Travels, p. 247.) says, "as few or none either of the Arab shekhs, or of Turkish and eastern kings, princes, or bashaws know to write their own names, all their letters and decrees are stamped with their proper rings, seals, or signets, (1 Kings xxi.

8. Esth. iii. 12. Dan. vi. 17 or 18, &c.) which are usually of silver or cornelian, with their respective names engraved upon them on one side, and the name of their kingdom or principality, or else some sentence of the Koran, on the other." Eastern signets have cypress and letters on them.—Clarke's Travels, vol. i. p. 320.—Ed.

d It was always a customary thing, upon the approach of any great calamity, or the apprehension of any national judgment, to proclaim a fast; and Jezebel ordered such a fast to be observed in Jezebel, the better to conceal her design against Naboth. For, by this means, she intimated to the Jezebelites, that they had some accursed thing among them, which was ready to draw down the vengeance of God upon their city; and that therefore it was their business to inquire into all those sins which provoked God to anger against them, and to purge them out effectually. As therefore these days of fasting were employed in punishing offenders, doing justice, and imploring God's pardon, they gave the elders of the city an occasion to convene an assembly, and the false witnesses a fair opportunity to accuse Naboth before them.—Le Clerc's and Patrick's Commentaries.

e Josephus is of opinion, that, as Naboth was of an illustrious house, he was ordered to be set in an honourable place among the elders and chief rulers of the city; that so it might be thought, that they did not condemn him out of hatred or ill will, but merely as they were constrained to it by the evidence that was given against him. But others will have it, that the reason why he was set in an eminent place was only, because persons accused and arraigned were wont to stand conspicuous before their judges, that all the people might see them, and hear both the accusations against them, and their defence.—Patrick's Commentary.

f By the law of Moses it was death to blaspheme God, (Lev. xxiv. 16.) and by custom it was death to revile the king, (Ex. xxii. 28.) Now, in order to make safe work, the evidences as they were instructed accused Naboth of both these crimes, that the people might be the better satisfied to see him stoned. There is this difference, however, to be observed between these two crimes, that if a man had only blasphemed God, he was to be tried by the great court at Jerusalem, as the Hebrew doctors tell us, and his goods came to his heirs; whereas, when a man was executed for treason against the king, his estate went to the exchequer, and was forfeited to him against whom the offence was committed; and for this reason it was, that they accused Naboth of this crime likewise, that his estate might be confiscated, and Ahab, by that means, get possession of his vineyard.—Patrick's Commentary.

g Princes never want instruments to execute their pleasure; and yet it is strange that among all these judges and great men, there should be none that abhorred such a villany. It must be considered, however, that for a long while they had cast off all fear and sense of God, and prostituted their consciences to please their king: nor durst they disobey Jezebel's commands, who had the full power and government of the king, as they well knew, and could easily have taken away their lives, had they refused to condemn Naboth.—Poole's Annotations.

h 1 Kings xxi. 23. Mr Bruce, when at Gondar, was witness to a scene in a great measure similar to the devouring of Jezebel by dogs. He says, "the bodies of those killed by the sword, wall of Jezreel,' that is, ^a where Naboth was judged, and unjustly condemned.

Uneasy at the sight of the prophet, and much more terrified at his denunciations, Ahab rent his clothes, put on sackcloth, and gave other indications of his sorrow and humiliation; ^b but as his repentance was neither sincere nor persevering, ^c God, who might otherwise have revoked the whole sentence, inflicted part of it upon his person; but the utter extirpation of his family did not happen, till the reign of his son Jehoram, as we shall see in its proper place.

Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, as we said before, had imprudently married his son and heir to this wicked Ahab's daughter; and as this alliance occasioned an interview between the two kings, Jehoshaphat went one day to Samaria, to visit Ahab, who entertained him and his attendants very splendidly; but taking the advantage of this opportunity, invited him to go along with him to the siege of Ramoth Gilead, a town in the tribe of Gad, which the king of Syria unjustly detained from him. Jehoshaphat agreed to attend him; but being loth to do any thing of this kind without a divine approbation, he desired of Ahab to inquire of the prophets concerning the event of this expedition. To this purpose Ahab summoned together 400 priests of the goddess

Astarte, ^d who unanimously agreed, that the expedition would prove successful; but as Jehoshaphat's purpose was, not to inquire of these, but of some true prophet of the Lord, with much difficulty he obtained of Ahab to have Micaiah produced, who, charging ^e Ahab's prophets with falsehood, foretold, that the enterprise would prove fatal to all Israel, and to Ahab in particular; and therefore he advised both kings to desist.

Ahab, however, instead of listening to Micaiah, ordered him into custody, until he should return in peace; and taking Jehoshaphat with him, marched with all his forces to the siege: but, when he came within sight of the enemy's army, his courage began to cool, and thinking to evade the force of Micaiah's prophecy by a stratagem of his own, he put himself in the garb of a common officer, and advised Jehoshaphat to fight in his royal robes. The king of Syria had given particular command to his generals ^f to single out Ahab, and, if possible to kill him, as the chief author of the war. At first they mistook Jehoshaphat for the king of Israel, and therefore fell upon him with great impetuosity; but perceiving at length, that he was not the person they wanted, they desisted from the pursuit of him, and, in quest of Ahab, bended their course another way.

were hewn to pieces and scattered about the streets, being denied burial. I was miserable, and almost driven to despair, at seeing my hunting dogs twice let loose by the carelessness of my servants, bringing into the court-yard the heads and arms of slaughtered men, and which I could no way prevent, but by the destruction of the dogs themselves." He also adds, that upon being asked by the king the reason of his dejected and sickly appearance, among other reasons he informed him, "it was occasioned by the execution of three men, which he had lately seen; because the hyenas, allured into the streets by the quantity of carrion, would not let him pass by night in safety from the palace, and because the dogs fled into his house, to eat pieces of human carcases at their leisure." (Travels, vol. iv. p. 81.) This account illustrates also the readiness of the dogs to lick the blood of Ahab (1 Kings xxii. 38.), in perfect conformity to which is the expression of the prophet Jeremiah, (xv. 3.) 'I will appoint over them the sword to slay, and the dogs to tear.'—Ed.

^a There is a great dispute among the learned, as to the accomplishment of this prophecy. At first it was no doubt intended to be literally fulfilled; but upon Ahab's repentance, as we find below, the punishment was transferred from him to his son Jehoram, in whom it was actually accomplished; for his 'dead body was cast into the portion of the field of Naboth the Jezreelite, for the dogs to devour,' (2 Kings ix. 25.) Since Ahab's blood therefore was licked by dogs, not at Jezreel, but at Samaria, it seems necessary, that we should understand the Hebrew word which our translation renders 'in the place where,' not as denoting the place, but the manner in which the thing was done; and so the sense of the passage will be,—'That as dogs licked, or in like manner as dogs licked Naboth's blood; even so shall they lick thine; observe what I say, even thine.'—Poole's Annot.

^b 1 Kings xxi. 27. Going softly seems to have been one of the many expressions of mourning commonly used among the eastern nations. That it was in use among the Jews appears from the case of Ahab; and by mistake it has been confounded with walking barefoot. It seems to have been a very slow, solemn manner of walking, well adapted to the state of mourners labouring under great sorrow and dejection of mind.—Ed.

^c The scope of the passage, (1 Kings xxi. 27—29.) leads us to believe, that Ahab's repentance was sincere, though it produced no lasting improvement in his character; besides, if his repentance had been merely a false pretence, it cannot be supposed that God would have signified his approbation of it by a remission of the threatened punishment. The circumstance deserves our particular notice, and furnishes a signal instance of God's readiness to meet the returning penitent, even while he is yet a great way off.—Ed.

^d In the text, they are simply called prophets; but it is not impossible that they were priests of the goddess Astarte, maintained by the wicked Jezebel.—Ed.

^e Micaiah's answer to Ahab, inquiring of him the success of his intended exhibition, is, 'Go, and prosper; for the Lord shall deliver the city into the hands of the king,' (1 Kings xxii. 15.) which does not at all contradict the other prophets, had it been spoken in earnest; but we have good reason to believe, that the words were spoken ironically, and in mockery to the promises which the other prophets made Ahab. Accordingly, we may observe by Ahab's reply, that he suspected Micaiah's sincerity, and, either by his gesture or manner of speaking, gathered, that his meaning was to traduce these false prophets for their answers. So that Micaiah's answer is in effect, as if he had said,—'Since thou dost not seek to know the truth, but only to please thyself, go to the battle, as all thy prophets advise thee; expect the success which they promise thee, and try the truth of their predictions, by thy dear bought experience.'—Poole's Annotations. [The words of Micaiah evidently contain a strong irony; as if he had said, "All your prophets have predicted success; you wish me to speak as they speak: 'Go and prosper; for the Lord will deliver it into the hand of the king.'" These were the precise words of the false prophets, (v. 6 and 12.) and were spoken by Micaiah in such a tone and manner as at once showed to Ahab that he did not believe them; hence the king advised him (v. 16.) that he would speak to him nothing but truth: and on this the prophet immediately relates to him the prophetic vision which pointed out the disasters which ensued. It is worthy of remark, that this prophecy of the king's prophets is couched in the same ambiguous terms by which the false prophets in the heathen world endeavoured to maintain their credit, while they deluded their votaries. The reader will observe that the word it is not in the original. 'The Lord will deliver it into the hand of the king;' and the words are so artfully constructed, that they may be interpreted for or against; so that, be the event whatever it might, the juggling prophet could save his credit, by saying he meant what had happened. Thus then the prophecy might have been understood: 'The Lord will deliver (Ramoth Gilead) into the king's (Ahab's) hand;' or 'The Lord will deliver (Israel) into the king's hand;' that is, into the hand of the king of Syria. And Micaiah repeats these words of uncertainty, in order to ridicule them and expose their fallacy.—Ed.

^f This Benhadad might order, either in policy, as supposing this to be the best and readiest way to put an end to this war; or with a design to take him prisoner, that thereby he might wipe out the stain of his own captivity, and recover the honour and advantages which he then lost.—Poole's Annotations.

ject, as he thought it; for he was mortally wounded by a random arrow: and though he was held up in his chariot for some time, with his face towards the enemy, to encourage his soldiers, yet about sunset he died, and a retreat was sounded. His dead body was carried to Samaria, and there buried, and his son Ahaziah succeeded him in the kingdom. But as the chariot wherein he was carried, was all stained with the flux of blood from his wound, while it was washed in a pool near the city, the dogs came and licked it, that the prophecy of Elijah might not go altogether unfulfilled.

As for Jehoshaphat, though he escaped from the battle, and returned in peace to Jerusalem, yet God sent the prophet Jehu to reprove him for his having assisted Ahab, who was ^a God's avowed enemy: but this fault he endeavoured to repair by the good order which he established in his dominions, both as to civil and religious affairs; by appointing honest and able judges, ^b and giving them proper charges; by regulating the discipline and order of the priests and Levites, and by enjoining them to perform punctually their respective duties in the service of God. Nor was it long before he experimentally found the favour of God extended to him in a most miraculous manner, for this his reformation. For when the Moabites and Ammonites, with their auxiliaries, made a formidable invasion upon his kingdom, and he thereupon had appointed a public fast, and applied himself to God for help ^c by humiliation and prayer, he had ^a Even common reason taught the heathens not to make any friendship with such as were enemies to the gods; and therefore Callimachus, in his hymn to Ceres, tells her, "O mother Ceres, may that man never be in friendship with me, who is in enmity with thee; nor let him dwell under the same roof; for those who are thy foes, assuredly are no friends of mine." Whereupon the illustrious Spanheim has observed many similar sayings among the heathens, and how the ancient Greeks abhorred to lodge in the same house, or to eat at the same table, with a murderer, or any grievous criminal, for the same reason, perhaps, that Horace has thus expressed upon the like occasion:—"The man who hath revealed the secret mysteries of Ceres, must ever be debarred from sitting under the same roof, or sailing in the same boat with me; for frequently the incensed deity of Olympus, in inflicting due punishment, hath joined the innocent with the guilty.—Justice, though she may follow with a limping foot, hath rarely failed to grasp the evading criminal."

^b The charge or solemn admonition which Jehoshaphat gave the judges, whom he appointed in each city, runs in these words:—"Take heed what ye do, for ye judge not for man, but for the Lord, who is with you in the judgment: wherefore now let the fear of the Lord be upon you: take heed and do it: for there is no iniquity with the Lord our God, no respect of persons, no taking of gifts," (2 Chron. xix. 6, 7.) It is a remarkable saying of Cicero, that judges, being sworn to do justice, should remember, when they come to pass sentence, "that they have God as a witness, that is, as I suppose, that they have their own mind, than which God hath given to man nothing more divine." (De Offic. b. iii. c. 13.) Where he has left us this excellent instruction likewise, that "a man must lay aside the person of a friend when he puts on the person of a judge." In like manner, there are several passages in Hesiod, admonishing those who have the administration of justice, to retain in their minds the consideration of their gods' inspection: but one of these will answer to our purpose.—"Ye kings, and ye that on earth administer justice to man, be faithful! for, amidst the countless mortal tribes, immortal beings dwell, and watch those who, wreckful of the wrath of heaven, grind the poor, inflicting undue punishment; yea, to the all-rearing earth, Jove has commissioned three myriads of undying ones as guardians of the death-doomed, by night and by day hovering on the air, and crowding the earthward tracts of heaven, they chain the arms and curl the fiery wills of tyrants.—Works and Days, l. 246.

a most gracious answer vouchsafed him, namely, that, on the next day, he should obtain a complete victory, without once striking a stroke; which accordingly came to pass. For when Jehoshaphat drew up his army, near the place where the enemy lay, he found nothing there but dead bodies; God having been pleased, before his approach, so to confound their understanding, that being a mixed multitude of divers nations, they, ^d some way or the most excellent that we meet with in sacred history. He begins it with an acknowledgment of God's supreme and irresistible power, which extends itself everywhere, over all creatures in heaven and earth, which are every one subject to his authority:—"O Lord God of our fathers, art thou not God in heaven? and rulest not thou over all the kingdoms of the heathen? and in thine hand is there not power and might, so that none is able to withstand thee?" Then he remembers the peculiar relation which the people of Israel have to him; the promise he made to Abraham, as a reward of his fidelity; and the deed of gift which he conveyed to him and his posterity, of this country for ever: "Art thou not our God, who didst drive out the inhabitants of the land before thy people Israel, and gavest it to the seed of Abraham, thy friend for ever?" Then he reminds him of the long possession they had had of the country, and of the temple which Solomon had built for his worship, to whom, at the consecration, (and therefore he refers to Solomon's words at the consecration, 1 Kings viii.) he promised a gracious reward to all the prayers that should be offered there: "and they dwelt therein, and have built thee a sanctuary therein for thy name, saying, if when evil cometh upon us, as the sword, judgment, or pestilence, or famine, we stand before thee in this house, and in thy presence, for thy name is in this house, and cry unto thee in our affliction, then thou wilt hear and help." In the next place, he represents the foul ingratitude of their enemies, in invading a country to which they had no manner of title, even though the Israelites did them not the least harm when they came to take possession of it, but took the pains to march a long way about to get to it, rather than give any molestation; and in aggravation of their wickedness in this respect, he suggests, that by this invasion they made an attempt, not only upon the rights of the Israelites, but of God himself, who was the great Lord and proprietor from whom they held the land: "And now behold the children of Ammon, and Meab, and Mount Seir, whom thou wouldst not let Israel invade, when they came out of the land of Egypt, but they turned from them, and destroyed them not; behold, I say, how they reward us, to come to cast us out of the possession which thou gavest us to inherit." Then he appeals to the justice of God, the righteous judge, who helps those that suffer wrong, especially when they have no other helper: for this is the last argument he makes use of to conciliate the divine assistance, even the weak condition wherein he and his people were, which made them the objects of the divine pity, especially since they placed their hope and confidence in him alone: "O Lord, our God, wilt thou not judge them? For we have no might against this great company, that cometh against us, neither know we what to do, but our eyes are upon thee." (2 Chron. xx. 12.) &c. with Patrick's Commentary on the words.

^d The words in the text are, 'the Lord set ambushments against the children of Ammon, Meab, and Mount Seir, which were come against Judah, and they were smitten,' (2 Chron. xx. 22.) And there are two ways wherein this slaughter may be supposed to have happened: either, 1st, by the ministry of God's angels, who might appear in the shape of men, and, putting on the appearance of Moabites or Ammonites, might smite some part of the army privately, and they supposing this to be done by their neighbours, might turn about and fall upon them like enemies, and so break forth into mutual slaughters: or, 2nd, by some jealousies and animosities among themselves, which by degrees break forth, first into secret ambushments, which one party laid for another, and then into open hostilities and outrages to their total destruction. So easy a thing it is for God to defeat his enemies, who can, when he pleases, infatuate their designs, or arm their own passions and mistakes against them.—Poole's Annotations on 2 Chron. xx. 22.—Boothroyd renders the passage thus: "And when they began to sing and praise, Jehovah turned the ambush-men of Mount Seir, who should have come against Judah, against the Ammonites and Moabites, and they other, by mistake, fell a slaying and destroying one another; so that Jehoshaphat and his people had nothing else to do but to carry off the arms and spoils of the dead, wherein they employed themselves for three whole days, and, on the fourth, meeting in a valley, which from this event, was called afterwards 'the valley of blessing,' they gave solemn thanks to God for this deliverance; and, not long after, Jehoshaphat, with his victorious troops, entering Jerusalem in triumph, was received with the joyful acclamations of his people, and struck such terror into all the neighbouring nations, that, for the remainder of his reign, he met with no molestation.

One loss however he had towards the conclusion of his reign, ^a in joining with Ahaziah king of Israel, to

were smitten. Then the Ammonites and Moabites attacked the inhabitants of Mount Seir, so as utterly to slay and destroy them; and when they had destroyed the inhabitants of Mount Seir, they rushed on to destroy one another:" he adds in a note, I conceive that the Edomites, who had been placed as an ambush against the Judahites, either by mistake or designedly, attacked the Ammonites and Moabites, and that these uniting, repelled the attack, and in a great measure destroyed the Edomites; then quarrelling among themselves, mutually destroyed one another.—ED.

^a This certainly was a great weakness in him, to make friendship with the son, when he had been so sharply reproved for joining with his father Ahab, especially since the son was as great an idolater as the father, but unto this he was betrayed by the affinity that was between them; and though he did not join with him in war, but only in trade, yet God was nevertheless displeas'd with him; which shows how dangerous a thing it is to have too near a familiarity or commerce with idolaters, or any other very wicked men.—Patrick's Commentary.—[It appears from 2 Chron. xx. 36, that Jehoshaphat joined in making and sending ships to Tarshish, and it is possible that what is stated in 1 Kings xxii. 49, is spoken of a second expedition, in which Jehoshaphat would not join Ahaziah. But instead of לֹא אָבָה, velo abah, 'he would not,' perhaps we should read אָבָה לִי velo abah, 'he consented to him;' two words pronounced exactly in the same way, and differing but in one letter, namely, an א aleph, for a vau. This reading, however, is not supported by any MS. or version; but the emendation seems just; for there are several places in these historical books in which there are mistakes of transcribers, which nothing but violent criticism can restore, and to this it is dangerous to resort, but in cases of the last necessity. Critics have recommended the 48th and 49th verses to be read thus: 'Jehoshaphat had built ships of burden at Ezion-Geber, to go to Ophir for gold.' 49. 'And Ahaziah the son of Ahab, had said to Jehoshaphat, Let my servants, I pray thee, go with thy servants in the ships; to which Jehoshaphat consented. But the ships went not thither; for the ships were broken at Ezion-Geber.' This is Houbigant's translation, who contends that "the words of the 48th verse, 'but they went not,' should be placed at the end of the 49th verse, for who can believe that the sacred writer should first relate that 'the ships were broken,' and then that Ahaziah requested of Jehoshaphat that his servants might embark with the servants of Jehoshaphat." This bold critic, who understood the Hebrew language better than any man in Europe, has, by happy conjectures, since verified by the testimony of MSS., removed the blots of many careless transcribers from the sacred volume.—Dr A. Clarke.]—ED. [Boothroyd also follows Houbigant in his translation, and, with Geddes, arranges 1 Kings xxii. 43—50, as follows: 43. 'And he walked in all the ways of Asa, his father; he turned not aside from it, doing what was right in the eyes of Jehovah.' 46. 'For the remnant of the Sodomites, who were left in the days of his father Asa, he removed from the land; only the high places were not entirely removed; still the people sacrificed, and burned incense on the high places.' 44. 'And Jehoshaphat made peace with the king of Israel.' 47. 'And as there was then no king in Edom, but a deputy for the king of Judah.' 48. 'Jehoshaphat built ships of Tarshish at Ezion-Geber, to go to Ophir, for gold.' 49. 'Then said Ahaziah the son of Ahab, to Jehoshaphat, let my servants go with thy servants in the ships: to which equip out a fleet in the port of Ezion-Geber, in order to go to Tarshish; for the whole fleet was dashed in pieces upon a ridge of rocks that lay in the mouth of the harbour, before they ever got to sea. But, as Jehoshaphat was afterwards convinced, that this was a judgment of God upon him for entering into partnership with an impious prince, as Ahaziah certainly was, the next fleet he set out was from his other port of Elah, wherein he suffered Ahaziah to have no concern; and therefore came off with better success. The truth is, Jehoshaphat was a religious and good prince, a zealous and great reformer, and yet the people still retained a kindness to the high places. ^b He lived sixty, and reigned twenty-five years; was buried in the city of David, and succeeded by his son Jehoram.

His father Jehoshaphat had six other sons; but to give no umbrage for suspicion, he had in his life time removed them from all public business, made them governors of fenced cities, and give them separate fortunes of their own. But notwithstanding all this precaution when ^c Jehoram was settled on the throne, he murdered all his brothers, and several chief men in Israel, who, as he suspected, either adhered to their party, or were likely to revenge their deaths.

During these cruel proceedings in the very beginning of his reign, he had a ^c letter sent him from Elijah, Jehoshaphat consented. But they went not; for the ships were wrecked at Ezion-Geber.' 45. 'Now the rest of the acts of Jehoshaphat, and the might which he exercised, and how he warred, are written in the Chronicles of the kings of Judah.' 50. 'And Jehoshaphat slept with his fathers; and was buried with his fathers in the city of David; and Jehoram his son reigned in his stead.']—ED.

^b 1 Kings xxii. 43. Many of old worshipped upon hills, and on the tops of high mountains; imagining that they thereby obtained a nearer communication with heaven. Strabo says, that the Persians always performed their worship upon hills. Some nations, instead of an image, worshipped the hill as the deity. In Japan, most of their temples are at this day upon eminences, and often upon the ascent of high mountains, commanding fine views, with groves and rivulets of clear water; for they say, that the gods are extremely delighted with such high and pleasant spots, (Kämpfer's Japan, vol. ii. b. 5.) This practice, in early times, was almost universal; and every mountain was esteemed holy. The people who prosecuted this method of worship, enjoyed a soothing infatuation, which flattered the gloom of superstition. The eminences to which they retired were lonely and silent; and seemed to be happily circumstanced for contemplation and prayer. They who frequented them were raised above the lower world, and fancied that they were brought into the vicinity of the powers of the air, and of the deity who resided in the higher regions. But the chief excellence for which they were frequented was, that they were looked upon as the peculiar places where God delivered his oracles.—Howell's Mythological Dict. p. 225.—ED.

^c Now since it is plain, from 2 Kings ii. 11, &c., that Elijah was taken up into heaven, in the time of Jehoshaphat, the question is, how could Elijah send his son a letter? For resolution to this, Josephus and others imagine, that this writing was indited in heaven where Elijah now is, and sent to Jehoram by the ministry of angels. But there is no reason to suppose that so singular a miracle was wrought in favour of an idolatrous prince, 'who had Moses and the prophets,' which, in our Saviour's opinion, were sufficient to instruct him in all points necessary to salvation, and needed not any additional writing to be sent him from the other world. Others therefore are of opinion, that this letter was written before Elijah's ascension into heaven; that, foreseeing, by the spirit of prophecy, the great wickedness Jehoram would fall into, he dictated the contents hereof to one of the prophets, charging them to put them down in writing, to send them in a letter to Jehoram, when he grew as impious as he is here related, and to let him know withal, that Elijah commanded wherein he upbraided him with the murder of his brothers, and his departure from the religion of his ancestors; and wherein ^a he threatened him with a sore disease in his bowels, and his wives, his children, and his people, with judgments of several kinds, which God would send upon them. Nor was it long before these threats began to operate. The Edomites, who had all along been subject to the house of David, rebelled; and having expelled his deputy, made themselves a king of their own, and were never again subject to the Jewish yoke. Libnah, a city in his own dominions, shook off its allegiance, and refused to acknowledge him any longer for its sovereign. The Philistines and Arabians made inroads upon his territories, ravaged the country, plundered his palaces, and carried away his very wives and children; so that they left none except Jehoahaz the youngest; and, to complete his misery, after God had afflicted him with a cruel dysentery, which for two years grievously tormented him, and brought him at last to his grave, he died, without being so much as lamented by his subjects; and after a life of forty, and a reign of eight years, being buried indeed in the city of David, but not in any of the royal sepulchres, was succeeded by his son Jehoahaz. But to return to the history of king Ahaziah.

Ahaziah, as we said, succeeded his father Ahab in the kingdom of Israel, in the seventeenth year of Jehoshaphat's reign, and was not a whit behind him in all manner of wickedness. But as his reign was but short, in the whole not above the space of two years, so was it inglorious and full of trouble. For in the first year of his reign, the Moabites, who had always been obedient to the kings of Israel from the first separation of the two kingdoms, took now an opportunity to revolt; nor had he power to reduce them to their subjection; for in the second year of his reign, he received such a hurt by a fall from ^b the terrace of his house, as reduced him to a very bad state of health. In this condition, he sent to ^a Baal-zebub, the god of Ekron, to know if he should surrounded with a battlement, to prevent falling from them, because it was a customary thing for people to walk upon them in order to take the air. Now, in this battlement, we may suppose that there were some wooden lattices for people to look through, of equal height with the parapet wall, and that Ahaziah negligently leaning on it, as it was rotten and infirm, it broke down, and let him fall into the court or garden belonging to his house. Or there is another way whereby he might fall. In these flat roofs, there was generally an opening which served instead of a skylight to the house below; and this opening might be done over with lattice-work, which the king, as he was carelessly walking, might chance to step upon, and slip through. Nor is there any absurdity in supposing such lattice-work in a king's palace, when the world was not arrived to that height of art and curiosity which we find it in now.—Poole's Annotations, and Calmel's Dissertation on the Buildings of the Ancient Hebrews.

^c The word signifies, the god of flies; but how this idol came to obtain that name, it is not so easy a matter to discover. Several are of opinion, that this god was called Baal-semin, the lord of heaven, but that the Jews, by way of contempt, gave it the name of Baal-zebub, or the lord of a fly, a god that was nothing worth, or, as others say, whose temple was filled with flies; whereas the temple of Jerusalem, notwithstanding all the sacrifices that were daily offered, never once had a fly in it, as their doctors relate. The sacred writings, indeed, when they speak of the gods of the heathens, very frequently call them, in general, idols, vanity, abominations, &c., but they never change their proper names into such as are of an opprobrious import: neither can we think it likely, that the king of Israel would have called the god of Ekron, for whom he had so high a veneration as to consult him in his sickness, by any appellation of contempt. Whoever considers what troublesome and destructive creatures, especially in some hot countries, flies are known to be; in what vast swarms they sometimes settle, and not only devour all the fruits of the earth, but in many places occasion a noisome pestilence; may reasonably suppose, that the heathens had a proper deity to whom they paid their addresses, either for the prevention or removal of this sore plague. [In particular, the fly, called Zebub, and in modern Arabic, Zimb, is an insect so very destructive as to render it far from surprising that the ancient polytheists, who had gods presiding over every department of nature, should worship, as a very powerful deity, Baalzebub, or the lord of flies. The Zebub, or Zimb is never seen, says Mr Bruce, but where the earth is fat and loamy; and though very little larger than a bee, "whenever it makes its appearance in swarms, as it always does, and even as soon as its buzzing is heard, all the cattle forsake their food, and run wildly about, till they die, worn out with fatigue, fright, and hunger." Even the elephant flies before it, or rolls himself in the mire to protect his skin from its attack. "The very sound of the Zimb, before it is seen, occasions," says the same author, "more trepidation both in the human and brute creation, than would whole herds of these monstrous animals collected together, though their number was in a tenfold proportion greater than it really is;" and the only remedy that remains for the shepherd on the appearance of this destructive insect, is to hasten with his cattle as quickly as he can, to the nearest sandy desert, whither the Zimb never pursues them. If we may believe Sandys, these flies abound in the country that was anciently called Ekron.]—Bp. Gleig. And accordingly we are told by Pliny (b. 29. c. 6.), that when there was a plague in Africa, occasioned by vast quantities of flies, after that the people had sacrificed to the god Achore, (he should have said the god of Ekron, for there is a plain affinity between their names,) the flies all died, and the distemper was extinguished. Now, it was a known maxim of the heathen theology, that as all plagues were inflicted by some evil demon or other, so all evil demons were under the restraint of some superior one, who is their prince and ruler. As therefore Pluto was known to be the god of hell, and to have all the mischievous band of spirits under his control, to him the heathens used to pray, and offer sacrifices, that he might not suffer any of his inferior agents to inflict this heavy judgment upon them. They worshipped him, I say, not to engage him to do them any good, but to prevail with him to do them no harm; and accordingly we may observe that every thing in their service was dark and gloomy. Their offerings were in the night: "then to the Stygian king he performs nocturnal sacrifices." (Virg. Æn.

this writing to be delivered to him upon presumption that it would affect him the more, as it came from a person that was translated into heaven. But this notion has no better foundation than the other, for the prophets were sent to those who lived in their own age, to declare unto them the will of God, not to write letters, fit to be delivered only when they had departed out of this life. God never left himself without a witness; and at this time more especially, there were prophets in abundance; and therefore others have supposed, that there has been a mistake in the transcriber; and the name of Elijah put for that Elisha; or that Elijah, by whom this letter was sent, was not the prophet who was taken up to heaven, but another of that name, who lived in the subsequent age, and was contemporary with Jehoram. Which of these conjectures, for conjectures they are all, seems most feasible, we are at liberty to choose, since any of them is sufficient to solve the above-mentioned difficulty.—Le Clerc and Patrick's Commentary. [Beothroyd, in his translation, (2 Chron. xxi. 12.) instead of Elijah reads Elisha; and adds, this correction seems absolutely necessary, though not confirmed, perhaps, by any one MS. or ancient version. From comparing parallel passages, it is clear that errors in names are most frequent.]—Ed.

^a There was no calamity that could be thought of, as several have observed, which did not befall this wicked prince. His kingdom was destroyed and depopulated by the fiercest nations; his treasures ransacked; his wives carried into captivity; his children slain; himself afflicted with a sore disease for two years; and, when he was dead, denied the honour of a royal sepulchre, such as his father had. All which calamities were threatened in this writing sent him in the name of Elijah, that he might not think that they came by chance, but by the special direction of Almighty God, as a punishment for his impiety.—Patrick's Commentary on 2 Chron. xxi. 11.

recover; but, by God's appointment, the prophet Elijah was sent to meet his messengers, and to turn them back with this answer, 'that the king should certainly die.'^a The messengers coming back much sooner than was expected,^b acquainted the king with the reason of it; and he,^c by their description, understanding that it was Elijah who sent him the message, immediately despatched a captain with fifty soldiers to apprehend him; but upon their approach, the prophet commanded fire to come down from heaven and destroy them. The like he did to another captain and his company; but when the third came, in a more submissive manner, and begged his life, and the lives of his soldiers,^d Elijah went with him to the king, and told him from his own mouth what he had before told the messengers; which accordingly came to pass, for he died a short time after, and having no son of his own, was,^e in the second year of Jehoram, son of Jehoshaphat king of Judah, succeeded by his brother Jehoram.

About the beginning of the f reign of Jehoram, king of Judah, Elijah the prophet was translated into heaven. God, very likely, had given him some intimation of the time when this miraculous event should happen; and therefore, before his departure, he visited the sons of the prophets that were at Bethel and Jericho, and took his leave of them with such solemnity, that they began to suspect that this was the last visit he intended to make them; and accordingly g apprised Elisha of it, who thereupon determined not to leave his master, as long as he continued upon earth.

With this resolution, he set forward with Elijah, who was now shaping his course towards his native country of Gilead, from whence he was to be translated; and as they were to pass over the Jordan, Elijah h with his mantle struck the waters, which instantly divided into two parts, so that they went over on dry ground.

When they had passed the river in the sight of fifty of the i sons of the prophets, and as they drew near to the

6. 'Their victims were black: "The chaste Sybil shall invoke thee with the blood of many a swart victim." (Virg. Æn. 6.) And the blood let out into a deep ditch: "he sinks the knife in the throat of the black victim, and sprinkles the wide ditches with blood." (Orii. Met. b. 7.) Such good reason have we to think, that the Baal-zebub, in Scripture, called the 'prince of the devils,' was the very same with the Pluto whom the heathens made the god of hell, and worshipped in this manner.—Patrick's and Le Clerc's Commentaries; Jurice's History of Doctrines and Worship, part 4. c. 3, &c.; Bruce's Travels, and Harner's Observations.

a Ekron was a city and government of the Philistines, which fell by lot to the tribe of Judah, in the first division made by Joshua, (Josh. xv. 45.) but was afterwards given up to the tribe of Dan, (Josh. xix. 43.) though it does not appear from history that the Jews ever had a peaceable possession of it. It was situated near the Mediterranean sea, between Ashdod and Jammia, in a moist and hot soil, and was therefore very much infested with flies.—Calmel's Dictionary and Patrick's Commentary.

b It may seem somewhat strange, that Ahaziah's messengers should stop their journey to Ekron, at Elijah's command; but he was a man of such a venerable presence, and spake to them with such authority in the name of the Lord, that they were overawed thereby to obey him rather than the king.—Patrick's Commentary.

c The description which the messengers give of Elijah, is, 'that he was a hairy man, and girt with a girdle of leather about his loins,' (2 Kings i. 8.) where his being a hairy man, may either denote his wearing long hair on his head, and his beard, as the ancient Greek philosophers were wont to do, and as Lucan describes Cato, "over his stern front, he allowed his hoary hair to hang, and on his chin, a gloomy beard to grow." Or it may denote his habit, which was made of skins, rough, and with their hair on; as the ancient heroes were clothed in the skins of lions, tigers, and bears; as the Evangelist represents the Baptist in "a raiment of camel's hair," (Mat. iii. 4.) as the apostle describes the prophets, "wandering about in sheep skins and goat skins," (Heb. xi. 37.) and as Statius dresses up old Tiresias, "he assumes the heavy looks and voice and well-known skins of that aged seer Tiresias."—Theb. b. 2.

d This is a great instance of the prophet's faith and obedience to God in whom he trusted, that he would deliver him from the wrath of the king, and the malice of Jezebel. He had ordered, not long before, all the prophets of Baal to be slain; had sent a very unwelcome message to the king; and now made a very terrible execution upon two of his captains and their companies; so that he had all the reason in the world to apprehend the utmost expressions of the king's displeasure; and yet, when God commands him, he makes no manner of hesitation, but goes boldly to him, and confirms, with his own mouth, the ungrateful truth which he had declared to his messengers.—Patrick's Commentary.

e How could Jehoram, the brother of Ahaziah, begin his reign in Israel in the second year of Jehoram, the son of Jehoshaphat, when we read soon after, that he began to reign over Israel in the eighteenth year of Jehoshaphat king of Judah, (2 Kings iii. 1.) and in another place, that Jehoram, the son of Jehoshaphat, began to reign over Judah, in the fifth year of Jehoram king of Israel? (2 Kings viii. 16.) Now, it is but supposing that Jehoshaphat declared his son Jehoram king, while himself was alive, and reigned in conjunction with him for the space of seven years, and all the difficulty is removed: for then Jehoram, the son of Ahab, might begin his reign in the second year of Jehoram king of Jehoshaphat, namely, in the second year that he reigned with his father who was then alive; and Jehoram, son of Jehoshaphat, may be said to have begun his reign in the fifth of Jehoram the son of Ahab, meaning the time when, after his father's death, he began to reign alone. That the kings of Judah and Israel, as well as other oriental princes, were accustomed to appoint their successors, and even during their lifetime, to give them some share in the administration, is plain from several instances: and that Jehoshaphat found it expedient to settle his son in the kingdom with himself, seems to be intimated in 2 Chron. xxi. 3, where it is said, that 'he gave the kingdom to Jehoram, because he was his first-born, and gave gifts to the rest of his sons, who, being many, might perhaps be forming parties, and be entering into cabals about the succession to the kingdom; and therefore to put an end to all such contests, Jehoshaphat declared Jehoram king, while himself was on the throne, because he was his first-born.—Calmel's and Patrick's Commentaries.

f To prevent confusion, the reader is desired to take notice, that in the course of this history there is mention made of two Jehorams, who reigned much about the same time; one, the second son of Ahab, who succeeded his brother Ahaziah, and was king of Israel; and the other, who was son and heir to Jehoshaphat, and reigned in Judah; both very wicked princes; and therefore the greater care should be taken, that their actions be not blended together.

g The expression in the text is, 'Knowest thou that the Lord will take away thy master from thy head to-day?' (2 Kings ii. 3.) where the sons of the prophets allude to their manner of sitting in their schools. For the scholars used to sit below their master's feet, and the masters above over their heads, when they taught them; and therefore the sense of the words is, that 'God would deprive Elisha of his master Elijah's instructions, namely, by a sudden death. For it does not appear that they had any notion of his translation; so far from this, that they desired leave to send out some to seek for him, "if peradventure the Spirit of the Lord had taken him up, and cast him upon some mountain, or into some valley," (2 Kings ii. 16.)—Patrick's Commentary.

h In these two books of Kings, there is mention made five times of this mantle; and in every place it is called Adareth, which denotes 'a royal as well as a prophetic robe.' The Septuagint always translates it by the word μαλωρι, which properly signifies the prophetic mantle, made of lamb-skins, being a kind of upper garment thrown over the shoulders, and, as some think, reaching down to the heels; though others take it for no more than a leathern jacket to keep out rain. "Let the leathern mantle never be wanting, in case of sudden rains," (Mart. b. 11.)

i By 'the sons of the prophets,' we are to understand 'the place of Elijah's ascension, Elisha requested of him that the same gift of prophecy which God had been pleased to bestow on him, might be ^a communicated to him, in a larger measure than to the other prophets; which the other did not positively promise, but told him, however, that if he happened to see him when he came to be translated, this would be a good sign, that God would not refuse him his request: and while they were thus going on, and talking, there appeared, as it were, a bright chariot, and horses, running towards them on the ground, and, coming between them, parted them. ^b For Elijah mounted the chariot, and in a great gust of wind, directed by angels, was transported into heaven; while Elisha, who was left behind, ^c cried to him as he saw scholars of the prophets, such as they educated and trained up in religion and virtue, upon whom God by degrees bestowed the spirit of prophecy, and whom the superior prophets employed in the same capacity, as the apostles did the evangelists, namely, to publish their prophecies and instructions to the people, in the places where they themselves could not go. Nor is it any small testimony of Gods' love to an apostate people, that in these corrupt times, and in that very place where the golden calves were worshipped, he still continued the schools of the prophets, in order to recover them from idolatry. Nay, what is very remarkable, there were prophets of greater excellency for their miracles, in Israel, than were in Judah, because they needed them more, both to turn their hard hearts from the worship of idols, and to preserve the pious persons that remained among them from deserting their religion.—Patrick's Commentary.

^a The words in the text are, 'Let, I pray thee, a double portion of thy Spirit be upon me;' where some learned men are of opinion, that this request in Elisha would be arrogant, if the words were to be taken in their most obvious sense; and therefore they refer them to Elisha's school-fellows, whom he desires to surpass in all prophetic gifts, as much as the first-born did excel the other children in his portion of the inheritance. But seeing Elijah had no other successor upon whom he was to bestow any prophetic gifts, but Elisha, we cannot see why Elisha may not be said to have a double portion of the prophetic spirit, since it is evident he did many more miracles than Elijah did, and even after his death, exerted a divine power in raising the dead man, (2 Kings xiii. 21.) Had he desired this double portion indeed out of a principle of vainglory, there might then be something said against his request; but since he did it with a pure intent to become thereby more serviceable in his generation, we cannot perceive why he was to blame in requesting what our blessed Saviour granted to his apostles, namely, the power of working greater miracles than he himself did.—Le Clerc's and Calmel's Commentaries.

^b What this chariot was, and to what place it conveyed Elijah, we shall have occasion to observe in the following chapter; at present we shall only take notice of some things relating to this prophet's character. The author of Ecclesiasticus (xlviii. 1, &c.) has dedicated this encomium to his memory, "Then stood up Elias the prophet as fire, and his word burnt like a lamp. He brought a sore famine among them, and by his zeal he diminished their number. By the word of the Lord he shut up the heaven, and also three times brought down fire. O Elias, how wast thou honoured by thy wondrous deeds? And who may glory like unto thee? Who didst raise a dead man from death, and his son from the place of the dead, by the word of the Most High; who broughtest kings to destruction, and honourable men to their bed:—Who wast taken up in a whirlwind of fire, and in a chariot of fiery horses: who was ordained for reproofs in their times, to pacify the wrath of the Lord's judgment before it brake forth into fury: to turn the heart of the father to the son, and to restore the tribes of Jacob." In which last sentence our author alludes to that passage in Malachi, (iv. 5, 6.) 'Behold I will send you Elijah the prophet, before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord; and he shall turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, and the hearts of the children to their fathers, lest I come and smite the earth with a curse.'

^c The words of Elisha upon this occasion are, 'My father, my father,' so they called their masters and instructors, 'the chariots of Israel, and the horsemen thereof.' The expression alludes to him mount, and expressed his sorrow when he was gone: but taking up the mantle which had dropped from him in his ascent, with it he divided the waters, as Elijah had done, and repassed the Jordan.

Hereby the prophets of Jericho, and the places adjacent, were convinced that the spirit of Elijah rested upon Elisha. And accordingly, when they met him, they recognised him for his successor, and paid him the same respect. Believing, however, that the Spirit of God might possibly have ^d transported Elijah into some distant or desert place, they desired leave to send out fifty men in search of him. Elisha assured them that it would be needless: however, to give them all the conviction they desired, he suffered them to do what they pleased; so that the men went and returned again after three days' search to no purpose.

From this place Elisha proceeded to Jericho, where, at the request of the inhabitants, he cured the ^e barrenness of their water, and the barrenness of their

the form of the chariot and horses that he had just then beheld, and seems to imply, "that Elijah, by his example, and counsel, and prayers, and power with God, did more for the defence and preservation of Israel, than all their chariots and horses, and other warlike provisions;" unless we may suppose that this was an abrupt speech which Elisha, in the consternation he was in, left unfinished, and so the sacred history has recorded it.—Poole's Annotations and Le Clerc's Commentaries.

^d 'The Spirit of the Lord,' whereby we may understand either the power of God, or some one of his angels, frequently used to carry the prophets through the air, and with vast celerity remove them to distant places; and therefore Obadiah speaks of it as a common thing: 'and it shall come to pass, as soon as I am gone from thee, that the Spirit of the Lord will carry thee where I know not, so that when the king cannot find thee he will slay me,' (1 Kings xviii. 12.) And accordingly in the New Testament, we are told of Philip, that 'when they were come out of the water, the Spirit of the Lord caught him away, that the eunuch saw him no more, and Philip was found at Azotus,' (Acts viii. 39, 40.)—Le Clerc's Commentary.

^e The manner in which the prophet Elisha sweetened the fountain, and made the soil fruitful, was by casting salt into the water, to make the miracle more conspicuous: for salt is a thing, that of all others, makes water less potable, and the ground more barren. Josephus, however, willing to improve upon this history, adds, as his usual manner is, several circumstances of his own. For he tells us, "That this fountain did not only corrupt the fruits of the earth, whether grain or plants, but likewise caused abortions in women, and tainted, with a blasted infection, whatever it touched, that was capable of such impression; that Elisha, having been treated with great hospitality and respect by the people of Jericho, bethought himself of such an acknowledgment, as they themselves, their country, and their posterity, to the end of the world, might be the better for; that hereupon he went out to the fountain, and causing a pitcher of salt to be let down to the bottom of it, he advanced his right hand towards heaven, and, presenting his oblations at the side of it, besought God, in his goodness, to correct the water, and to sweeten the veins through which it passed; to soften the air, and to make it more temperate and fructifying; to bestow children as well as fruits, upon the inhabitants in abundance; and never to withdraw these blessings, so long as they continued in their duty; and that upon offering up this prayer, with all due ceremony, and according to form, the ill quality of the fountain was changed, and, instead of sterility, became now an efficacious means of plenty and increase." The author, we may observe, to gratify the pagans, represents Elisha in the form of a magician, who, by invocations, oblations, and other mysterious operations, changed the bad quality of the waters, and thereby made the valley of Jericho fruitful; whereas this was done in a manner altogether supernatural and miraculous. Nay, to this very day, there is a fountain on the west of Jericho, which rises about three quarters of a league above the town, in the way to Jerusalem, which, yielding a great deal of water, and that very good in its kind, runs along and fructifies the plain.—The Wars of the Jews, b. 5. c. 4.

soil.^a Thence he continued his course to Bethel, where, upon the children's mocking and ridiculing him, ^b two she-bears rushing out of the neighbouring forest, fell upon them, and devoured two and forty of them. From Bethel he went to Mount Carmel, where probably there was another school of the prophets; and from thence he proceeded to Samaria, where he had soon opportunities enough of exerting his prophetic office.

It was in the eighteenth year of Jehoshaphat king of Judah, that this Jehoram king of Israel, ^c began to

^a 2 Kings ii. 19. 'And the ground barren,' marg. 'causing to miscarry.' If the latter reading is allowed to be more just than the former, we must entertain a different idea of the situation of Jericho than the textual translation suggests. There are actually at this time cities where animal life of certain kinds pines, and decays, and dies; and where that posterity which should replace such loss, is either not conceived; or, if conceived, is not brought to the birth; or, if brought to the birth, is fatal in delivery to both mother and offspring. An instance of this kind occurs in Don Ulloa's Voyage to South America, vol. i. p. 93. He says of the climate of Porto Bello, that "it destroys the vigour of nature, and often untimely cuts the thread of life." And of Senaar, Mr Bruce (Trav. vol. iv. p. 469.) says, that "no horse, mule, ass, or any beast of burthen, will breed, or even live at Senaar, or many miles about it. Poultry does not live there; neither dog nor cat, sheep nor bullock, can be preserved a season there. They must go all, every year, to the sands. Though every possible care be taken of them, they die in every place where the fat earth is about the town, during the first season of the rains." He farther mentions, that the situation is equally unfavourable to most trees.—En.

^c 'Jehoram king of Israel began to reign.' There were two Jehorams who were contemporary: the first, the son of Ahab, brother to Ahaziah, and his successor in the kingdom of Israel; the second, the son of Jehoshaphat king of Judah, who succeeded his father in Judah. But there is a difficulty here: how is it that Jehoram, the brother of Ahaziah, began to reign in the second year of Jehoram son of Jehoshaphat, as it is stated, 2 Kings i. 17, seeing that, according to chap. iii. 1, he began his reign in the eighteenth year of the reign of Jehoshaphat; and according to chap. viii. 16, 'Jehoram, son of Jehoshaphat, began to reign in the fifth year of Jehoram king of Israel.' Calmet and others answer thus: "Jehoram king of Israel began to reign in the eighteenth year of Jehoshaphat king of Judah, which was the second year after this Jehoshaphat had given the vice-royalty to his son Jehoram; and afterwards Jehoshaphat communicated the royalty to Jehoram his successor, two years before his death, and the fifth year of Jehoram king of Israel." Dr Lightfoot takes another method:—"Observe," says he, "these texts, 1 Kings xxii. 51, 'Ahaziah the son of Ahab began to reign over Israel in Samaria, the seventeenth year of Jehoshaphat king of Judah, and reigned two years'; and 2 Kings i. 17: 'And Ahaziah died, according to the word of the Lord which Elijah had spoken, and Jehoram reigned in his stead, in the second year of Jehoram son of Jehoshaphat, king of Judah'; and 2 Kings iii. 1: 'Now Jehoram the son of Ahab began to reign over Israel in Samaria the eighteenth year of Jehoshaphat king of Judah.' By these Scriptures it is most plain, that both Jehoram, the son of Jehoshaphat, and Ahaziah, the son of Ahab, began to reign in the seventeenth year of Jehoshaphat: for who sees not in these texts that Jehoshaphat's eighteenth, when Jehoram the son of Ahab began to reign, is called the second year of Jehoram the son of Jehoshaphat? Now Jehoshaphat's reign was not yet expired by eight or nine years, for this was in his seventeenth year, and he reigned twenty-five years; (1 Kings xxii. 42.) nor was Ahab's reign yet expired by two or three years, for this was in his twentieth year, and he reigned twenty-two years, (1 Kings xvi. 29.) But the reason why both their sons came thus into their thrones in their lifetime, and both in the same year, was, because their fathers, Jehoshaphat and Ahab, were both engaged in the war against the Syrians, about Ramoth-Gilead; and while they were providing for it, and carrying it on, they made their sons vice-royals, and set them to reign in their stead, while they were absent, or employed upon that expedition." This is very pro-reign; and though he did not make any great reformation in his kingdom, yet he was not altogether so wicked as his father and brother: for he ^d removed the idols of Baal, very likely to procure Jehoshaphat's friendship, though the golden calves which were the state-engine to keep up the division between Israel and Judah, he could not prevail with himself to depose. In this state, however, he ^e had Jehoshaphat for an ally, when he engaged in a war, which was in the beginning of his reign, with Mesha king of Moab, for refusing to pay the tribute ^f of an hundred thousand lambs, and an hundred thousand rams with the wool, which, until the reign of his brother Ahaziah, had been all along from the time of David paid to the crown of Israel; and as the king of Israel was then no more than deputy to Jehoshaphat, he engaged him likewise in the quarrel. These three kings, in order to surprise the enemy, and invade him on the weakest side, took a compass of seven days' march in the wilderness of Edom, and had like to have been all lost for want of water, had not the prophet Elisha, who was then in the camp, ^g put them in a method how to procure some; ^g and not only so, but at the same time promised nable, and seems well supported by the above texts, and would solve all the difficulties with which many have been puzzled, and not a few stumbled. Here we have sufficient evidence for the vice-royalty here mentioned.—Dr A. Clarke.—ED.

^d It is a little strange, that his mother Jezebel, who brought this worship with her from the Sidonians, should suffer him to remove the images of her favourite god; but she perhaps might be a little daunted with the many disasters that had befallen her family, and was content with the privilege of having her idolatrous worship in private; nor is it unlikely, that Jehoshaphat might refuse to assist him in his wars against the king of Moab, unless he would consent to renounce his idolatry.—Patrick's Commentary.

^e The answer which he gives Jehoram is the very same that he returned to his father Ahab, in his war against the Syrians: 'I am as thou art; my people, as thy people; and my horses, as thy horses,' (1 Kings xxii. 4. and 2 Kings iii. 7.) And considering the ill success he had, one would wonder why he should be so forward to join with his son; but, as Jehoram had reformed some things, he might have a better opinion of him, and, by showing him kindness, hope perhaps to prevail with him to proceed farther; and, as the Moabites had of late invaded his country, (2 Chron. xx. 1.) he might embrace this opportunity to chastise them for it. But, without these considerations, the war was right and justifiable; and fit it was that rebels and revolvers should be chastised, lest the example should pass into his own dominions, and encourage the Edomites to revolt from him, as we find they afterwards did from his son.—Patrick's Commentary and Poole's Annotations.

^f This was a prodigious number indeed; but then we are to consider, that these countries abounded with sheep, inasmuch that Solomon offered 120,000 at the dedication of the temple, (2 Chron. vii. 5.) and the Reubenites drove from the Hagarites 250,000, (1 Chron. v. 21.) For, as Bochart observes, their sheep frequently brought forth two at a time, and sometimes twice a year. The same learned man remarks, that in ancient times, when people's riches consisted in cattle, this was the only way of paying tribute; for, as he quotes the passage out of Pliny, "money, (pecunia,) was even named so from the word pecus, or cattle: and still yet in the Censor's tables all things are called pusca, (pastures,) from which the people received revenue, because this had long been their only income." (Nat. Hist. b. 18. c. 3) It is observed by others likewise, that this great number of cattle was not a tribute which the Moabites were obliged to pay to the Israelites every year, but on some special occasion only; upon the accession of every new king, for instance, when they were obliged to express their homage in this manner, or to make satisfaction for some damages, that the Israelites should at any time suffer from their invidious or revolts.—Patrick's and Le Clerc's Commentaries.

them a complete victory over the Moabites. The next morning, the confederate army had water enough; ^a and the Moabites, who were now marching to oppose them, perceiving water where they knew there used to be none, and, by the reflection of the sun, that it looked like blood, supposed that the three kings had quarrelled, and their armies engaged, and slain one another; so that they concluded they had nothing to do but to fall upon the spoil. But when they came to the camp, the Israelites gave them a reception that they little expected; for they not only killed great numbers of them upon the spot, but pursued them into their country, destroyed their fortified places, choked up their springs, cut down their timber, ^b and made ravage and devastation wherever they came; insomuch that the king was forced to betake himself to his capital city, Kirhareth, where the confederate army besieged him, and soon reduced him to such extremity, that after he had made a successful sally with 700 men, in hopes of forcing the king of Edom's quarters, and found himself repulsed, he took his eldest son, ^c and in mere desperation, sacrificed him upon the wall of the city, in the sight of the Israelitish army, who being struck with horror at so barbarous an action, raised the siege, and retired to their own country. ^d

Upon raising this siege, the prophet Elisha left the three kings, and returned to Samaria; whereupon the sacred historian gives a long detail of the several miracles which he wrought, namely, ¹ that he increased a poor widow's oil, to such a quantity, as enabled her to pay her husband's debts, and preserve her two sons from bondage. ² That, to reward the wealthy Shunamite for his kindness and hospitality to him, ^e he prevailed in his prayers with God, that his wife might have a child, and afterwards, when the child died, ³ restored him to life again. That while he was at Gilgal, he cured the noxious quality of the prophets' ^f colloquintida pottage, by

^c Not only the Holy Scriptures, but several heathen writers likewise do assure us of this, that in cases of great extremity, it was customary among people to sacrifice to their gods whatever was most dear to them. Caesar, in his war with the Gauls, tells us, that when they were afflicted with grievous diseases, or in time of war, or great danger, they either offered men for sacrifices, or vowed that they would offer them; because they imagined, that their gods could never be appeased, unless one man's life was given for another's. No less a man than Grotius is of opinion, that this Moabitish king, in imitation of Abraham, sacrificed his son to the God of Israel, hoping thereby to appease his wrath, and to move the compassion of the kings that were besieging him: but the most general opinion is, that he offered this costly sacrifice to some false deity, and very likely to Chemosh, which was his national god, and generally thought to be the sun.—Cabnet's and Le Clerc's Commentaries.

^d Instead of the words, 'there was great indignation against Israel,' as in our version, 2 Kings iii. 27, Boethroyd has, 'there was great indignation amongst the Israelites,' which seems to be the true reading.—Ed.

^e This kindness consisted in entertaining him; to the better accomplishment of which, they built for him a little chamber on the wall, that he might turn in thither, as related, 2 Kings viii. 10. The following may illustrate the nature of this chamber: "To most of these houses there is a smaller one annexed, which sometimes rises one story higher than the house; at other times it consists of one or two rooms only, and a terrace, whilst others that are built, as they frequently are, over the porch or gateway, have, if we except the ground floor, which they have not, all the conveniences that belong to the house, properly so called. There is a door of communication from them into the gallery of the house, kept open or shut at the discretion of the master of the family, besides another door, which opens immediately from a private staircase, down into the porch or street, without giving the least disturbance to the house. These back houses are known by the name of olev or oleah, for the house properly so called, is dar or bet, and in them strangers are usually lodged and entertained. The oleah of holy Scripture, being literally the same appellation, is accordingly so rendered in the Arabic version. We may suppose it then to have been a structure of the like contrivance. The little chamber, consequently, that was built by the Shunamite for Elisha, whither, the text instructs us, he retired at his pleasure, without breaking in upon the private affairs of the family, or being in his turn interrupted by them in his devotions; the summer chamber of Eglon, which, in the same manner with these, seems to have had privy stairs belonging to it, through which Ehud escaped, after he had revenged Israel upon the king of Moab; the chamber over the gate, whither, for the greater privacy, king David withdrew himself to weep for Absalom; and that upon whose terrace, Ahaz, for the same reason, erected his altars; seem to have been structures of the like nature and contrivance with these oleahs."—Shaw's Travels, p. 280.—Ed.

^f It is a plant so very bitter, that some have called it the gall of the whole earth. It purges excessively, and is a sort of poison, if not qualified, and taken in a moderate quantity.—Cabnet's and Patrick's Commentaries. It is customary to use herbs gathered ply of water by any knowledge of his own, as our author's words would seem to imply, he merely announced to them what God had revealed to him, namely, that they should dig a number of ditches, and that these should be miraculously filled with water. "The mind of the holy man being discomposed, as it seems, by the presence of the idolatrous Edomite, he called for music, in order, probably, that its soothing influence might prepare him to give a response with calmness and self-possession, and then he predicted the manner and issue of the battle in terms as plain as if it had been a description after the event. The manner in which the enemy were delivered into the hands of the confederate kings, was altogether miraculous, for, though it was through the intervention of water, there was not the whirlwind, which in the east is the usual prognostic of rain; and it was to that usual atmospheric appearance, previous to a shower, that the prophet alluded, when he said, 'Ye shall not see wind, neither shall ye see rain, yet the valley shall be filled with water, that ye may drink, both you and your cattle.' The event fell out precisely as the prophet had foretold; the whole country was filled with water, and what proved a most seasonable relief to the confederate armies, was the cause of the enemy's destruction, for in consequence of the reflection of the sun's rays on the water, which, at its rising and falling, often gives water a red appearance, they were deceived into the belief that it was blood; and that such a profusion of it could have been occasioned only by some sudden and deadly strife between the allies. Under this delusion, they ran carelessly to the camp of the opposite party, by whom they were surprised, put to flight, and killed in great numbers, their country invaded and laid waste.—Jamieson's Eastern Manners, pp. 316, 317.—Ed.

^a 2 Kings iii. 17. 'Ye shall not see wind, neither shall ye see rain; yet the valley shall be filled with water.' Rain is often in the east preceded by a squall of wind. The editor of the Ruins of Palmyra tells us, that they seldom have rain except at the equinoxes, and that nothing could be more serene than the sky all the time he was there, except one afternoon, when there was a small shower, preceded by a whirlwind, which took up such quantities of sand from the desert, as quite darkened the sky (p. 37). Thus Elisha told the king of Israel, 'ye shall not see wind nor rain, yet that valley shall be filled with water.' The circumstance of the wind taking up such a quantity of sand as to darken the sky, may serve to explain 1 Kings xviii. 45: 'The heaven was black with clouds and wind.' The wind prognosticating rain is also referred to Prov. xxv. 11: 'Whoso boasteth himself of a false gift, pretending to give something valuable and disappointing the expectation, is like clouds and wind without rain.'—Harmer, vol. 1. p. 51.—Ed.

^b 2 Kings iii. 25. 'Felled all the good trees.' In times of war it was formerly very common for one party to injure the other, by destroying their valuable trees. Thus the Moabites were punished, and thus the Arabs of the holy land still make war upon each other, burning the corn, cutting down the olive trees, &c.—Hasselquist's Travels, p. 143.—Ed.

the injection of a little meal. ¹ That there he multiplied twenty barley loaves, and satisfied above 100 persons with them; and ² that there he made an axe, which was fallen into the river, merely by throwing in a stick, rise up, and swim upon the surface of it: but the miracle which the sacred history more particularly insists on, is the cure of Naaman's leprosy.

Naaman was general of the king of Syria's troops, a man famous for exploits in war, and in great esteem with his master; but he was a leper. At this time there seems to have been no good understanding between the two crowns; and yet the king of Syria, to recover so valuable a servant from his illness, wrote to the king of Israel, but in such terms as gave him some uneasy apprehensions. ^a When Elisha understood this, he ordered that Naaman might be sent to him; and when he came with all his attendants and stately equipage, instead of receiving in form, ^b he sent his servant out to him, and bade him go ^c dip himself seven times in the river Jordan, and he would be cured. The proud Syrian, not understanding this treatment, and expecting very likely that the prophet, by some personal act, would have performed the cure, thought himself slighted, and was for returning home: but being advised by those that were about him, that since the prescription was so easy, to make the experiment at least would not be much, he went to the river, and after having bathed seven times therein, found himself perfectly cured.

Rejoiced at his unexpected recovery, Naaman returned to Elisha, acknowledging, that there was no other God, but the God of Israel; protesting, that from thence forward he would sacrifice to none but him; desiring, for that purpose, two mules' loads ^d of the earth of the country, wherewith to build him an altar: deprecating any offence that might arise from his waiting on the king, ^e his master, when he went to worship in the temple of Rimmon; and, in the conclusion, importuning the prophet to accept of a present, for the great cure that he had wrought upon him, which the other most ^f positively refused.

But there was not the like disinterestedness in his servant Gehazi. He, thinking it unreasonable, that so potent and wealthy a person should go off without paying for so signal a benefit, resolved to get something for himself; and therefore, unknown to any body, as he thought, he followed after Naaman, and having soon overtaken him, forged a lie, that his master desired of the general to send him a talent of silver, and two changes of garments, for two sons of the prophets, who, since his departure, were come to visit him. The general was glad of this opportunity to oblige his master; and therefore pressed him to take two talents of silver with the garments, and sent two of his servants to carry them for him; from whom he received them before he came to his master's house, and deposited them, as he thought, in a safe place: but no sooner did he return into his master's presence, than he began to tax him with what he had been doing, which when Gehazi denied, he ^h denounced his sentence, namely, that the leprosy holy and acceptable to God, and proper for his service; or because he would, by this token, declare his conjunction with the people of Israel in the true worship, and constantly put himself in mind of his great obligation to that God, from whose land this earth was taken. He might have had indeed enough of this earth without asking any one for it; but he desired the prophet to give it him, as believing, perhaps, that he who put such virtue into the waters of Israel, could put as much in the earth thereof, and make it as useful and beneficial to him in another way. These thoughts indeed were groundless and extravagant, but yet were excusable in an heathen and novice, that was not as yet sufficiently instructed in the true religion.—Poole's Annotations.

^e 2 Kings v. 18. 'And he leaneth upon my hand.' This might be done out of state, or on account of weakness. In the additions to the book of Esther, (xv. 4.) mention is made of two young women that waited on that queen, upon one of whom she leaned, and the other held up her train. It was not only the custom amongst the Persians and Syrians, but the Israelites also. (2 Kings vii. 2, 17).—Patrick in locum.—Ed.

^f It is thought by the generality of interpreters, that as the Syrians were great worshippers of the sun, this god is the same; and that the name Rimmon, or high, is given him by reason of his elevation. Grotius takes it for Saturn, because that planet is the highest of all; and Selden will have it to be the same with Elion, or the most high god of the Phœnicians. It is certain that the word Rimmon is the name that the Syrians gave pomegranates; and therefore, as their country was full of pomegranate trees; whose fruit is not only of a delicious taste, but of great use likewise on account of the excellent liquor which it produces, they gave perhaps the name of pomegranate to their god, in the same manner that the Greeks and Latins gave that of Ceres to the goddess of corn.—Lamy's Introduction, b. 3. c. 1.; and Jurieu's History of Doctrines and Worship, part 4. c. 10.

^g Elisha did not think it a thing simply unlawful to receive gifts or presents: for we find him receiving them upon another occasion; (2 Kings iv. 41.) but he did not hold it expedient, in his present circumstances, to do it, because he thought it would make for the honour of the true God and religion, to let the Syrians see the generous piety, charity, and kindness of his ministers and servants, and how much they despised all that worldly wealth and glory, which the priests or prophets of the Gentiles so greedily sought after; that thereby Naaman might be confirmed in the religion he had embraced, and others, in like manner, incited to a love and liking of it.—Poole's Annotations.

^h And justly did he deserve it, since his crime led in it all these aggravations: a greedy covetousness which is idolatry; a from the fields, as well as those produced in the garden. Russell states, that at Aleppo, besides the herbs and vegetables produced by regularly cultivated gardens, the fields afford bugloss, mallow, and asparagus, which they use as pot herbs, with some others, which are used in salads.—Itinerary, vol. i. p. 552.—Ed.

^a 2 Kings v. 6. 'I have sent Naaman my servant unto thee, that thou mayest recover him of his leprosy.' Schultens, in his MS. Orig. Heb., observes, that "the right understanding of this passage depends on the custom of expelling lepers, and other infectious persons, from camps or cities, and reproachfully driving them into solitary places; and that when these persons were cleansed and re-admitted into cities or camps, they were said to be 'recollecti,' gathered again from their leprosy, and again received into that society from which they had been cut off.—Ed.

^b Elisha's not appearing to receive the Syrian general is ascribed by some to the retired course of life which the prophets led; but then why did he see him, and enter into conversation with him, when he returned from his cure? I should rather think, that it was not misbecoming the prophet, upon this occasion, to take some state upon him, and to support the character and dignity of a prophet of the Most High God; especially since this might be a means to raise the honour of his religion and ministry, and to give Naaman a righter idea of his miraculous cure, when he found that it was neither by the prayer nor presence of the prophet, but by the divine power and goodness that it was effected.—Poole's Annotations and Cabinet's Commentary.

^c In conformity to the law, which requires that lepers, in order to their cleansing, should be sprinkled seven times, (Lev. xiv. 7, &c.) the prophet ordered Naaman to dip himself as often; but Jordan, as the Syrian argued, had no more virtue in it than other rivers; nor could cold water, of any kind, be a proper means for curing this distemper, whose root is a white waterish humour, that would increase rather than be diminished by any such application.—Patrick's Commentary.

whereof he had cured Naaman should adhere to him and his family for ever; which accordingly, that very moment, came to pass.

CHAP. II.—Difficulties Obviated, and Objections Answered.

THE most material part of the discourse which passed between Naaman and Elisha, is delivered in these words: 'Thy servant,' says Naaman, 'will henceforth offer neither burnt-offerings nor sacrifice unto other gods, but unto the Lord: in this thing the Lord pardon thy servant, that, when my master goeth into the house of Rimmon, and he leaneth on my hand, and I bow myself in the house of Rimmon, the Lord pardon thy servant in this thing: and Elisha said unto him, go in peace.' 'Go in peace,' was a common form of valediction among the Jews, wherewith Elisha might dismiss Naaman without any further answer to his request, or resolution to his doubt. For the prophet, we must suppose, in this whole transaction, was under the immediate influence and direction of the Spirit of God; and therefore, if the Spirit of God thought proper to withhold any farther instruction from the Syrian general, it was not in the prophet's power though he had 'given him his house full of silver and gold,'² as Baalam put the case, 'to go beyond the word of the Lord to do more or less.' Considering then,³ that Naaman was now in the infancy of his conversion, and as yet not able to receive the higher precepts of perfection; that himself was conscious of his own offence, and wanted not therefore so much to be instructed, as encouraged and strengthened in the Lord: and that the matters wherein he seemed to doubt were not of such mighty importance as to concern the essence and foundation of religion; considering these things, I say, we may soon perceive the reason why Elisha accepted of his renunciation of a false and profession of a true religion, his declared aversion to the worship of idols, and fixed resolution to serve the Lord only, as a sufficient advance in his present circumstances.

Israelites, indeed, and such as were descended from the stock of Jacob, were obliged to the observation of the whole Mosaic law; but strangers and aliens, when they came to be admitted proselytes of the gate, were confined only to the worship of the true God, and the practice of such duties as were moral and social: and therefore, when Naaman professed himself a worshipper of the most high God only, and declared withal, that his attending his master into the temple of Rimmon was not with any religious purpose, but purely in performance of the duty of his office, the prophet had good reason to bid him go in peace, or, as the words may import, to give himself no uneasiness about the matter.

For, though we pretend not to say with some rabbinical doctors, that, as Naaman was no Jew, but a foreigner and a proselyte only,⁴ he was not obliged to abstain from all external worship of idols, as the Jews confessedly were, so long as he continued in another country; yet it is generally agreed, that we are bound to show the same respect to our superiors, and those that are set in authority over us, so long as we do not injure our consciences thereby, in one place as in another; and⁵ that therefore Naaman might very innocently retain his dignity, and high office at court, even as Joseph did in Egypt, and Daniel in Babylon; might accompany his master into Rimmon's temple, nay, and bow together with him, in compliance to his infirmity or convenience, who could not so well bow, if the other stood upright, so long as this was a service done to the man, as Tertullian⁶ reasons upon the like occasion, and not to the idol; so long as this was an act purely external, without any of those inward sentiments of respect which constitute the essence of adoration.

"This, I own, is the common solution; but it does not entirely please me. It justifies an action which Naaman himself was not well satisfied in. It leaves upon the prophet an imputation of too much lenity and indulgence, and, upon the general, that of too much hypocrisy and dissimulation. Had Naaman's example, in this sense, been made a precedent, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, in the court of Nebuchadnezzar, and old Eleazar, amidst Antiochus's officers, might have escaped persecution.⁷ They, at the sound of the instruments, might have fallen down before the image, not out of any principle of adoration, but in pure obedience to the king's orders; and⁸ Eleazar might have evaded the eating of swine's flesh, if he would have but let it been reported that he did eat it; but we find no such prevarication in either of these, and therefore we can hardly think, that this is the right solution."

⁹ Now since repentance has regard to what is past, and to ask pardon for an offence already committed is much more natural than to ask pardon for what we purpose for the future to commit, which, in matters of morality, is a kind of contradiction, it seems not improbable, that the words should be rendered, as the original will fairly bear it, in the preter tense: 'Lord, pardon thy servant, that when my master went into the house of Rimmon, to worship, and he leaned on my hand, and I bowed myself there, the Lord pardon thy servant in this thing.' For, how great would the incongruity be, if Naaman, who had just before declared his renunciation of idolatry, should now confess his readiness to relapse into the same crime, and desire God's pardon for it beforehand? Whereas, to ask pardon for what he had done amiss, and to desire the prophet's intercession with God in that behalf, argued a mind truly sensible of his former transgression, and very much resolved to avoid it for the future: and accordingly,¹⁰ it is supposed, that, upon his return home, he refused to worship Rimmon any more, and was thereupon dismissed from being general of the king's forces.¹¹

profanation of God's name; a downright theft, in keeping that to himself which was given for others; deliberate and impudent lying; a desperate contempt of God's omniscience, justice, and holiness; an horrible reproach cast upon the prophet and his religion; and a pernicious scandal given to Naaman, and every other Syrian that should chance to hear of it.—Poole's Annotations.

Bethel, we all know, was one of the cities where Jeroboam had set up a golden calf, a place strangely addicted to idolatry, and whose inhabitants had no small aversion to Elisha, as being the servant and successor of one who had been a professed enemy to their wicked worship, and himself no less an opposer of it. It is reasonable to suppose, therefore, that the children, if they were children, for the word naarim may signify grown youths as well, who mocked Elisha, were excited and encouraged thereunto by their parents; and, therefore, the judgment was just in God's punishing the wickedness of these parents by the death of their children, who, though they suffered in this life, had the happiness to be rescued from the dangers of an idolatrous education, which might have been of fatal tendency both to their present and future state.

In the mean time, it must be acknowledged, that the insolence of these mockers, whether we suppose them children or youths, was very provoking,² forasmuch as they ridiculed not only a man whose very age commanded reverence, but a prophet likewise, whose character, in all ages, was accounted sacred, nay, and even God himself, whose honour was struck at in the reproaches cast upon his servant; and that too in one of his most glorious and wonderful works, his assumption of Elijah into heaven. For, 'Go up thou bald-head, go up thou bald-head,'^a besides the bitterness of the contempt expressed in the repetition of the words, shows that they made a mere jest of any such translation; and therefore in mere banter, bid Elisha go up, whither, as he pretended, his friend and master was gone before.

These provocations, one would think, were enough to draw an imprecation from the prophet; but this imprecation did not proceed from any passion, or private resentment of his own, but merely from the command and commission of his God; who, for the terror and caution of other profane persons and idolaters, as well as for the maintenance of the honour and authority of his prophets, confirmed the word which had gone out of his servant's mouth.

The like is to be said of the destruction which Elijah called down from heaven, upon the two captains, and their companies, who came to apprehend him; that he did this, not out of any hasty passion or revenge, but purely in obedience to the Holy Spirit wherewith he was animated, and in zeal for the honour and glory of God, which, in the person of his prophet, were grossly abused.

The officers that were sent to him, call him indeed a man of God; but, by the answer which the prophet returned, we may learn, that they called him so only by way of contempt and derision.³ As they could not be ignorant, however, that Ahaziah was highly offended at Elijah, and had sent them for no other purpose, but to bring him to punishment⁴ for having denounced his death; if they thought proper to obey the king in such unrighteous proceedings, rather than the laws of nature and religion, which forbid us to be instruments in cruelty and wrong, they deserved the fate they met with: and our blessed Saviour does not blame Elijah's conduct in this respect, but his disciples only, for their perverse imitation of it, from a spirit of resentment and revenge, render it in the past tense, and make this a confession of his idolatry, and a prayer that he might receive forgiveness. In answer, he it remarked, first, That all the ancient versions render as our common version. Secondly, This version is most agreeable to the text, the words naturally suggesting it; and, thirdly, Naaman proposes a case, which must happen in the discharge of his duty. It appears to have been his duty, as chief commander, to attend the king when he went to worship; and when he did this, he asks, 'Will Jehovah pardon him?' Is such an act to be regarded as sinful, and inconsistent with the worship which Jehovah requires? If the act be considered in a civil light, he might bend in respect to the king without regarding the idol. To which it may be added, that the valediction of the prophet, 'go in peace,' may imply, 'trouble not thyself with scruples of this kind;' and in this concession there is nothing unreasonable, when we consider that Naaman did not enjoy the light of revelation, and was not amenable to the Mosaic law; but it by no means follows that such compliances are justifiable in those who live in an age or country, blessed with the knowledge of the revealed will of God. —Holden's Christian Expositor.—Ed.

a Whether Elisha was bald or not, does not appear from the sacred story, nor does it affect the object of these young scoffers, in applying that epithet to the holy man; for in the east, to call a person bald-headed, is to treat him with the utmost degree of contempt. "I was not a little astonished," says Mr Roberts, "when I heard for the first time, a man called a bald-head, who had a large quantity of hair on his head; and I found upon inquiry, that it was a term of ignominy and reproach. A stupid fellow is called a bald-headed dunce, and of those who are weak, it is usual to say they are bald-heads. Call a man a bald-head, which is often done although his hair be most luxuriant, and immediately sticks or stones will be your portion." Hence it appears, that the expression, applied to Elisha, contained the grossest insult. Ascend, thou empty skull to heaven, as it is pretended thy master did! This was blasphemy against God; and their punishment, for they were Bethelite idolaters, was only proportioned to their guilt. Elisha cursed them, that is, pronounced a curse upon them, in the name of the Lord. The spirit of their offence lies in their ridiculing a miracle of the Lord: the offence was against him, and he punished it. It was no petulant humour of the prophet that caused him to pronounce this curse; it was God alone: had it proceeded from a wrong disposition of the prophet, no miracle would have been wrought in order to gratify

it. "But was it not a cruel thing to destroy forty-two little children, who in mere childishness, had simply called the prophet bare skull, or bald-head?" I answer, Elisha did not destroy them: he had no power by which he could bring two she-bears out of the wood to destroy them. It was evidently either accidental, or a divine judgment, and if a judgment, God must be the sole author of it. Elisha's curse must be only declaratory of what God was about to do. "But then, as they were little children, they could scarcely be accountable for their conduct; and consequently it was cruelly to destroy them." If it was a judgment of God, it could be neither cruel nor unjust; and I contend that the prophet had no power by which he could bring these she-bears to fall upon them. But were they little children? for here the strength of the objection lies. Now, I suppose the objection means children from four to seven or eight years old; for so we use the word: but the original קטנים naarim kalunim, may mean young men, for קטן katon signifies to be young, in opposition to old, and is so translated in various places in our Bible; and נאָר naar, signifies not only a child, but a young man, or servant, or even a soldier, or one fit to go out to battle; and is so translated in a multitude of places in our common English version. I shall mention but a few, because they are sufficiently decisive. Isaac was called naar when twenty-eight years old, (Gen. xxi. 5, 12;) and Joseph was so called when he was thirty-nine, (Gen. xli. 13.) Add to these 1 Kings xx. 14, 'And Ahab said, By whom shall the Assyrians be delivered into my hand? And he said, Thus saith the Lord, By the young men (benaaray) of the princes of the provinces.' That these were soldiers, probably militia, or a selection from the militia, which served as a body guard to Ahab, the event sufficiently declares; and the persons that mocked Elisha were perfectly accountable for their conduct.—Jamieson's Eastern Manners and Dr A. Clarke on 2 Kings ii. 23.—Ed.

and under a trivial provocation, in comparison of what was offered to the prophet. The truth is, God, in this instance of severity, hath taught us, that he will have his prophets revered, ^a ¹ because they are allied to him, and every affront put upon them he resents as an indignity to himself; and therefore the sad end of the two captains, and their companies, who came to apprehend the prophet of the Lord, was designed monumentally to deter future ages from the like provocations; and to remind us of the precept which God himself hath given us, ² ² 'touch not mine anointed, and do my prophets no harm.'

³ 'O Elijah!' says the author of Ecclesiasticks, 'how wast thou honoured in thy wondrous deeds, and who may glory like unto thee? Like thee, ⁴ who wast vouchsafed the sight of God's glorious and majestic presence; ⁵ who hadst angels sent to comfort and refresh thee, when thou wast weary; ⁶ who hadst fire sent thee from heaven, to avenge thee of thine enemies, when they came to insult thee; ⁷ who hadst thy body in a bright chariot translated into heaven, without undergoing the fate of mortals; and, (what was not the least of thy prerogatives) who hadst, ⁸ whilst thou lived, the power of locking or unlocking the storehouses of heaven at thy pleasure, and by thy prayers.' It was doubtless to magnify his office, which now began to be depreciated not a little, that God hath authorized his prophet to accost Ahab with such marvellous assurance, as if the dispensation of the rain and dew of heaven, for such a determinate time, had been entirely at his disposal: but we mistake the matter widely, if we suppose, that the prophet had any part, farther than he was God's minister and messenger to declare the thing, in bringing this famine upon the land. All judgments of this kind are the immediate work of God: and, 'as ⁹ he does not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men;' so, if we will but turn to ¹⁰ the preceding chapter, we shall find an account of such open and avowed idolatry, and such bold contempt of the divine authority, both in the prince and people, as will sufficiently justify the severity of God in bringing this national judgment upon them. For well may the people be supposed to be generally depraved, when we find it recorded of their prince, that ¹¹ 'he did more to provoke the Lord God of Israel to anger than all the kings of Israel that were before him.'

a God did not destroy the two captains and their companies by fire from heaven for any personal offence against the man Elijah, as our author represents, but to protect his prophet from the fury of Ahaziah, and to exhibit to that prince and his subjects an awful token of his indignation against their wicked and idolatrous practices. As God is just and good, he would not have destroyed these men, had there not been a sufficient cause to justify the act. It was not to please Elijah, or to gratify any vindictive humour in him, that God thus acted; but to show his own power and justice. No entreaty of Elijah could have induced God to have performed an act that was wrong in itself. Elijah personally had no concern in the business; God led him simply to announce on these occasions what he himself had determined to do. 'If I be a man of God,' that is, 'as surely as I am a man of God, fire shall come down from heaven, and shall consume thee and thy fifty.' This is the literal meaning of the original; and by it we see that Elijah's words were only declarative, and not imprecatory.—Ed.

act a consistent part; he, who but lately was so bold and intrepid, as to present himself before Ahab, who had been long in quest of him, in order to make him suffer ¹² as the disturber of the public peace, is now frightened at the menaces of a silly woman; and thereupon quits his country, and flies for his life, notwithstanding the late signal interposition of providence in his favour. But what shall we say to this? ¹³ 'Elias was a man subject to the like passions as we are;' ⁶ and it was probable, in respect to this his infirmity, that the apostle made this reflection upon him. ¹⁴ He knew Jezebel, and that she had all the faults incident to her sex in a superlative degree; that she was fierce, cruel, vindictive, and implacable; that, in slaying the priests of Baal, he had incurred her displeasure, and that to revenge herself, she had all the power of the kingdom under her command. These notions ran in his head, and made such an impression upon his spirits, as deprived him of that resolution and manly courage for which he was heretofore so remarkable; nor was there wanting a wise design of providence in suffering this timidity to fall upon his servant.

St Paul tells us of himself, that ¹⁵ 'lest he should be exalted above measure, through the abundance of revelations, there was given unto him a thorn in the flesh, the messenger of Satan, to buffet him,' as he repeats it again, 'lest he should be exalted above measure.' And in like manner, we have reason to believe, that ¹⁶ God, upon this occasion, might withdraw that spirit of intrepidity, wherewith at other times, he fortified Elijah's mind, on purpose to show him his natural imbecility, and the necessity he had at all times of the divine assistance; and on purpose to suppress all the little sentiments of b 'Subject to the like passions as we are.' The passage here quoted from James v. 17. is altogether misapplied. The apostle's design in making an allusion to the prophet Elijah, evidently was to confirm the truth of the maxim which he had stated, (v. 16.) that 'the effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much,' and thereby to furnish encouragement to believers to continue instant and persevering in prayer in behalf of others as well as themselves. By saying that 'Elias was a man subject to like passions as we are,' the apostle intended no reflection upon the character of that prophet; for the original word rendered by the phrase 'subject to like passions,' signifies the being liable to all those accidents which attach to mortality, namely, to those feelings, wants, and weaknesses, to disease and death, to which flesh is heir. The same word occurs in Acts xiv. 15, where it is used in the same sense. Hence the apostle's argument is, that since Elias, who was only a mortal like themselves, furnished such a signal instance of success in prayer, they also by engaging in that exercise with like faith and fervour, might expect the divine interposition whenever that should be necessary. But why does the author represent Elijah as betraying a want of trust in God's protection, because he fled from Jezebel when she threatened his life? Did not the apostles act in a similar way, and did not our Lord himself frequently use precautions in order to escape the rage of his enemies? The truth is, we have no warrant in Scripture for expecting that degree of divine protection which shall supersede all prudence and exertion on our part, with a view to our safety and self-preservation, provided this does not interfere with known or commanded duty. Now we do not find that Elijah received any divine command to remain in Jezebel, or any assurance of divine protection from the threats of Jezebel, and he knew that he was unable to protect himself if he remained. He took the most prudent course, which was to give place to the present storm, and retire to a place of safety.—Ed.

pride and arrogance that might possibly arise in his breast, upon the contemplation of the gifts and graces which he had bestowed on him, and the many great miracles that were wrought by his hands; and that, thereupon, if he did glory, he might glory in the Lord, and not dare to take any part of his honour to himself.

What that food was, the Scripture has taken care to inform us, namely, that it was 'simple bread and water,' to make the miracle more remarkable, but such as was of far greater and more durable virtue than ordinary; and such as gave a life and vigour far surpassing the effects of any other nourishment. Whether angels, in the celestial state, are purely spiritual, or clothed with some material form, but much more subtle and refined than any we know of here below, is a question much agitated among the schools: but if, for the present, we should allow the affirmative, 'the food of angels,' and what may be called the sustenance of their glorious but infinite beings, need not be accounted altogether an allegory. It is certain, that upon ³ their appearance in human shape, they did frequently eat the common food of men; that our blessed Saviour, after the assumption of his glorious body, ⁴ ate part of a broiled fish and of an honey comb; nor may we forget, upon this occasion, his words at the paschal supper, ⁵ 'I will not henceforth drink of this fruit of the vine, until that day I drink it new with you, in my father's kingdom;' all which will be enough to countenance the opinion that the food which was brought to Elijah at this time, was of celestial growth and virtue, whereby creatures of a superior excellency may possibly, at certain periods, have their natures renewed, as the tree of life, in the state of paradise, is supposed to have been intended for that purpose, and to live on to eternal ages. No wonder, then, that food of such a rare quality, as to deserve the delegation of an angel from heaven to bring it, should have all the virtue and all the efficacy that we read of.

But, waving this speculation, we may suppose the rest-past to have been nothing more than common bread and water; yet who can doubt, but that God, either by retarding the faculties of concoction and perspiration, or by preserving the spirit and juices from dissipation, might make its strength and nourishment subsist for the time specified? It is but God's speaking the word in this case, and the thing is done. The least beck of his will can make the same meal that usually serves us for four and twenty hours, support us for forty days, and much longer if he pleases. That meat of any kind should sustain us for four and twenty hours, if rightly considered, is a miracle; and that the like proportion should do it for the space of forty days is still but a miracle, and with the same facility that God does the one, he can do the other: ^a so true is that observation which our blessed Saviour borrows from Moses, ^b 'Man doth not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God.'

And indeed no person ever had so large experience of the truth of this observation, as had the prophet now before us, who was so long sustained, not only by the wonderful increase of the widow's oil and meal, but by the daily ministry likewise, and attendance of ravens. For whatever some may dream of merchants or Arabians, who might take pity of Elijah in his retirement, and send him provisions every day; besides that the original word, as ⁷ Bochart has sufficiently evinced, never signifies merchants, and that there were no Arabians inhabiting the coasts where Elijah lay concealed, it can hardly be imagined, but that the place of his retreat would have soon been discovered to Ahab, had either merchants, or other inhabitant of the country, been at any time acquainted with it.

What industry that wicked king used to find out the prophet, wherever he absconded, we may learn from the information of good Obadiah, namely, that he had ransacked every nation where he could reasonably think that he was concealed, and when he found him not, he took an oath of the people, that he was not among them. For ⁸ though Ahab could not compel other nations to take an oath to that purpose, yet, considering the great interest he had among the neighbouring princes, he might easily prevail with the great men of each kingdom to give him that satisfaction. If we look into his alliances, we shall find, that the king of Tyre was his father-in-law, and the king of Moab tributary to him; that Jehoshaphat was his friend and relation, and that the king of Edom was dependant on Jehoshaphat; that, ⁹ as the kings of Arabia and Syria corresponded with Solomon, so, very likely, they were confederate with Ahab; that one of their articles might be to deliver up to each other all their fugitive or banished subjects upon demand; and that this was the foundation of his desire and expectance of this oath: and yet, notwithstanding all this strict and diligent inquiry, Elijah might live concealed in the widow of Zarephtha's house, because he had laid sufficient obligations upon her, both in preserving her from the danger of the famine, and in restoring her

^a The author's remarks on this subject are very little to the purpose, and show an endeavour to be wise above what is written. To all inquiries respecting the manner in which Elijah was supported without food, for forty days, the only legitimate answer that can be given is, that this was effected by miraculous agency; and that God can support without food, for any length of time, surely no one will deny. The author's assertion, that the manner in which food of any kind should sustain us for twenty-four hours, if rightly considered, is a miracle, is improper. It is indeed true, that God can as easily support without food for forty days, as for twenty-four hours; but to say that the one case, as well as the other, is miraculous, is to destroy the distinction between a miracle, and what takes place in accordance with the established laws of nature.—E. dead son to life again, to use all possible care to conceal him. But to return to Elijah's ravens.

Though we should allow that they are creatures voracious, and unnatural to their young ones, yet the more mit instruments they seemed to be, the more they magnified the almighty power of Him who controlled their natural appetites, while he employed them: ¹ and if there was a moral instruction in it, as St Chrysostom fancies, the more they might mollify the prophet's heart toward the deluded Israelites, by seeing those very creatures that were cruel to their young kind to him. Though we should allow, that they were creatures legally unclean, yet, as it was for the meat, and not for the touch, that they were accounted so, this we must grant was a case extraordinary, wherein the ceremonial law was overruled by necessity, and by the lawgiver's dispensation. There is this to be said, however, in defence of God's choice of ravens for this purpose, namely, that as they are solitary birds, and delight to live about brooks of water, so are they accustomed to seek out for provisions, and to carry them to the places of their abode; upon which account they were no improper creatures for God to employ upon this service; ^a especially, if what St Jerome tells us may be credited, namely, that one of these birds brought Paul, the first hermit, half a loaf every day, and, when St Anthony came to visit him, it brought him a whole one, to answer the wants of these two soldiers of Jesus Christ, as ^b he words it; but whence it had this, as well as whence Elijah's ravens had their supply, we pretend not to tell; and had rather acknowledge our ignorance in such like speculations, than take up with uncertain, and sometimes absurd conjectures. ^c

^a It has been attempted to get rid of this miracle, by asserting that the prophet was not fed by ravens, but by the Orbini, or inhabitants of Orbo, a small town in the vicinity of Bethshan. But the following arguments will show that the received interpretation is correct.—It is expressly said that Elisha 'drank of the brook' Cherith, (1 Kings xvii. 6.) Had strangers brought him food, they might as well have furnished him with water; and thus it would not have been necessary for him to have removed when the brook was dried up. Again, Ahab, who had sent messengers in pursuit of the prophet among the neighbouring kingdoms and nations, took an oath of them that they were ignorant of the place of his concealment, (1 Kings xviii. 10); and some one out of a tribe, we may suppose it probable, would have delivered him up, seeing they could gain nothing by his concealment, and had every thing to fear from detection. If we come to verbal criticism, we find that the word is precisely the same with that which is most properly rendered 'raven' in Gen. viii. 7, when Noah sends a bird out of the ark. The Almighty, doubtless, could have caused food to have been conveyed to Elijah in any other way, but he chose to send it by these rapacious birds, for the greater illustration of his absolute command over all creatures, and also to give us full evidence that he is able to succour and preserve, by the most improbable means, all those who put their trust in him. We need go no further to inquire whence the ravens had this food; it is enough if we believe they brought it to Elijah, for then we must allow that they acted by divine direction, and that the food was of God's providing.—Horne's Introduction, 7th edition.—Ed.

^c It was very foolish, if it proceeded from no worse motive, to put the ridiculous legend of Anthony on the same footing with the history of Elijah. Anthony was the founder of monachism, which, far from being essential to the Christian religion, has been the source of some of its greatest corruptions; and the tales which are told of his miracles, and many conflicts with demons, are now abandoned as absurd fictions by every man of learning, as well in

There are two exceptions more, which are generally made to Elijah's conduct, namely, his omission in not anointing Hazael to be king of Syria, and Jehu, king of Israel; and his cruelty in destroying the priests of Baal without a proper authority. Now, in answer to the former of these, it should be observed, that the words, 'Go and anoint,' may not be a positive command, but only a discretionary permission so to do. The prophet had been sorely complaining to God of the wickedness and idolatry of the Israelites, and of the bloody persecutions of their rulers: ² 'I have been very zealous for the Lord God of hosts,' says he, 'for the children of Israel have forsaken thy covenant, and thrown down thine altars, and slain thy prophets with the sword, and I, even I only, am left, and they seek my life to take it away.' Whereupon God, after having shown him, ³ by some symbolical representation, how able he was to avenge him of his adversaries, bids him go and anoint such and such persons to be kings; as if he had said, ⁴ "Thou desiredst of me, that I should destroy the idolaters of Israel, and such as have a design upon thy life; but, in order to that, thou hast nothing to do but to go and appoint two other persons to be kings over Israel and Syria, and they will avenge both thy quarrel and mine."⁵

⁵ But allowing the words to be a positive command, we may suppose that when Elijah, by his prophetic spirit,

the church of Rome as in the Protestant churches. The miracles of Elijah were intimately connected with the theocracy of Israel, which was instituted for preserving in the world the knowledge of the divine unity. That theocracy was then administered by the idolater Ahab, as it had been by a series of idolaters before him; and the purpose of its institution would have been completely defeated, had it not been maintained by a succession of prophets armed with power to thwart in some degree the measures of those idolatrous princes. As Ahab was the most hardened idolater that had ever swayed the sceptre of Israel, so was Elijah the greatest prophet that had ever been raised up to maintain the unity of God, and to restore the authority of the law of Moses. His life was therefore miraculously preserved as essential to the theocratic government of Israel, which was itself necessary to the preservation of true religion. In his case, if in any, there was surely a "plot worthy of being unraveled;" whilst the pretended miracles of Anthony were wrought in support of the first corruptions of Christianity! That ravens were animals fit to be employed for the preservation of the prophet is very obvious; for they are carnivorous birds, and in a country like Israel, where altars were hourly smoking, and oxen and sheep killed, under every green tree, they could be at no loss to find either the bread or the flesh which they were instinctively prompted to carry twice every day for his subsistence. "It is a fact," says Mr King, (Morsels of Criticism, vol. 1. p. 292, 8vo edition,) "now well known, that eagles, and ravens, and all birds of prey, do, at the time they have young ones, and even sometimes on other occasions, plunder the country all around them, in order to carry flesh and food of various kinds to their nests, and to feed their offspring. And with this fact the inhabitants near the Cevennes are so well acquainted, that the shepherds there, in the neighbourhood of the nests of these wild birds, contrive to serve themselves with meat for their own tables, at this very day, by means of these birds; climbing up to their nests, when the old ones fly from them in quest of more prey, and taking away from the young what the old had left there." There is no reason to think that the old prophet had occasion to climb for his food, as his purveyors were under the immediate control of that Providence which miraculously watched over him; but as he was not interdicted the use of fire in his banishment, he might easily make a fire of dry sticks to roast the meat, if it was brought to him raw, which is surely the most probable supposition.—Bishop Gleig.—Ed.

perceived what a grievous destruction the exaltation of these two persons to the thrones of Israel and Syria, would bring upon his native country, he petitioned God to delay the execution of this his order; ^a at least for some time, and obtained his request. This indeed is a circumstance that we do not meet with in Scripture; but in so short a history as this of the Hebrews is, we may well be allowed to supply some things that seem to be omitted, when this may be done without offering any violence to the words of the text, and especially when there is an analogy, in other parts of the history to bear us out.

Now, in relation to one of these, namely, Hazael, who was afterwards king of Syria, it is said that, when he came to inquire of Elisha concerning his mother Benhadad's sickness, the prophet ¹ settled his countenance upon him stedfastly, and wept; whereupon Hazael said, Why weepeth my Lord? And he answered, Because I know the evil that thou wilt do unto the children of Israel. Their strongholds wilt thou set on fire, and wilt dash their children, and rip up their women with child? And from this passage, we have some grounds to think that Elijah, upon the like prospect of his nation's calamities, might desire of God, if not a revocation of his command, at least a delay in the execution of it; and that this was the reason why neither of these kings were anointed by him.

What notions the worshippers of Baal might have of the power of their god, we cannot tell; but as sending down fire from heaven ² was not above the reach of evil spirits, and some lying traditions might perhaps have descended to them concerning the exploits of their Baal in particular, ³ who, as he was thought to be the sun, and to exceed all heavenly bodies in heat, might, upon this grand occasion, as they thought, exert his power and burn up their sacrifice, they held it the wisest way to accept of the prophet's challenge. The prophet's challenge indeed was upon such fair terms, that, whatever notions they might have of their god, they must have forfeited all their credit with the people, had they pretended to decline it: and therefore, rather than do this, they chose to venture all upon the hazard of an after-game, hoping that either they might have an opportunity of conveying fire among the wood clandestinely, or that Elijah would fail in his attempt as well as they, and so both stand upon equal ground; or that, if he succeeded, the thing might not be done so cleverly, but that there

Upon these presumptions they might enter the lists; and, when they were so shamefully defeated, the prophet, ⁴ as an extraordinary minister of God's vengeance upon sinners, especially when the magistrate so grossly neglected his duty, had sufficient authority to execute ⁵ the sentence of death passed upon them by the Lord of life and death, as perverters of the law, and teachers of idolatry; as authors of cruelty, and inciters of Jezebel ⁶ to murder the prophets of the Lord; and as cheats and impostors, to whose execution the people concurred, their princes gave their consent, and their king, as astonished at the late stupendous miracle, could make no opposition.

Whether Ahab's repentance, upon the commination of God's judgments, was sincere or superficial only, has been a matter of some debate among divines. It is certain that, in consideration of it, God revoked, at least in part, the sentence which he had denounced against him, and transferred it upon his posterity. And ⁷ yet we do not find him producing any 'fruits meet for repentance;' either renouncing his superstitions, or destroying his idols, or restoring Naboth's vineyard, or re-establishing the true worship of God. Struck with the prophet's menaces, and dreading the effects of his predictions, he put on the garb of a penitent; he wept, he sighed, he fasted and bemoaned himself; but how came God, who inspects the hearts, and cannot be taken with external show, to have any respect to this? Such esteem has he, according to some, for true repentance and reformation, that he is willing to reward the very appearance of it. But this is an answer that comports not so well with the purity and holiness of God; and therefore we should rather choose to say, that Ahab's repentance at this time was true, though imperfect; and his sorrow sincere, though of no long continuance; and that, had he persisted in the good resolutions he had then taken up, God would have remitted him, not only the temporal, but the eternal punishment likewise, that was due to his sin. In the mean time, this instance of the divine lenity is left upon record to encourage the first essays of our repentance, and to give us assurance of this,—That our good and gracious God, ⁸ 'who keepeth mercy for thousands, and forgiveth iniquity, transgression, and sin,' ⁹ will not break the bruised reed, nor quench the smoking flax, but bring forth judgment unto truth.⁷

But the same God who professes himself the forgiver of transgression and sin, declares, withal, that ¹⁰ 'he will not clear the guilty, but visit the iniquity of the fathers upon the children.' In the case of Hiel, that impious re-builder of Jericho, God was obliged, in order to fulfil the prophecy, to transfer the punishment due to the father upon his sons, because the form of Joshua's malediction is, ¹¹ 'Cursed be the man before the Lord, that raiseth up, and buildeth this city Jericho: he shall lay the foundation thereof in his first-born, and in his youngest son shall he set up the gates of it:' and as this malediction was kept upon record, and a thing well known, the people would have had but a slender conception of

^a The Scriptures are silent as to the precise time and manner in which the divine commission given to Elijah was executed; but it does not therefore follow that this commission was not executed at the time appointed. As the prophet was ordered to go on the way to the wilderness of Damascus, it is not improbable that he went directly towards Syria, and meeting with Hazael, anointed him. The word anoint, however, may be understood in a figurative sense, denoting a particular appointment, designation, or call to an office. In this sense the word is used in other passages of Scripture, (Ps. cv. 15; Is. xlv. 1.) and of the three individuals, Elisha, Hazael, and Jchu, whom Elijah was commanded to anoint, we read that the latter only was actually anointed, and that by Elisha. The command, then, given to Elijah, in so far as it regarded Hazael and Jchu, might have been executed by a prophetic declaration on the part of the prophet, that God intended to raise them to the kingly office.—Ed.

God's justice, or rather the judgment would have passed without observation, had Hiel alone, whose death might have been imputed to his old age, been cut off in the course of his building this city. But now by taking his children, one after another, as the building advanced, the hand of God was visible, the denunciation of his servant verified, and a proper caution given to the whole nation, not to despise his patience and long-suffering, because they could not but see, that, upon their persisting impenitence, all his threats and comminations would, sooner or later, most certainly come to pass. ^a Hiel himself, indeed, is not concerned in the prophecy; and therefore no mention is made in Scripture of what fate befell him. But, from the impartiality of God's justice, we have reason to suppose, ¹ 'that, after he had lived to be an eye-witness of his children's untimely death, himself was cut off by some sore judgment; or that if he escaped, his present impunity was his greatest misery, forasmuch as it continued his torment in the sad and lasting remembrance of his sons that were lost through his folly; or else was a means to harden his heart for the infliction of such greater punishments as God had reserved for him.

^a This prediction was delivered upwards of 500 years before the event; and though it was most circumstantially fulfilled, yet we know not the precise meaning of some of the terms used in the original execration, and in this place where its fulfilment is mentioned. There are three opinions on the words, 'lay the foundation in his first-born, and set up the gates in his youngest son.' 1. It is thought that when he laid the foundation of the city, his eldest son, the hope of his family, died by the hand and judgment of God, and that all his children died in succession; so that when the doors were ready to be hung, his youngest and last child died, and thus, instead of securing himself a name, his whole family became extinct. 2. These expressions signify only great delay in the building; that he who should undertake it, should spend nearly his whole life in it; all the time in which he was capable of procreating children; in a word, that if a man laid the foundation when his first-born came into the world, his youngest and last son should be born before the walls should be in readiness to admit the gates to be set up in them; and that the expression is of the proverbial kind, intimating greatly protracted labour, occasioned by multitudinous hindrances and delays. 3. That he who rebuilt this city, should, in laying the foundation slay or sacrifice his first-born, in order to consecrate it, and secure the assistance of the objects of his idolatrous worship; and should slay his youngest at the completion of the work, as a gratitude-offering for the assistance received. This latter opinion seems to be countenanced by the Chaldee, which represents Hiel as slaying his first-born Abiram, and his youngest son Segub. But who was Hiel the Bethelite? The Chaldee calls him Hiel of Bethmome, or the Bethmomite; the Vulgate Hiel of Bethel; the Septuagint, Hiel the Bethelite; the Syriac represents Ahab as the builder: 'Also in his days did Ahab build Jericho, the place of execration;' the Arabic, 'Also in his days did Hiel build the house of idols,' to wit, Jericho. The MSS. give us no help. None of these versions, the Chaldee excepted, intimates that the children were either slain or died; which circumstance seems to strengthen the opinion, that the passage is to be understood of delays and hindrances. Add to this, why should the innocent children of Hiel suffer for their father's presumption? And is it likely that if Hiel lost his first-born when he laid the foundation, he would have proceeded under this evidence of the divine displeasure, and at the risk of losing his whole family? Which of these opinions is the right one, or whether any of them be correct, is more than I can pretend to state. A curse seems to rest still upon Jericho; it is not yet blotted out of the map of Palestine, but it is reduced to a miserable village, consisting of about thirty wretched cottages, and the governor's dilapidated castle; nor is there any ruin there to indicate its former splendour.—Dr. A. Clarke on 1 Kings xvi. 34.—Es.

It is certainly an argument either of gross ignorance, or of a very corrupt and depraved mind, to make the condescensions of Scripture matter of exception against it, and to find fault with the sacred penman, because he endeavours, by apt allusions and representations, to bring down spiritual and divine things to the measure of our mean and shallow capacities.

² The Jews conceived of God in heaven as of a king seated on his throne; and that good and bad angels, the one standing on his right hand, and the other on his left, were the appointed executioners of his orders, either to reward or punish his subjects. And as princes upon earth do generally nothing of moment without advising with their council and chief officers, so the prophet represents Almighty God, as deliberating with his heavenly courtiers what course he had best to take, in order to bring Ahab to destruction. Amidst this consultation, some suggest one expedient, and some another; but none takes with God until a lying spirit steps out and offers his service, which God, after some examination into his abilities, accepts.

But now no man, I think, can have such a crude conception of the divine providence, as to think that this is the method of God's governing the world; that he, who is the fountain of all power and wisdom, needs to advise with any of his creatures, or can be at a loss for any expedient to accomplish his ends; or that he, who is both truth and holiness itself, should ever send a lying spirit among his prophets, which would be to confound all inspiration, and to make the imputation of error rebound upon himself.

³ Upon the whole, then, we cannot but infer that the speech of Micaiah was no more than a parabolical representation of a certain event, which not long after came to pass; that several of the circumstances which are thrown into it are, in a great measure, ornamental, and designed only to illustrate the narration; and that therefore they are not to be taken in a literal sense, but in such a manner as other parables are, where the end and design of the speaker is chiefly to be considered; which in Micaiah's case, was to show the reason why so many of the prophets declared what was false upon this occasion; even because they were moved, not by the Spirit of truth, but that of adulation.

The prophets indeed, both in their parabolical speeches and symbolical actions, are to be considered as persons of a singular character. For as we find ⁴ one of them tearing his own garment to pieces, to signify to Jeroboam the alienation of the major part of the kingdom from the house of Solomon; so here we have another desiring his companion, for so what we render ⁵ 'neighbour' signifies, to give him a wound, ⁵ that thereby he might have the better opportunity of reproving Ahab for his ill timed clemency to Benhadad.

The princes of the east were difficult of access; and in the court of Ahab, in particular, the character of a prophet was held in so great detestation, that some expedient was to be found out, to gain him admittance to the king's presence, and an opportunity to speak to him in the manner he designed. After so great a victory as Ahab had lately won by the valour of his men, it may be presumed, that the name of a soldier was become in high esteem; and therefore to personate a soldier, and a wounded soldier likewise, who might more engage the king's pity and attention, the prophet entreats his fellow-collegiate, having first told him his intent to give him a slight cut with a sword, or some other instrument, that thereby he might be enabled to act his part better.

To desire to have his own flesh slashed and cut, was, in appearance, a request so frantic, that justly might his brother prophet have denied him that courtesy, had he not been satisfied that the request came from God: but herein lay the great fault of the recusant; though he knew the authority of God's commands, and that this was the very thing which he enjoined, yet, out of an indiscreet pity and compassion to his brother, he refused to comply. ¹ Had he been a stranger indeed to the several methods of divine prophecy, he might have excused himself with a better grace; but as he was equally a prophet bred up in the same school with the other, had been informed by the other of his whole design, and well understood the weight of these words, ² 'I command thee in the name of the Lord,' he was utterly inexcusable; because disobedience to a divine command, and especially when delivered by a prophet, was, ³ by the construction of the law, held capital.

Now there were two ways, according to the Jewish doctors, wherein the prophets of old were punished for their offences in their office. Those ⁴ who prophesied in the name of idols, or prophesied falsehoods in God's name, were put to death by the judges; but those who either concealed or rejected a true prophecy, were to die by the hand of God. And in the case now before us, the divine justice might be more disposed to mark what was done amiss, for this reason, among others to us unknown, that, by the severity of this punishment of a prophet's disobedience, proceeding from pity to his brother prophet, he might teach Ahab the greatness of his sin, in sparing him, through a foolish generosity or compassion, whom, by the laws of religion, and justice, and prudence, and self preservation, he should have cut off; and consequently what punishment he might reasonably expect for his disobedience.

In the account which the Scripture gives us of Jehoshaphat's reformation, it is said, that he not only ⁵ 'took away the high places and groves, but sent to his princes to teach the cities of Judah, and with them sent Levites, who had the book of the law with them, and went through all the cities of Judah teaching the people.' But what the proper business of these princes, in their circuit round the kingdom was, is a matter of some dispute among the learned. Grotius ⁶ is of opinion, that their commission extended to the instruction of the people, which, in cases extraordinary, is every one's business, and could never be done with more probability of success, than by persons who were of the king's council, and invested with his authority. There is reason to think, however, that they did not act in the very same capacity with the priests and Levites that attended them; but that, ⁷ as judges and justices of peace among us, teach and instruct the people in the laws of the land, when they deliver their charges from the bench; so these great men, in the king's name, did only admonish and require the people to observe the laws of God, which were the municipal laws of the land, and left the particular explication and enforcement of them to those of the sacred order, who went along with them; supporting them, in the mean time, in the execution of their office, and obliging the people to receive them with respect, to hear them with attention, and to practise what they taught them.

However this be, it is obvious from the sense of the words, that, in those days there was a great ⁸ 'famine in the land,' as the prophet expresses it, 'not a famine of bread, or a thirst of water, but of hearing the words of the Lord.' There were then no such public synagogues and public teachers as were afterwards instituted in the kingdom, for the instruction of the people in the sense of the law; for then there would have been no occasion for these commissioners and Levites to have gone about throughout all the cities of Judah; and into such a wretched state of ignorance was the generality of the people fallen, that there was scarce one copy of the law to be found in the hands of any private person in the whole country; for which reason it was thought advisable, and necessary indeed, to carry one with them.

The truth is, the synagogues, whereof we read so much in the Acts of our Saviour and his apostles, as places appointed for the public instruction of the people, were not of so early an institution, as the times we are now speaking of. ⁹ They did not obtain universally till after the time of the Maccabees; and it is to no later date than this that the words of St James allude, ¹⁰ 'Moses of old time hath in every city them that preach him, being read in the synagogues every sabbath-day.' Upon the whole, therefore, we may infer that if proper places for religious instruction were not as yet instituted; if the Levites and others, whose stated business it was to instruct the people, were become grossly negligent in their duty; and the people withal were grown so obstinate in their ignorance, as to want a proper authority to compel them to listen to their instructors; then was this commission which Jehoshaphat gave to persons duly qualified to execute it, far from being needless or supererogant, but such only as became a pious prince, whose chief ambition was, that ¹¹ 'the earth should be filled with the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea.'

For this reason, no doubt it is, that the sacred historian has remarked, as a reward of this prince's piety, that ¹² 'he had not only riches and honours in abundance,' but a more numerous people, and a larger military force, in proportion to his territories, than any of his most powerful predecessors. The whole amount of the particulars indeed is so very great, ¹³ that some have suspected a mistake in the transcribers; but when it is considered that the dominions of the kingdom of Judah under Jehoshaphat were not confined to the narrow limits of Judah and Benjamin only, but ¹⁴ reached into the tribes of Dan, Ephraim, and Simeon; into Arabia, and the country of the Philistines; in a word, from Beersheba to the mountains of Ephraim one way, and from Jordan to the Mediterranean sea the other; when it is considered that this kingdom received a vast accession, when Jeroboam thrust out the priests and Levites from officiating in the service of the Lord, and multitudes of other piously disposed persons followed them from all parts of Israel, when they found that they might be encouraged in worshipping God at Jerusalem; when it is considered, that this country was exceedingly well cultivated, flourishing in commerce, abounding with foreigners, and what a vast increase of inhabitants in any nation may be produced in the space of an hundred years, which was the very period from David; and when it is considered farther, that soldiers in these days were not kept, like our standing armies, in constant pay and duty, but only had their names set down in the king's muster-rolls, in order to be summoned to arms whenever there was occasion, and so returned to their families, and followed their usual occupations: when all this is considered, and put together, I say, we shall not find the number of twelve hundred thousand fighting men, even though they may include six millions of persons of all ages and conditions, to be so very extravagant; especially, when it is remembered, that the city of Thebes alone, as it is reported by ¹ Tacitus, furnished no less than seven hundred thousand soldiers; that, in ancient Rome, there were once between three and four millions of souls; and that, in Grand Cairo, as some travellers report, there is now almost twice that number.⁴

We have but one seeming paradox more to account for, and that is the fall ² of the walls of Aphek upon no less than seven and twenty thousand men. But, in answer to this, ³ we are not to suppose that this wall, or castle, or fort, as it may be rendered, fell upon every individual one, much less that it killed every man it fell on: it is sufficient to justify the expression, that it fell upon the main body of these seven and twenty thousand, and that it killed some, and maimed others, for the Scripture does not say that it killed all, as is usual in such cases. Let us suppose, then, that these Syrians, after their defeat on the plains of Aphek, betook themselves to this fenced city, and, despairing of any quarter, mounted the walls, or retired into some castle, with a resolution to defend themselves to the last; and that the Israelitish army coming upon them, plied the walls or the castle on every side so warmly with their batteries, that down they came at once, and killing some, wounding others, and making the rest disperse for fear, did all the execution that the text intends.^b

^a Though many travellers have reported this city to be of an enormous magnitude, the real circumference of it, however, is not more than 8 miles, and the number of inhabitants not more than 500,000 or 400,000.—Ed.

^b Serious doubts are entertained concerning the legitimacy of our translation of the passage in question. If, instead of חומה chomah, a wall, we read חמה chomah, confusion or disorder, then the destruction of the 27,000 men may appear to have been occasioned by the disorganised state into which they fell; of which their enemies taking advantage, they might destroy the whole with ease. But חמה chomah, a wall, becomes, as Dr Kennicott has observed, a very different word when written without the ו vau, חר which signifies heat; sometimes the sun, vehement heat, or the heat of the noon-day sun; and also the name of a wind, from its sulfoating, parching quality. The same noun, from חם yaquam, Dr Castel explains by excandescencia, furor, venenum; burning, rage, poison. These renderings, says Dr Kennicott, all concur to establish the sense of a burning wind, eminently blasting and destructive. I shall give a few instances

Thus we may account for this event in a natural way; but it is more reasonable to think, that God, upon this occasion, wrought a miracle; and, either by some sudden earthquake, or violent storm of wind, overturned these walls, or this fortress upon the Syrians. And, indeed, if any time was proper for his almighty arm to interpose, ⁴ it was at such a time as this, when these blasphemous people had denied his sovereign power and authority in the government of the world, and thereby in some measure obliged him, in vindication of his own honour, to give them a full demonstration of it, and to show that he was the ⁵ God of the plains, as well as of the mountains; that he could as effectually destroy them in strongholds, as in the open field, and make the very walls wherein they trusted for defence, the instruments of their ruin.

CHAP. III.—Of the translation of Enoch and Elijah.

OF all the events recorded in Scripture, we meet with none that requires our attention more than the translation of the patriarch Enoch, in the times before the flood, and the assumption of the prophet Elijah, under the dispensation of the law: for, whether Moses, the great minister of that dispensation, was in like manner exempted from the common fate of mortals, is a matter wherein commentators are not so well agreed. The account of Elijah's translation is so express and circum-

from the Scripture:—We read in Job xxvii. 21: 'The east wind carrieth him away; where the word קדים hadim is καυσων, burning, in the Septuagint; and in the Vulgate, ventus urens, a burning wind. In Ezek. xix. 12, 'She was plucked up בדורה, she was cast down to the ground, and the east wind dried up her fruit; her strong rods were withered, and the fire consumed them.' Hosea (xiii. 15.) mentions the desolation brought by 'an east wind, the wind of the Lord.' What in Amos iv. 9. is, 'I have smitten you with blasting,' in the Vulgate is, in vento vehemente, 'with a vehement wind;' and in the Syriac, with a hot wind. Let us apply these to the history: when Benhadad, king of Syria, was besieging Samaria the second time, the Israelites slew of the Syrians 100,000 footmen in one day; and it follows, that when the rest of the army fled to Aphek, 27,000 of the men that were left were suddenly destroyed by החמה hachomah, or החר hachomah, a burning wind. That such is the true interpretation, will appear more clearly if we compare the destruction of Benhadad's army with that of Sennacherib, whose sentence is that God would send upon him a BLAST, רוח ruach, a wind; doubtless such a wind as would be suddenly destructive. The event is said to be that in the night 185,000 Assyrians were smitten by the angel of the Lord, 2 Kings xix. 7, 35. The connexion of this sentence with the execution of it is given by the Psalmist, who says, (civ. 4.) 'God maketh his angels רוח ruchoth, winds;' or, 'maketh the winds his angels,' i. e., messengers for the performance of his will. In a note on Ps. xi. G. Professor Michaelis has these words: Ventus Zilgaphoth, pestilens curus est, orientabilibus notissimus, qui obvia quavis necat; 'The wind Zilgaphoth is a pestilential east wind, well known to the Asiatics, which suddenly kills those who are exposed to it.' Thevenot mentions such a wind in 1658, that in one night suffocated 20,000 men. And the Samiel he mentions as having, in 1665, suffocated 4,000 persons. "Upon the whole, I conclude," says the Doctor, "that as Thevenot has mentioned two great multitudes destroyed by this burning wind, so has holy Scripture recorded the destruction of two much greater multitudes by a similar cause; and therefore we should translate the words thus: 'But the rest fled to Aphek, into the city; and the burning wind fell upon the 27,000 of the men that were left.'—Dr A. Clarke on 1 Kings xx. 30.

stantiated, that no question can be made of its reality; but the ambiguity of the words wherein the sacred historian has related the assumption of Enoch, has induced several to think, that though this antediluvian patriarch was highly in favour with God, and for that reason removed from the contagious wickedness which was then overspreading the earth; yet that this removal was effected, not by any miraculous operation of God, but merely by his undergoing a natural death.

The words wherein Moses has recorded this transaction are very few, and these of uncertain signification: 'Enoch walked with God, and he was not, for God took him.' Now it is plain, from several passages in Scripture, not only that the word which we render 'God took him,' is set to signify our common death, as in the case of Elijah himself, when, under the juniper-tree, he prays that God would 'take away his life,' because he was not better than his fathers; and in that of holy Job, when he tells us, that he did not know how soon 'his Maker might take him away; but that the other expression, 'he was not,' is frequently used in the same sense, as is evident from the lamentation which both Jacob and his son Reuben made for the supposed loss of Joseph: 'Joseph is not,' and Simeon is not, says the old man: and 'the child is not; and I, whither shall I go?' says the son. So that no argument can be drawn from the terms in the text to countenance a miraculous assumption, more than a natural death, in the prophet Enoch. But this is not all.

The author of the book, entitled The Wisdom of Solomon, is supposed to carry the matter farther, and to declare positively for the death of this patriarch, when he tells us, 'that he pleased God, and was beloved of him, so that, living among sinners, he was translated; yea, speedily was he taken away, lest wickedness should alter his understanding, and deceit beguile his soul. Being made perfect in a short time, he fulfilled a long time; for his soul pleased the Lord, therefore lasted he to take him away from among the wicked.' Where every line in the description, as some imagine, suits exactly with Enoch, and yet the author all along supposes, that the person he is here speaking of died in the same manner as other men do.

² We acknowledge indeed, that the author of the book of Wisdom, speaking of the hasty and premature death of the righteous, might properly enough allude to what Moses relates concerning the translation of Enoch, who, in comparison of his contemporary patriarchs, lived but a short time; but we have no reason at all to suppose, that he is here directly treating of the death of Enoch; on the contrary, that he is here discoursing of the righteousness in general, and vindicating the wisdom and goodness of providence, in taking them sometimes sooner than ordinary out of this wicked world, is evident from the inference wherewith he concludes his discourse: "thus the righteous that is dead, shall condemn the ungodly that is living, and youth, that is soon perfected, the old age of the unrighteous: for they shall see the age of the wise, and shall not understand what God in his council had decreed of him, and to what end the Lord hath set him in safety.

We acknowledge again, that, according to the light which the gospel has introduced, for a good man to die at any time⁹ is gain, and to be removed from the miseries of this life is much better than the longest continuance in it.¹⁰ But still it must be confessed, that, in the first ages of the world, and under a less perfect dispensation, length of days was generally accounted the recompense of virtue; and, therefore, if there were nothing extraordinary in the manner of Enoch's departure, the other patriarchs, who so far exceeded him in years, seem to have been more immediately under the divine favour than he, who, though more remarkable than any for his piety and goodness, fell under the lot and commendation of the wicked, as being not permitted¹¹ to live out half his days.

We acknowledge, once more, that the words of Moses do not necessarily imply any miraculous assumption of a living man into heaven, or any other place unknown, and inaccessible to mortals; but still, if we will but compare what he says of Enoch with what he relates of the other patriarchs, we shall soon perceive, that his purpose was to distinguish between their manner of leaving the world and his. For whereas it is said of all the preceding patriarchs, that they lived to such and such a number of years, and¹² 'begat sons and daughters, and so died;' of Enoch it is said, that¹³ 'he lived sixty and five years,' and begat Methuselah; that after he begat Methuselah, 'he lived three hundred years, and begat sons and daughters;' but then, instead of 'he died,' the author's words are, 'he walked with God, and was not, for God took him;' where he first takes notice of his good and pious life, which made him so acceptable to God, and then of his translation, 'God took him;' but lest there should be any ambiguity in that expression, he adds, and 'he was not,' or appeared no more in the world; whereby he intimates that he still lives, and subsists in some other place.

The truth is, these expressions in the text, when rightly understood, do confirm, rather than invalidate, the doctrine of Enoch's translation: but, to put the matter beyond all dispute, we have the authority of an apostle, enumerating the actions of the worthies of old, and telling us of this patriarch in particular, that¹⁴ 'by faith he was translated, that he should not see death, and was not found, because God had translated him: for, before his translation, he had this testimony, that he pleased God;' where the author to the Hebrews takes care, by repeating the word three times, to prevent our mistaking his meaning; and by telling us, that the patriarch was not found, he plainly alludes to what the sons of the prophets did, when Elijah was taken away, that is, sent¹⁵ fifty men in quest of him, but found him not; and consequently not obscurely intimates, that this transport of the patriarch was of the same nature with what happened to the prophet so many years after; that they were both the effect of the divine favour to them, both the reward of their services upon earth, and both a remove to some certain place that is beyond the reach of the knowledge of man.

In what part of the world this place is, we should not be too inquisitive, much less too positive, because we have no foundation but conjectures to go upon. ¹ St Austin, who seems to be more reserved in other abstruse questions, is very peremptory in this,—That Enoch and Elijah were translated into that ^a terrestrial paradise where Adam and Eve lived, in their state of innocence; that there they are nourished by the fruit of the tree of life, which gives them a power of subsisting for ever, without submitting to the necessity of death; that there they enjoy all the blessings and privileges that our first parents had before their transgression; and, among other things, an exemption from sinning, by the supernatural grace of God. But then the question is, where we are to place this terrestrial paradise, since there is scarce one region in the world that one author or other has not made choice of for its situation; and since, by the violent concussions which happened at Noah's flood, the face of nature had been so changed, that those very places, which, according to their description in Scripture, seem once to bid fairest for it, are now debased to such a degree, as little to deserve the appellation of the gardens of pleasure, much less the abodes of the blessed.

² The word Schamajim, which we render heaven, is supposed by several, both Jewish and Christian doctors, to be the upper part of the air, where the spirits of just men departed, together with these two translated persons, live in a state of sincere, but imperfect bliss, until the general resurrection. But this, in our opinion, is placing the seats of the blessed too near the confines ³ of 'the prince of the power of that element,' and in danger of being disturbed by some incursions from his quarters: and therefore, if we might be indulged a farther conjecture, ⁴ we should rather choose to place them beyond the circumference of the solar system, where there are immense spaces, neither obstructed by the motion of any planets, nor obnoxious to the changes of their atmospheres, because nothing is there but pure ether. But how our corporeal part shall be enabled to live there, and to live to all eternity, we shall then come to understand, when by experience we shall know what that change is, which the body undergoes, when it puts on immortality. In the mean time, as God is omnipotent, nothing can hinder him from making what changes he pleases in our bodies, and from preserving them eternally in that state.

This we may call the celestial paradise, ^b into which

^a Whether the Mahometans embrace the same opinion, it is a little uncertain; but they have a tradition among them, of one Kheder or Khizim, who had the good fortune to find the fountain of life, whereof he drank plentifully, and so became immortal. This Kheder, whose name signifies verdant or ever-flourishing, according to them, is the same with Elijah, who lives in a place of retirement, in a delicious garden where the fountain of life runs, and the tree of life, which preserves his immortality, grows.—Calnet's Dictionary, under the word Elijah.

^b This is incorrect. The paradise into which the soul of the penitent thief was promised admittance, was nothing else than hades, or the abode of the spirits of the just until the general resurrection, as Dr Campbell has most satisfactorily shown in his sixth Dissertation, prefixed to his translation of the Gospels. Although, therefore, we cannot determine the place of residence assigned to Enoch and Elijah, we can scarcely suppose that they, with their glorified bodies, inhabit the regions our blessed Saviour promised the penitent thief upon the cross a joyful admittance; and having taken him with him, and reposed his soul in this mansion of rest and happiness, proceeded in his ascent beyond the orbits of the most distant stars, and made his entrance into the highest heavens, which are the residence of God himself; and into which, as others imagine, this patriarch and prophet were, upon their translation, carried.

⁵ 'I knew a man in Christ above fourteen years ago,' says St Paul, speaking of himself, though his modesty made him conceal it, ' (whether in the body, I cannot tell, or whether out of the body, I cannot tell, God knoweth) such an one caught up to the third heaven; and I knew such a man (whether in the body, or out of the body, God knoweth) how that he was caught up into paradise, and heard things unspeakable, which it is not possible for man to utter: ' and if St Paul ' was caught up into the third heaven,' even while he continued in this mortal state, why may we not suppose that Enoch and Elijah were at once translated into the same place? The probable design of God's vouchsafing the apostle this vision of disembodied spirits. The passage which our author here quotes from 2 Cor. xii., seems indeed to favour the opinion, that what is called 'paradise' by our Lord, (Luke xxiii. 43.) is the same as heaven itself; but that this is not the case, the following remarks by Dr Campbell, will, we think, place beyond a doubt: "The Jews make mention of three heavens. The first is properly the atmosphere where the birds fly, and the clouds are suspended. The second is above the first, and is what we call the visible firmament, wherein the sun, moon, and stars appear. The third, to us invisible, is conceived to be above the second, and therefore sometimes styled the heaven of heavens. This they considered as the place of the throne of God, and the habitation of the holy angels. Now it is evident that, if in the second and fourth verses he speak of one vision or revelation only, paradise and heaven are the same; not so, if in these he speak of two different revelations. My opinion is, that there are two, and I shall assign my reasons. First, he speaks of them as more than one, and that not only in introducing them, 'I will come to visions and revelations;' for sometimes it must be owned, the plural is used in expressing a subject indefinitely: but afterwards, in referring to what he had related, he says, (2 Cor. xii. 7.) 'lest I should be exalted above measure, through the abundance of the revelations,' των αποκαλυψεων. Secondly, they are related precisely as two distinct events, and coupled together as the connexive particle. Thirdly, there is a repetition of his doubts, (2 Cor. xiii. 2, 3.) in regard to the reality of this translation, which, if the whole relate to a single event, was not only superfluous, but improper. This repetition, however, was necessary, if what is related in the third and fourth verses, be a different fact from what is told in the second, and if he was equally uncertain, whether it passed in vision or in reality. Fourthly, if all the three verses regard only one revelation, there is, in the manner of relating it, a tautology unexampled in the apostle's writings. I might urge, as a fifth reason, the opinion of all christian antiquity, Origen alone excepted. And this, in a question of philology, is not without its weight. I shall only add, that though in both verses, the words in the English Bible are 'caught up,' there is nothing in the original answering to the particle 'up.' The apostle has very properly employed here the word απαρξω, expressive more of the suddenness of the event, and of his own passiveness, than of the direction of the motion. The only other place in which παράδεισος occurs is in the Apoccalypse. (Rev. ii. 7.) 'To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of life, which is in the midst' του παραδεισου 'of the paradise of God.' Here our Lord, no doubt, speaks of heaven, but, as he plainly alludes to the state of matters in the garden of Eden, where our first parents were placed, and where the tree of life grew, it can only be understood as a figurative expression of the promise of eternal life, forfeited by Adam, but recovered by our Lord Jesus Christ."—Campbell on the Gospels.—En.

of heaven, was to show him what his final reward would be, and consequently, for the crown of joy that was set before him, to make him ¹ 'glory in the cross of Christ,' ² 'in tribulation, in distress, in persecution:' and how reasonable it is to believe, that these two worthies, who in their several generations had ³ 'fought the good fight, and finished their course, and kept the faith,' should, upon the peculiar favour of their assumption into heaven, be admitted to a nearer participation of the beatific vision, as an ample reward for the fatigues of their warfare?

At our Saviour's transfiguration upon the mount, we find one of these sent to him, as we may presume, upon some important message, appearing in a bright and glorious form, and, as if he were admitted to the councils of heaven, ⁴ 'talking with him of his decease, which he was to accomplish at Jerusalem:' and therefore we can hardly think that his abode could be at any wide distance from the throne of God's presence, who, in conjunction with his faithful servant and lawgiver, Moses, was deputed to go an embassy to his ⁵ 'beloved son.' But in this point, we ought to repress our curiosity, and in the sense of ⁶ Theodoret, content ourselves with what God has been pleased to reveal in Scripture, without inquiring too curiously into what he hath thought fit to conceal.

In what manner Enoch was translated into heaven we have not the least intimation, nor is the account of Elijah's ascension to be taken in a literal sense; since a fiery chariot and horses would not have been a vehicle so proper for a nature as yet not impregnated with immortality. The notion of those who, upon this occasion, make angels assume the form of the chariot and horses, is not so incongruous, because we need not doubt but that by the divine permission they can transform themselves into any shape. They are supposed to have frequently appeared in the figure of flying oxen, for which reason they have obtained the name of cherub, or cherubin; and with the same facility they might at this time have put on the appearance of horses: but in points not so clearly expressed, we are to resolve God's method of acting by those that are analogous, and yet more plain.

Now the only ascension that we read of besides these, is that of our blessed Saviour; and the manner in which he is said to have been carried up, was by the subvention of a cloud, which raised him from the ground, and, the mounting with him gradually, ⁷ carried him out of the apostles' sight: and in like manner, we may suppose, that the translation of these two was performed, namely, that a bright and radiant cloud, which, as it ascended, might appear like a chariot and horses, raised them from the earth, and leaving this little globe behind, wafted them into the seats of the blessed. Only we must observe, that Christ's body was at this time invested with the powers of spirituality, and therefore capable of ascending without any vehicle; whereas theirs was retarded with a load of matter.^a And therefore it is reasonable to think, that by the ministry of angels, or rather by the power of God, the cloud which carried them up, was condensed to a more than common consistency, and that the whirlwind which might be raised for this purpose, helped to accelerate its motion, and expedite their ascent.

But since ⁸ 'flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God, neither doth corruption inherit incorruption;' the question is, how these persons were all on a sudden, ⁹ 'made meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light?' 'Behold I show you a mystery,' says St Paul, speaking of those who shall be alive at our Saviour's second advent, 'we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump;' and therefore the same almighty power, which, at the sounding of the last trump, will make our corruptible natures 'put on incorruption, and our mortal put on immortality,' did, no doubt, in their passage, change their terrestrial into celestial bodies, and thereby convey into them such faculties as were requisite for the enjoyment of the place whereunto it was conducting them.

What particular services Enoch had done God, for which he vouchsafed him this favour extraordinary, and an exemption from mortality, the Scripture has nowhere specified.^b It tells us only, that 'he walked with God;' but then, considering, that if not then, at least in a short time, ¹⁰ 'all flesh hath corrupted their ways, and that when God saw the wickedness of the earth, it repented him that he had made man;' we may suppose, that this good and pious patriarch took care not only of his conduct, but set himself in opposition likewise to the violence, and other kinds of iniquity, which began then to prevail in most places; and that, in short, he was, as the tradition goes, a preacher of righteousness, in which office Noah is said to have succeeded him. For that he was a preacher of righteousness is manifest from that commination of his, which St Jude, from some ancient record or other, brings him in making to the antediluvian world: ¹¹ 'Behold the Lord cometh with ten thousand of his saints to execute judgment upon all, and to convince all that are ungodly among them, of all their ungodly deeds which they have committed, and of all the hard speeches which ungodly sinners have spoken against him.'

from an earthly to a heavenly state, could change their gross natural bodies into pure and spiritual bodies, like those which the apostle tells us the saints shall possess when they shall be caught up in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air? That Enoch and Elijah underwent such a change, the author himself, with a strange inconsistency, admits in the next paragraph.—Ed.

^b It is not to be supposed that either Enoch or Elijah received such a glorious distinction on account of any services which they had rendered in the cause of God and religion; for, strictly speaking, no mere man was capable of rendering such services to God as should entitle him to an exemption from the curse brought upon all mankind by the fall; and however eminent these prophets were for their piety and zeal in the cause of God, they were still obnoxious to the consequences of Adam's transgression, and if they were exempted from the common doom, and admitted into the heavenly state, it could only have been through the blood of the Lamb that was slain from the foundation of the world. And in like manner, it is very evident, that Elijah was a zealous advocate for God, and a strenuous opposer of idolatry, an implacable enemy to Baal's priests, an undaunted reprove of the wickedness of princes; and a severe inflicter of the divine vengeance upon all the children of disobedience: and therefore, we may presume, that God designed his exaltation, not only as a recompense for his past services, which were great, but as an encouragement, likewise, to other remaining prophets, to be strong in the Lord; to bear witness boldly against the corruption of the age wherein they lived; and in the execution of their office to fear the face of no man.

The corruption of the age indeed, both in the times of Enoch and Elijah, was become so great and general, that the belief of a future state, we may well suppose, was in a manner quite extinct among them; and therefore God might think it expedient, at these two periods of time, to give the world a sensible proof of it, if not to convince the unbelieving part, at least to excite in the hearts of the faithful, under all their afflictions and persecutions for righteousness' sake, refreshing hopes and expectations of a recompense to be made them in due time. Nor can we think, but that in these instances God might have a prospect to a greater event, and by the assumption of his two faithful servants, intend to typify the ascension of his Son, who was to destroy death, and open the kingdom of heaven to all believers; that thereby he might make the testimony of his apostles concerning this fact a thing more credible; and give all good Christians a more solid comfort and consolation in those words of St Paul, ¹ 'Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifieth. Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died; yea, rather that is risen again, who is even at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us.'

The testimony of the angels concerning our blessed Saviour is,—² 'This same Jesus, who is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven:' but, before this his second coming, it is an opinion that has prevailed much among the ancient fathers, ³ that God in his great mercy will send Enoch and Elijah to oppose the proceedings of Antichrist, to refute his doctrines, and to fortify the righteous against his threats and cruelties; but that, by the management of this their adversary, they shall be put to death, though in a short time raised again to everlasting life and glory. The whole of this notion is founded upon a very abstruse passage in St John's Revelation, concerning the two witnesses, which are variously interpreted. For, besides Enoch and Elijah, as we said before, some apply them to the law and the prophets, others to the Old and New Testament, and others again, especially those who favour the millenary scheme, to our Saviour Christ, and his forerunner John the Baptist. But as every one is left to his liberty to choose what part he pleases in such problems as these, we shall, without pretending to determine any thing ourselves, leave the passage, which, in a great measure we account inexplicable, to the examination of the more learned and sagacious.—^a 'I will give power unto my two witnesses, and they shall prophesy a thousand two hundred and threescore days, clothed in sackcloth. These are the two olive-trees, and the two candlesticks, standing before the God of the earth; and if a man will hurt them, fire proceedeth out of their mouth, and devoureth their enemies.—They have power to shut heaven, that it rain not, in the days of their prophecy, and have power over waters, to turn them to blood, and to smite the earth with all plagues as often as they will. And when they shall have finished their testimony, the beast, that ascendeth out of the bottomless pit, shall make war against them, and overcome them, and kill them, and their dead bodies shall lie in the street of the great city, which is spiritually called Sodom and Egypt, where also our Lord was crucified.—Their bodies shall lie three days and an half without being buried, and the people shall rejoice and make merry, because of their death; but after three days and an half, the spirit of life from God shall enter into them, and they shall stand on their feet, and great fear shall fall upon them that see them.'^b

^a Rev. xi. 3, &c. The learned Calmet, from whom in a great measure I have extracted this dissertation, concludes his discourse in such words as these.—1. That though we cannot infer from the strict words of Moses, that Enoch was translated alive into another world, and is still living; yet nevertheless ought the authorities of St Paul, and the tradition of the church, to prevail, with us, to esteem, this opinion as a matter of faith.—2. Although the fathers and interpreters seem to differ about the place into which Enoch was translated, yet if we examine carefully their different opinions, the greatest part of them may be reduced to a declaration of his being in paradise, which some place on the earth, and others in heaven. And, 3. That whatever liberty the church may allow interpreters, of putting a sense on the passage quoted out of the Revelation, which speaks of the coming of two witnesses that are to appear in the latter ages, it must be agreed, that the opinion which explains it of the return of Enoch and Elijah upon the earth, is much preferable to any other, on account of its antiquity, its intrinsic justness, and the number of authors who maintain it.—[Calmet might, very consistently with his creed, pay great deference to tradition, and the authority of the Romish church; but Protestants renounce both the one and the other, and appeal to no human tribunal, in the interpretation of Scripture, but that of reason.]—Ed.

^b A considerable portion of what is advanced in the preceding section, might well have been spared. All inquiries as to the particular place or state assigned to Enoch and Elijah, or as to the exact nature and locality of the mansions prepared for the just, are to be regarded as vain and fruitless speculations, which may lead into error, but cannot tend to edification or instruction. These are amongst the secret things which belong to the Lord; and therefore it argues presumption on our part to search into them with prying and curious eyes. What it concerns us chiefly to know, is the design which the Almighty had in translating Enoch and Elijah into heaven, without tasting death, and if we carefully attend to the times in which each lived, the circumstances in which each was placed, and the method which God was pleased to adopt, in revealing his plans of mercy to our fallen race, we may warrantably draw the following conclusions. 1. That God intended to put a distinguishing mark of his honour upon Enoch and Elijah, in consideration of their faithful adherence to the truth, and their zeal in defending it in the midst of universal degeneracy and corruption. 2. That the high honour thus conferred upon these two faithful servants of God, was intended as a public attestation of a future state of retributions for the encouragement of God's people in times of trial and affliction. The account given of Enoch's translation is brief, and couched in obscure terms, while the history of the translation of Elijah is much more particular and minute; and this is perfectly consistent with the gradual development of the Almighty's designs, which we clearly recognise in the Old Testament, and particularly in the prophecies. 3. The assumption of Enoch and Elijah, was also designed as a prefiguration of the ascension of Christ. On CHAP. I.—From the Siege of Samaria by Benhadad, to the Death of Uzziah King of Judah.

THE HISTORY.

NOTWITHSTANDING the great service which the prophet Elisha had done Benhadad king of Syria, in curing Naaman, the general of his forces, of a confirmed leprosy, he still continued his enmity against Israel. Having raised an army with a purpose to besiege Samaria, he opened the campaign with stratagems of war; and, in hopes of surprising Jehoram's troops, laid here and there some ambuscades, which Elisha, by his spirit of prophecy found out, and all along gave the king of Israel a timely intelligence of them. Benhadad at first suspected that his councils were betrayed; but when he was informed by ^a one of his officers that Elisha, who was then at Dothan, a small city in the half tribe of Manasseh, and not far from Samaria, must certainly have been at the bottom of all this, he sent a strong detachment to seize him, and invested the city that night.

On the morrow, when Elisha's servant saw the enemy surrounding the town, and knew of no forces to oppose them, ^b he expressed his fear and concern to his master;

at this point we can hardly entertain a doubt, if we attend to the nature and design of the types and figures of the Old Testament. "It has been pertinently remarked, that in each of the three great periods of the church, it has pleased God, with a view to support the faith of his people, to give them a lively figure of the resurrection, as in the cases of Enoch before the flood, and under what is called the patriarchal dispensation, Elijah under the Mosaic dispensation, and the great Captain of salvation himself, under the gospel, for whom the everlasting doors were opened. And in conducting those events, the Most High has gradually disclosed life and immortality, from the dawn of morning light, to the full glory of meridian splendour. It must have been an encouraging sight to the antediluvian saints to see a guilty son of Adam withdrawn from among them, and lodged not in a tomb, but in the bosom of God. It was a still more striking illustration of immortality, to behold the heavens opened, and the divine messengers, in flaming fire, conducting a prophet into the mansions of glory. But the grandest display of this doctrine, is presented before our eyes, in the case of the Author and Finisher of our faith, who when he burst the bars of the grave, and ascended up on high, 'brought life and immortality to light,' opened the gates of righteousness, that the nations of those who are saved, may enter in. Enoch, Elijah, and Christ, in one view, may be compared with each other; but, in all things, to the latter belongs the pre-eminence. Enoch and Elijah ascended as solitary individuals, and their ascension, except as an example, benefited only themselves. Christ ascended as the first-fruits of them that sleep, and now that he is lifted up, he is drawing together his elect unto him, whom at least he will present before the presence of the Divine glory, with exceeding joy."—Jones.—ED.

^a It is not to be doubted, but that Naaman, upon his return from Samaria, spread the fame of Elisha so much in the court of Syria, that some of the great men there might have the curiosity to make a farther inquiry concerning him; and, being informed by several of his miraculous works, they might hence conclude, that he could tell the greatest secrets, as well as perform such wonders as were related of him; and that, therefore, in all probability, he was the person who gave the king of Israel intelligence of all the schemes that had been contrived to entrap him.—Patrick's Commentary.

^b This young man, it is supposable, had been but a little while with his master, no longer than since Gehazi's dismissal, and therefore perhaps had not yet seen any great experiments of his power to work miracles; or, if he had, the great and eminent but, upon his master's prayer, ^c his eyes were opened, and he beheld a multitude of horses and fiery chariots standing in array, and prepared to protect them; while, as his master continued his prayer, the men that beleagured the town were struck with blindness; so that by the prophet's persuading them that they were out of their way, and had mistaken the place they were bound to, they were led, in this bewildered condition, into the very midst of Samaria, where, at the prophet's request, God opened their eyes again to show them the danger they were in.

Jehoram, finding so great a number of the enemy lying at his mercy, would have gladly put them to the sword; but Elisha by all means dissuaded him from it; alleging, that as he would scarce be so cruel as to kill in cold blood, even prisoners that were taken in war, much less should he touch those who were brought into his hands by the providence of God; and therefore he rather advised him ^d to treat them, with all manner of civility, and let them go; which accordingly the king did.

But, ^e how signal soever this piece of service and danger he thought his master in, (for, in all probability, he had learned from the people of the town, that this vast body of men were come to apprehend him only,) might well be allowed to raise his fear, and shake his faith.—Poole's Annotations.

^c It must be allowed that angels, whether they be purely spiritual, or, as others think, clothed with some material form, cannot be seen by mortal eyes; and therefore as Elisha himself, without a peculiar vouchsafement of God, could not discern the heavenly host, which, at this time, encamped about him; so he requests of God, that, for the removal of his fears, and the confirmation of his faith, his servant might be indulged the same privilege; nor does it seem improbable, that from such historical facts as these, which have descended by tradition, that notion among the Greeks, of a certain mist which intercepts the sight of their gods from the ken of human eyes, might at first borrow its origin. To this purpose we may observe, that Homer makes Minerva bespeak Diomedes fighting against the Trojans, who were assisted by some other gods: "The vapour which heretofore lay over thine eyes, I of a truth abstracted, that you might certainly know the immortal from the mortal being." Which Virgil has imitated, in making Venus speak thus: "Look for I will take away all that cloud which, at present overspreading thy vision, weakens it powers, and renders indistinct the circumjacent objects."—Æneid, 2.—Le Clerc's Commentary.

^d Though, according to the rigour of the laws of arms, a conqueror is at liberty to put whatever enemies fall into his hands, if he pleases, to the sword; yet the laws of humanity and compassion, of honour and good nature, should always restrain us from treating with the utmost severity such as surrender themselves, and implore our mercy; for so says the tragedian, "What the law doth not forbid, modesty itself repudiates."—Senec. Troad. So the philosopher, "The nature of honour and equity commands us to spare even captives."—Senec. de Clement. b. 1. c. 18.) And so the divine, "Necessity, not will, destroys the opposing enemy; as violence is due to him that fighteth and opposeth, so mercy must be rendered to the vanquished captive."—Aug. ad Bonifac. epis. 1.) But, besides the humanity and charity of the thing, there was this prudence and policy, in the kind treatment of the Syrians, that, by this means, their hearts might be mollified towards the Israelites, that, upon their return, they might become as it were, so many preachers of the power and greatness of the God of Israel, and not only be afraid themselves, but dissuade others likewise from opposing a people that had so invincible a protector.—Calmel's Commentary and Poole's Annotations.

^e Several heathens have observed, that "injuries are more gloriously overcome by benefits, than requited by pertinacious and mutual hatred;" but the sense of benefits in bad natures does not last long; for no sooner do we read of the kind treatment which the Syrians received, (2 Kings vi. 23.) but it immediately follows, that the king of Syria 'gathered all his host, and went up and besieged Samaria,' which does not so well agree with what is said in the preceding verse, namely, that 'the bands of the generosity to Benhadad was, it did not prevail with him to relinquish the old grudge and malice which he had conceived against Israel: for, not long after, he laid close siege to Samaria, and reduced the city to such distress, that an ass's head was sold ^a for fourscore pieces of silver, and ^b three quarters of a pint of pulse for five. Nay, to that extremity was the famine come, that even mothers were constrained to eat their own children ;

Syrians came no more into the land of Israel.' But now, as we can hardly think, that any author whatever would contradict himself in the same breath, so we must suppose, either that the Syrians quite retreated for this time, and laid aside all thoughts of war, though afterwards they altered their minds, and broke out again into hostilities; or, what seems more plain, that their bands made no more incursions and inroads, but that they were resolved to fall upon the Israelites at once, with a regular and formed army, and to besiege Samaria. For in this sense Josephus takes it, when he tells us, that, after this time, " Adad," for so he calls Benhadad, " never entered into any underland practice against the king of Israel, but resolved to make open war upon him, in confidence of his greater strength and numbers.—Jewish Antiquities, b. 9. c. 2.

^a If we reckon these pieces of silver, or shekels, at fifteen-pence apiece, they come to five pound sterling; a vast price for that which had on it so little meat, and that unclean according to the law, (Liv. xi. 26.) In times of famine, however, and extreme necessity, the Jews themselves were absolved from the observation of the law: nor do there want instances in history where other people, upon the same occasion, have been reduced to the like distress, if what Plutarch, in the life of Artaxerxes, tells us, be true, namely, that in that prince's war with the Caducii, an ass's head could scarce have been purchased at the price of sixty drachms, that is, two pounds and five shillings of our money.—Cabnet's Commentary, and Prideaux's Connection, in the preface.

^b What we in this place call pulse, our translation has rendered dove's dung; but interpreters have been at a great loss to devise, upon what account the inhabitants of Samaria should be obliged to buy so small a quantity of it (for a cab was the least measure the Jews had for dry things) at so dear a rate. For food, for salt, for firing, for dunging their lands within the walls, several interpreters have severally applied it; but, upon a small examination, it will appear, that none of these uses could suit with the circumstances of a city so closely besieged as Samaria was. The Talmudists suppose, that they have found out the true solution, by translating the term in the original by crop of doves; for they affirm, that several people in Samaria kept many doves to bring them provisions from the country, which were wont to disgorge what they picked up, so that their owners might sell it at a dear rate: but who can imagine that so great a number of doves, as were necessary for this purpose, should be suffered to live in a city so pinched with famine; that doves should be so docile, and well trained up, as to bring to their masters whatever they had ranged for: or, that in a country, in a manner covered with the enemy, who had altogether foraged and laid it waste, there should be found any nourishment at all? The learned Bochart, therefore, has not only solidly confuted these wild opinions, but has likewise farther observed that the Arabians gave the name of dove's dung, or sparrow's dung, to two several things; 1st, to a kind of moss that grows on trees, or stony ground: and, 2dly, to a sort of pease or pulse, which was very common in Judea, as may be seen in 2 Sam. xvii. 28, and therefore he concludes, that the word Chersonim may very well denote vetches or pulse: and, for the confirmation of this, some travellers have told us, that, at Grand Cairo and Damascus, there are magazines where they constantly fry this kind of grain, which those who go on pilgrimage buy and take with them as part of the provision for their journey; Hieroz., part 2. b. 1. c. 7. and an Essay towards a New Translation.—[Harmer, in his Observations, attempts to show that the dove's dung mentioned 2 Kings vi. 25, was employed during the siege, for the purpose of more speedily raising a supply of esculent vegetables, such as melons and cucumbers; and it is well known that dove's dung is reckoned of great value in the east on account of its great power in stimulating the rapid growth of such vegetables. Most modern critics, however, are of opinion, that by which when the king understood, from the information of one who had been constrained to do it, he rent his clothes, and, in a fit of rage vowed to be revenged of Elisha, whom he took to be the cause of all this calamity; and to this purpose sent an officer to take off his head, whilst himself followed after to see the execution done.

Elisha, by the spirit of prophecy, had notice of this wicked design against his life; and having acquainted ^a the company with it, desired them to secure the doors, ^e dove's dung, is meant a kind of pease, which agrees with the opinion expressed in the author's note. Dr Boothroyd translates vetches, and certainly this rendering marks more strongly the severity of the famine than the received one, for it cannot be supposed that dove's dung, in the literal acceptation, was used for food. Dr A. Clarke agrees in supposing that a sort of pease are meant, which to this day the Arabs call by this name. Dr Shaw says, "The garvanços, cicer, or chick pea, has been taken for the pigeon's dung, mentioned in the siege of Samaria; and as the cicer is pointed at one end, and acquires an ash colour in parching, the first of which circumstances answers to the figure, the second to the usual colour of dove's dung, the supposition is by no means to be disregarded.]—Ed.

^c The story, as it is represented in Scripture, is very affecting. And as the king of Israel was passing by upon the wall, there cried a woman unto him, saying, Help, my lord, O king! And he said, If the Lord do not help thee, whence shall I help thee? out of the barn-floor, or out of the wine-press? And the king said unto her, What aileth thee? And she answered, This woman said unto me, Give thy son, that we may eat him to-day, and we will eat my son to-morrow; so we boiled my son, and did eat him; and I said unto her the next day, Give thy son that we may eat him, and she hath hid her son: 2 Kings vi. 26, &c. A shocking story this! and a terrible effect of the divine vengeance, which Moses had long before told the Israelites would fall upon them, Deut. xxviii. 53, if they rebelled against God; which, at two other times besides this, namely, at the siege of Jerusalem under Nebuchadnezzar, Ezek. v. 10, and at that under Titus the Roman general, came likewise to pass; for therein Josephus gives us a very dolorous account of a lady of distinction, who, out of extremity of hunger, was forced to eat the very child that sucked at her breast.—The Wars of the Jews, b. 7. c. 8.

^d The words in the text are, 'And Elisha sat in his house, and the elders sat with him,' 2 Kings vi. 32, where, by 'his house,' some interpreters understand the school where the sons of the prophets met to be instructed; and, by the elders, his chief scholars, who under his instruction applied themselves to the study of divine things. But as we frequently read in Ezekiel, of the elders of Israel, sitting before the prophet to hear him, chap. viii. 1, and xiv. 1, we cannot see why the elders, in this place likewise, may not denote some good and godly men, who bore office either in the court, camp, or city, as it seems probable by the prophet's desiring their help and protection. For, though Jehoram himself was a wicked man, and most of his officers might be forward enough to imitate him, yet we are not to doubt, but that there were some of them, whom Elisha's holy life and glorious miracles, together with the sundry benefits which the public reaped from his ministry, had won over to God, and to the true religion; and these were here sitting with him, either to receive comfort and counsel from him in this distressed time, or to solicit him to use his power with God for their relief; which accordingly he did, and in compliance to their request, not out of any fear of the king's threats, (from which he was well assured that God would not fail to deliver him,) he pronounced the joyful news, which follows in the beginning of the next chapter.—Poole's Annotations.

^e Executions in the east are often very prompt and arbitrary. In many cases the suspicion is no sooner entertained, or the cause of offence given, than the fatal order is issued; the messenger of death hurries to the unsuspecting victim, shows his warrant, and executes his orders that instant in silence and solitude. Instances of this kind are continually occurring in the Turkish and Persian histories. "When the enemies of a great man, among the Turks, have gained influence enough over the prince to procure a warrant for his death, a capidgi (the name of the officer who executes these orders), is sent to him, who shows him the

that the officer might not be admitted until the king came. When the king was come, and the prophet was exhorting him to have a little patience, and God would remove this affliction in time, in a raving fit of despair, he replied, 'That he would wait God's leisure no longer, but go and worship his father's idols, if they, peradventure, could deliver him in this necessity.' Whereupon the prophet assured him, that, if he would stay but four and twenty hours more, he should see such an alteration in Samaria, that ^a a measure of flour should be sold for a shekel, and two measures of barley for the same price. This a certain lord, a great favourite of the king's, standing by and hearing, affirmed to be a thing impossible, unless God should rain corn from the clouds; to whom the prophet only made this short answer, that 'himself should see the plenty, but not be permitted to taste of it;' which accordingly came to pass.

The people of Samaria, though addicted to idolatry, did nevertheless observe the ceremonial part of the law, and, pursuant to this, had ^b shut four lepers out of the order he has received to carry back his head; the other takes the warrant of the grand seignor, kisses it, puts it on his head in token of respect, and then having performed his ablutions, and said his prayers, freely resigns his life. The capidgi having strangled him, cuts off his head, and brings it to Constantinople. The grand seignor's order is implicitly obeyed; the servants of the victim never attempt to hinder the executioner, although the capidgi came very often with few or no attendants." It appears in the writings of Chardin, that the nobility and grandees of Persia are put to death in a manner equally silent, hasty, and unobstructed. Such executions were not uncommon among the Jews under the government of their kings. Solomon sent Beniah as his capidgi, or executioner, to put Adonijah, a prince of his own family, to death; and Joah, the commander-in-chief of the forces in the reign of his father. A capidgi likewise beheaded John the Baptist in the prison, and carried his head to the court of Herod. To such silent and hasty executions, the royal preacher seems to refer in that proverb; 'the wrath of a king is as messengers of death; but a wise man will pacify it;' his displeasure exposes the unhappy offender to immediate death, and may fill the unsuspecting bosom with terror and dismay, like the appearance of a capidgi; but by wise and prudent conduct, a man may sometimes escape the danger. From the dreadful promptitude with which Beniah executed the commands of Solomon on Adonijah and Joah, it may be concluded that the executioner of the court was as little ceremonious, and the ancient Jews nearly as passive as the Turks or Persians. The prophet Elisha is the only person in the inspired record, who ventured to resist the bloody mandate of the sovereign; the incident is recorded in these terms: 'But Elisha sat in his house, and the elders sat with him; he said to the elders, See how this son of a murderer has sent to take away mine head? Look when the messenger cometh; shut the door, and hold him fast at the door. Is not the sound of his master's feet behind him?' But if such mandates had not been too common among the Jews, and in general submitted to without resistance, Jehoram had scarcely ventured to dispatch a single messenger to take away the life of so eminent a person as Elisha.—Paxton's Illustrations.—Ed.

^a The word Seah, which we render a measure, was equal to six eabs, and contained, as some think, six quarts, as others a peck, and as others a peck and two quarts, of our measure. The shekel was much about our three shillings; and to have a peck of fine flour for three shillings at other times would not have been so cheap; but, considering the present situation of things, it was wonderfully so.—Le Clerc's Commentary and Poole's Annotations.—According to the best authorities, the measure or seah was equal to one peck one pint, and the value of the shekel, two shillings, 3d¹/₂ sterling.—Ed.

^b The Jews are of opinion, that these four lepers were Gehazi and three of his sons. Persons that were leprous indeed, were not permitted to converse with other men, and, by the city; who lay under the walls, until they were ready to starve. In this condition these poor creatures, consulting what measures they should best take, resolved at last to try the generosity of the enemy, because, at the worst, they could but die; and accordingly, before the break of day, went to the camp. When they came thither, to their great surprise, they found no living creature, but only horses and asses.^c The tents were standing and well provided with riches, and all manner of necessaries, but the men were gone: for having been affrighted with a noise in the air, as of an army in full march, and ready to fall upon them, they supposed that the king of Israel had called to his assistance some foreign powers, the ^d Hittites or Egyptians, and thereupon leaving the camp, without ever striking their tents, betook themselves to their heels as fast as they could.

The poor lepers having first satisfied their hunger, and secured some riches to themselves, began to reflect, that while they were thus regaling themselves, and plundering the camp, their countrymen were in danger of starving in the town; and therefore, with all possible haste, returning to the gate, they gave the porter notice of the enemy's flight, who went immediately and sent an account of it to the king. The king, imagining at first that this had been a stratagem ^e of the Syrians to law of Moses, while the Israelites lived in tents, they were to be turned out of the camp, (Num. v. 2, 3.) But, after that they came to inhabit cities, it may be questioned whether they treated them with that rigour; since, in 2 Kings viii. 4, we find Gehazi holding discourse with the king, (which makes against his being one of the four excluded lepers,) and giving him a detail of all Elisha's miracles; but this he might do by talking to him at a proper distance. Lepers indeed were carefully avoided, because their distemper, in these hot countries, was thought contagious; but, in the case before us, these four seem to be excluded, not so much upon the account of their distemper, as because they were useless hands. They could neither fight, nor work in communion with others; they were only persons born to consume the fruits of the earth, and were therefore no proper persons in a siege.—Patrick's and Calnel's Commentaries.

^c 2 Kings vii. 10. 'Horses tied and asses tied,' From the circumstances recorded concerning the flight of the Syrians, it appears to have been remarkably precipitate. That they were not altogether unprepared for a hasty departure, may be inferred from comparing this passage with the following extract from Memoirs relative to Egypt, p. 300. "As soon as the Arabs are apprehensive of an attack, they separate into several small camps, at a great distance from each other, and tie their camels to the tents, so as to be able to move off at a moment's notice." Such a precaution is not probably peculiar to the modern Arabs, but might be adopted by the Syrian army. If this was the case, it shows with what great fear God filled their minds, that though prepared as usual for a quick march, they were not able to avail themselves of the advantage, but were constrained to leave every thing behind them as a prey to their enemies.—Ed.

^d The Hittites in particular lived in Arabia Petraea, to the south of Palestine, and, in Solomon's time, who had some wives likewise out of their country, held a great commerce with him for horses, (1 Kings x. 29. and xi. 1.) But under the name of Hittites, as elsewhere under the name of Amorites, the sacred penman seems to comprehend all, or any of the people of Canaan. For though the great number of that people were destroyed, yet some of them were spared, and many of them, upon Joshua's coming, fled away, some to remote parts, as that famous and ancient pillar in the coasts of Afric testifies, and others to the countries bordering upon Canaan; where, by reason of the scarcity of inhabitants in those days, finding room enough, they seated themselves, and in process of time, growing numerous and powerful, appointed, according to their ancient manner of government, kings to rule over them.—Poole's Annotations draw his people out of the town, and so fall upon them, sent out some parties to reconnoitre such places as might be most suspected for ambuscades; but when they returned, they informed him, that they could get no sight of the enemy, only they found the road strewed with arms, and garments, and several bundles of things, which they had dropped, as they supposed, to ease themselves in their flight. Upon hearing of this news, the people rushed out of the city in great numbers, and bring in provision in such quantities, that corn was sold at the price which Elisha mentioned, and at the time which he foretold: and as the incredulous nobleman, who had despised the prophet's prediction, was appointed by the king to guard the gate which led from the city to the camp, the better to prevent disorders, the crowd pressed so vehemently upon him, that they trampled him under foot, and killed him, before he had an opportunity to taste any part of that great store which he saw was brought to the market.

After this miraculous raising of the siege of Samaria, Benhadad was deterred from making any farther attempts upon Israel: nor do we hear any more of him in the sacred history, until Elisha went to Damascus, the capital of Syria, to execute the order of declaring Hazael king, which was originally given to Elijah his predecessor. The king hearing of his arrival, and being no stranger to his abilities, sent this same Hazael, who was then become one of his prime ministers, to wait upon him with a very noble present, and to inquire of him whether he should recover of the sickness which he then laboured under. The prophet told Hazael, that his master might recover, because his distemper was not of itself mortal, but that he was very well assured that he would not: and then,

(p. 99.) we have an account of a transaction very similar to the stratagem supposed to have been practised by the Syrians. The pasha of Sham (Damascus) having marched near to the sea of Tiberias, found sheik Daher encamped there; but the sheik deferring the engagement till the next morning, during the night divided his army into three parts, and left the camp, with great fires, all sorts of provisions, and a large quantity of spirituous liquors, giving strict orders not to hinder the enemy from taking possession of the camp, but to come down and attack them just before dawn of day. "In the middle of the night, the pasha of Sham thought to surprise sheik Daher, and marched in silence to the camp, which, to his great astonishment, he found entirely abandoned, and thought the sheik had fled with so much precipitation, that he could not carry off the baggage and stores. The pasha thought proper to stop in the camp to refresh his soldiers. They soon fell to plunder, and drank so freely of the liquors, that, overcome with the fatigue of the day's march, and the fumes of the spirits, they were not long ere they were in a sound sleep. At that time sheik Sleby and sheik Crime, who were watching the enemy, came silently to the camp; and sheik Daher, having repassed the sea of Tiberias, meeting them, they all rushed into the camp, and fell on the confused and sleeping enemy, eight thousand of whom they slew on the spot; and the pasha, with the remainder of his troops, fled with much difficulty to Sham, leaving all their baggage behind."—Harmer, vol. iv. p. 244.—Ed.

a What Benhadad's distemper was, we are nowhere told in Scripture: but it is very evident, that it was not of so desperate a nature, but that he might have recovered of it, had he not had foul play for his life. According to the account of Josephus, it was no more than a fit of melancholy: for "when he came to understand," as he tells us, "that all those alarms of chariots and horsemen, that had given such an irreparable rout to him and his army, were, in truth, only judicial impressions of affright and terror, without any foundation, he looked upon it as a declaration from heaven against him: and this anxiety of thought made him as sick in the body too as he was in his mind."—Jewish Antiq. b. 5. c. 2.

looking steadfastly upon him, he broke out into tears, upon the prospect, as he told him, of the ^b many barbarous calamities which he would bring upon Israel, when once he was advanced to power, as that he would be, because he was assured by divine revelation that he was to be king of Syria. At these words, Hazael's ambition took wing; and therefore returning to his master, he concealed the prophet's answer, and gave him good hopes of his recovery, but the next day took care to prevent it, by ^c stifling his breath with a thick cloth dipped in water: and as Benhadad had no son of his own, and Hazael was a man of great esteem, especially among the soldiery, he was, without much difficulty, declared his successor.

The next thing which Elisha did was to have Jehu anointed king of Israel, pursuant to the order that was given to his master Elijah, and to the divine decree of punishing the house of Ahab for their manifold impieties. Ramoth-Gilead was a place of long dispute between the two crowns of Israel and Syria. Jehoram, king of Israel, had lately had an engagement with Hazael, king of Syria, not far from it, wherein he had received some very dangerous wounds, and was gone down to Jezreel, to be cured of them. His army, however, ^d continued

^b The particulars are thus enumerated:—"I know the evil that thou wilt do to the children of Israel; their strongholds wilt thou set on fire; their young men wilt thou slay with the sword; and wilt dash their children, and rip up their women with child," (2 Kings viii. 12.) That dashing young children against the stones was one piece of barbarous cruelty, which the people of the east were apt to run into, in the prosecution of their wars, is plainly intimated in that passage of the Psalmist's, alluding to the calamities which preceded the Babylonish captivity: "O daughter of Babylon, wasted with misery! Yea, happy shall he be that rewardeth thee, as thou hast served us. Blessed shall he be, that taketh thy children, and throweth them against the stones," (Ps. cxxxvii. 8, 9.) Nor was this inhuman practice quite out of use among nations that pretended to more politeness: for, according to the remains of ancient fame, the Greeks, when they became masters of Troy, were so cruel as to throw Astyanax, Hector's son, a child in his mother's arms, as Homer represents him, headlong from one of the towers of the city. The ripping up women with child is the highest degree of brutal cruelty; and a cruelty for which there is no occasion, because, kill but the mother, and the child dies of course; and yet it has been often known, that in the heat of execution, this barbarity has been committed. Nay, there is reason to believe that Hazael, in his war with the Gileadites, (2 Kings x. 32, 33.) verified this part of the prophet's prediction concerning him; for what Amos, complaining of his cruelty to these people, calls threshing Gilead 'with threshing instruments of iron,' both the Septuagint and Arabic versions read, 'he saved the big-bellied women of Gilead with iron saws.'—Le Clerc's and Calmet's Commentaries.

^c This he did, that no signs of violence might appear upon him; for had the people, in the least, suspected his being murdered, Hazael would not so easily have acceded to the throne; because, according to the account of Josephus, Benhadad was a man of such reputation among the people of Syria and Damascus, that as his memory was celebrated among them with divine honours, his death, no doubt, had it been known to have been violent, would have been fully revenged upon the murderer.—Jewish Ant. b. 9. c. 2. We may observe, however, that history makes mention of some other princes who have died in the same manner that Benhadad did; that the emperor Tiberius, according to Suetonius, was, in his last sickness, choked in his bed by a pillow crammed into his mouth, or, as Tacitus has it, was smothered to death under a vast load of bedclothes; and that king Demetrius, the son of Philip, as well as the emperor Frederick II., was hurried out of the world the same way.—Calmet's Commentary.

^d It is supposed by some interpreters, that the city of Ramoth-Gilead was taken by Jehoram, before he departed from it to be the siege under the command of Jehu, who in the king's absence, acted as captain-general. This, Elisha thought, was no improper opportunity to execute the orders which were left upon him to do; and therefore ^a calling one of his minor prophets, he bid him go to Ramoth-Gilead, and ^b there anoint ^c Jehu, the grandson of Nimshi, as king of Israel, with the utmost secrecy, and then to come away with the utmost expedition. When the prophet came thither, he found the officers in a council of war, and Jehu, at the head of them. Desiring therefore to speak with him in private, he did what his instructions were, and reminding the general of the prophecies of Elijah, concerning the utter extinction of the house of Ahab, he enjoined him, now that he was invested with power, to put them in execution.

The officers that were with Jehu, had but a contemptible opinion of his wounds. This they gather from the mention made of the 'inner chamber,' (2 Kings ix. 2.) 'the top of the stairs,' (ver. 13.) and from that caution which Jehu thinks advisable, 'Let none go forth, or escape out of the city,' (ver. 15.) But these arguments will not do. What we render 'out of the city,' does signify every whit as properly, 'from before the city,' that is, out of the camp or army that is besieging the city. But even, if this be not so, the Israelites might, at this time, have the suburbs, or out-buildings belonging to the city, in their possession, where the general might have his headquarters, and from whence he might give orders to the piquet-guard, as we call it, that none should be permitted to move. For had the town been already in their hands, we cannot see why Jehoram should have kept all Israel there, (ver. 14.) that is, all the military force of Israel, when a strong garrison would have been sufficient.—Poole's Annotations.

^a The Jewish doctors are of opinion, that the prophet whom Elisha sent upon this message, was Jonah; but, upon this supposition, he must at this time have been a very young man, because Jeroboam II., in whose reign Jonah prophesied, did not ascend the throne till about fifty years after this unction of Jehu king of Israel. However this be, it is reasonable to think that Elisha himself did not go to perform this office, either because he was now grown old, and unfit for such a journey, or because he was a person too well known, and not so proper to be employed in an affair that required secrecy.—Patrick's and Calnet's Commentaries.

^b The Jews are of opinion, that none of the kings of Israel were anointed but those that were of the house of David, and these only when there was a question about their succession; as Solomon, they say, needed not to have been anointed, had it not been for the faction of Adonijah. But in the case of Jehu, in whom the succession of the kingdom of Israel was to be translated out of the right line of the family of Ahab, into another family which had no right to the kingdom, but merely the appointment of God, there was a necessity for his unction, in order both to convey to him a title, and to invest him in the actual possession of the kingdom; for if that, which some imagine from 1 Kings xix. 16., be true, namely, that the prophet Elijah did, before this time, anoint Jehu, that unction did only confer on him a remote right to the kingdom, in the same manner as Samuel's unction did to David. (1 Sam. xvi. 13.)—Patrick's Commentary and Poole's Annotations.

^c For barbarity and hypocrisy Jehu has few parallels; and the cowardliness and baseness of the nobles of Samaria, have seldom been equalled. Ahab's bloody house must be cut off; but did God ever design that it should be done by these means? The men were, no doubt, profligate and wicked, and God permitted their iniquity to manifest itself in this way; and thus the purpose of God, that Ahab's house should no more reign, was completely accomplished: (see 1 Kings xxi. 19, 21, 29.) And by this conduct Jehu is said to have executed what was right in God's eyes. (ver. 30.) The cutting off of Ahab's family was decreed by the divine justice; the means by which it was done, or at least the manner of doing, were not entirely of his appointing: yet the commission given him by the young prophet, (c. ix. 7.) was very extensive. Yet still many things seem to be attributed to God, as the agent, which he does not execute, but only permits to be done.—Ed.

able opinion of the prophet; for persons of this character they looked upon as a ^d kind of madmen; and yet when they understood that he had anointed Jehu to be king, they proclaimed him with a general consent, and, with a good body of forces, marched directly to Jezreel, where Jehoram was not yet recovered of his wounds, and whither Ahaziah, king of Judah, was at that time come to visit him. Jehu's intent, was to get to Jezreel, before the king could have any intelligence of what had passed at Ramoth-Gilead, and there to surprise and seize him; but a ^e centinel from the watch tower, perceiving a body of men coming, and, by their hasty march, concluding that it was Jehu who commanded them, apprised the two kings of it; whereupon they got ready their chariots in all haste, and, as the providence of God would have it, met him not far from the vineyard of Naboth, the Jezreelite, and perhaps ^f in the place where Naboth was stoned.

Upon their first meeting, a few words convinced Jehoram, that Jehu had conspired against him, and was come in an hostile manner, to avenge ^f the idolatry and wickedness of his mother Jezebel, whereupon he turned his chariot and fled; but Jehu soon overtook him with a swift arrow, which pierced his heart; and when he per-

^d The officers who were in company with Jehu, might easily perceive by the habit, and air, and manner of speech of the person who accosted Jehu so boldly, and when he had done his business, vanished so suddenly, that he was a prophet; but then there might be several reasons which might induce men of their profession to have a contemptible opinion of men of that order. The rigid and obscure course of life which the prophets led, their neglect of themselves, and of the things of this world, might pass with them for a kind of infatuation; and the holy exercises to which they devoted themselves, for no more than a religious frenzy. Besides this, the false prophets, which they had seen in the court of Ahab, had given just offence; and by their affected gestures and studied contortions, whereby they thought to recommend their crude enthusiasms, made themselves justly ridiculous, and contemptible. And therefore it is no wonder that these officers, at first sight, should censure a true, as they thought they had reason to judge of the false prophets with whom they had been acquainted; especially when we find some leading men in the tribe of Judah treating the prophets of the Lord, as in the case of Ezekiel xxiii. 30, 31, and of Jeremiah xxix. 26, as fools and madmen; and some great names in the heathen world, looking upon all pretenders to inspiration in no better light; according to that noted passage in Cicero: "what authority does that 'furor' possess which ye call divine, so that a madman can discern what a wise man cannot; and he who has lost his human senses, is thought to possess superhuman."—De Divinat. b. 2.

^e In time of peace, as well as war, it was customary to have watchmen set on high and eminent places wherever the king was, to prevent his being surprised. Thus David, at Jerusalem, was informed by the watchman, that his sons were escaped from the slaughter of Absalom, when he thought them all lost, (2 Sam. xiii. 34.) and therefore Jehoram, who had an army lying before Ramoth-Gilead, had good reason to keep a watchful eye upon every motion that came, especially from that quarter.—Patrick's and Calnet's Commentaries.

^f The answer which Jehu returns to Jehoram is,—'What peace, so long as the whoredoms of thy mother Jezebel, and her witchcrafts are so many?' (2 Kings ix. 22.) that is, whilst her idolatries wherewith she bewitches the people, are still continued and multiplied. And he upbraids Jehoram with his mother's sins, and not with his own, because hers were more notorious and infamous, and what by his contrivance, he had made his own; because they were the principal reasons why God did indict, and he was come to execute these judgments; and because he could find no odious accusations against him, except about the golden calves, which he purposely declined mentioning, because he himself intended to keep them up.—Poole's Annotations.

ceived him sinking in his chariot, he bid an officer that was by throw him into Naboth's field, which was near at hand, ^a that the word of the Lord might be fulfilled.

As for Abaziah, he attempted to make his escape, but was pursued by a party of Jehu's men, who came up with him at Gur, and, as he was sitting in his chariot, gave him a mortal wound; so that as soon as he reached Megiddo he died. He was thence removed to Jerusalem, where he was buried in the royal sepulchre of his ancestors, and, after a reign of less than two years, was succeeded by his mother Athaliah, who usurped the throne.

Jehu, in the mean time, made the best of his way to Jezreel, where Jezebel, resolving to keep up her grandeur to the last, ^b painted and dressed herself in her royal robes, and looking out of her window, upbraided him with his treachery as he passed by, and reminded him of the unhappy fate of Zimri, who slew his king and master Elan: but, without making her any answer, he called to somebody to throw her out of the window, which ^c her own eunuchs did; so that, by the fall,

^a The words which Jehu seems to quote are these,—‘Surely I have seen yesterday the blood of Naboth and the blood of his sons, saith the Lord, and I will requite him in this place, (2 Kings ix. 26.) It is to be observed, however, that in all the history of Naboth, which is recorded in 1 Kings xxi., we find no mention made of the death of his sons; but it is no unusual thing for the Scripture to supply in one place, that which has been omitted in another. It is not improbable, therefore, that as Naboth was accused of high treason, all his family was involved in his ruin, and all his estate confiscated to the king's exchequer; and what seems to confirm this opinion, is,—That we find Elijah never once putting the king in mind to restore the vineyard to Naboth's children, nor the king, in the time of his repentance, ever once thinking to do it, because, in all human appearance, there were no heirs left. Notwithstanding this, Grotius, and other learned men, have observed, that these words may signify no more than the extreme poverty to which Naboth's family was reduced by the death of their father, and the confiscation of his goods: for, among the Hebrews, say they, all punishments and miseries are called ‘blood,’ (Lev. xvii. 4.) and to take away their estate, upon which they would have lived, was, in effect, to take away their blood, in which is the life of every creature. But this is a little forced: and therefore, we should rather think, that Jehu is here aggravating Ahab's crime, and reckoning the sons as slain with the father, because by their being deprived of him, and of his estate, they were, in a manner, in as bad a condition as though they were dead.—Le Clerc's, Patrick's, and Cabinet's Commentaries. [This last opinion is not more satisfactory than the preceding. As the object both of Ahab and Jezebel was to obtain entire and perpetual possession of Naboth's vineyard, it is very probable that the whole of Naboth's family were cut off with himself, in order that none of his posterity might afterwards reclaim the property.]—ED.

^b The words in the original import, ‘She put her eyes in paint,’ that is, she used stibium or antimony pulverized, to make her eyes and eyebrows look black and large, which, in several countries, was accounted a great beauty. The use of paint has been of ancient date, and the art of blacking the hair, and beautifying the face may be indulged to the vanity of the female sex; but it raises one's indignation to read of a Sardanapalus painting his eyes and eyebrows; of the ancient Greeks running into the same custom; and much more of the ancient Romans; but there were fops in all nations then as well as now. ‘He by using wet soot enlarged his eyebrow; pricking it with an obliquely pointed needle, and stains his trembling eyelids.—Juv. Sat. 2.

^c According to the custom of the eastern nations, the business of this sort of people was to attend upon queens in their chambers, who by their great fidelity and obsequiousness, gained generally the esteem, and were admitted to the confidence of those they served, and from thence into places very often of great trust and profit. It is remarked, however, of Jezebel's eunuchs, that they were far from being faithful to her, to let us see how suddenly courtiers are wont to change with the fortune of their masters.—Patrick's Commentary.

her ^d blood stained the walls of the palace, and, when she was upon the pavement, the horses trampled her under foot, and the dogs devoured her body; ^e insomuch,

^d Some of the Jewish doctors look upon this as a punishment, according to the lex talionis; for as she had done, so she suffered. She had caused Naboth to be stoned, and now she is condemned to be stoned herself. For there were two ways of stoning, either by throwing stones at malefactors till they had knocked them down and killed them; or by throwing them down upon the stones from an high place, and so dashing them to pieces.—Patrick's Commentary.

^e It is scarcely possible for an European to form an idea of the intolerable nuisance occasioned in the villages and cities of the east, by the multitude of dogs that infest the streets. The natives, accustomed from their earliest years to the annoyance, come to be regardless of it; but to a stranger these creatures are the greatest plague to which he is subjected; for, as they are never allowed to enter a house, and do not constitute the property of any particular owner, they display none of those habits of which the domesticated species among us, are found susceptible, and are destitute of all those social qualities which often render the dog the trusty and attached friend of man,—the lively companion,—the faithful guardian, and the favourite on every hearth. Instead of the gentle, attractive, and almost rational creature he appears to be among us, the race seems wholly to degenerate in the warm regions of the east, and to approximate to the character of beasts of prey, as in disposition they are ferocious, cunning, blood-thirsty, and possessed of the most insatiable voracity; and even in their very form, there is something repulsive; their sharp and savage features; their wolf-like eyes; their long hanging ears; their straight and pointed tails; their lank and emaciated forms, almost entirely without a belly, give them an appearance of wretchedness and degradation, that stands in sad contrast with the general condition and qualities of the breed in Europe. They are almost wholly outcasts from human habitations; and, consequently, in Asiatic countries, the beautiful traits of canine fidelity and attachment, are altogether unknown. There the hand of man is seldom extended to offer the stroke or the morsel of kindness; and the creature that receives or snatches it from the unwilling hand, would, in a few hours after, if an opportunity offered, mangle and devour the corpse of his benefactor without the smallest repugnance. These hideous creatures, dreaded by the people for their ferocity, or avoided by them as useless and unclean, are obliged to prowl about everywhere in search of a precarious subsistence; and, as they have never been subjected to any discipline, and run generally in bands, their natural ferocity, inflamed by hunger, and the consciousness of strength, makes them the most troublesome and dangerous visitors to the stranger who unexpectedly finds himself in their neighbourhood, as they will not scruple to seize whatever he may have about him, and even in the event of his falling, and being otherwise defenceless, to attack and devour him. It is chiefly, however, at night, that these prowlers are the most formidable; for even those which lie during the heat of the day, lazy, inactive, and scarcely raising their head to growl at the passenger who may have chanced to trample on them, run about, whenever the shades begin to fall, and the inhabitants to disappear from the streets, and are so intolerable by their perpetual din, and their sudden and furious attacks, that it is an attempt never made without the greatest risk, to walk abroad at night, and without sufficient protection. This circumstance, which is frequently noticed by travellers in the east, may be illustrated by an incident described in a very lively manner by the French traveller Denon. It occurred on the day of his entry into Alexandria, when that city was stormed by the French in the late war, and having omitted to take with him some necessary articles of clothing, he had gone for that purpose to his ships, and was returning considerably later than he had anticipated to the city, which he found totally deserted; the stillness of midnight prevailing, and not a glimmer of light, but what was afforded by the stars and clear atmosphere of the climate. He had not proceeded far, when he was met by a troop of furious dogs, who attacked him from the streets, the doors, and the low roofs of the houses, with so much ferocity, as almost to deprive him of the power of self-defence. No sooner had he passed the territory of these, than he was received by a fresh band of assailants, till at length, molested and wearied almost to death, he thought of taking a circuitous route along the suburbs of the city, by which, after climbing over the walls, and wading a considerable depth into the river, he came, that when Jehu, in consideration of her quality, ordered some of his servants to go and bury her, they found nothing of her remaining but her skull, feet, and palms of her after the greatest fatigue, about midnight, to one of the French sentinels, convinced that dogs are one of the greatest pests of an oriental city. Chateaubriand, speaking of Galata, near Constantinople, says, that, "the almost total want of women, the want of wheel-carriages, and the multitude of dogs without masters, were the three distinguishing features of the city;" and Le Bruyn, describing another eastern city, says, "great numbers of dogs crowd the streets; they do not belong to any one, but either get their food as they can, or are supported by the charitable, who give money to bakers and butchers to feed them, and even leave legacies for that purpose." In ancient times, they seem to have been no less a nuisance than they are to the modern cities of the east: for we find the sacred writers making several allusions to the particulars now mentioned regarding the character and condition of dogs in terms so graphic, and so like what an observer of the present day might use, as to convey the impression that the ancient inhabitants of Palestine witnessed the same spectacles, and were subjected to the same molestations, as are found still to exist in all the towns and villages throughout the east. Thus, the Psalmist, (Ps. lix. 14, 15.) 'At evening they return and make a noise like a dog, and go round about the city; they wander up and down for meat, and grudge if they be not satisfied.' In the 22d psalm, in which he gives a prophetic description of the sufferings of Messiah, he uses these expressions: 'Dogs have compassed me; the assembly of the wicked have enclosed me;' aptly representing, under the image of a band of ferocious dogs attacking a defenceless passenger, the proceedings of the insolent and infuriated multitude, who insisted for the crucifixion of Jesus. To the same features in the character of eastern dogs, allusion is made in the following passage from Isaiah:—"The watchmen of Israel are blind; they are ignorant; they are all dumb dogs, they cannot bark, sleeping, lying down, loving to slumber: yea they are greedy dogs, which can never have enough." Under this figurative language the prophet described the indolence, unfitness, and rapacity of the prophets and teachers of his corrupt age; the application of his bold metaphors may easily be made by help of the statements already given, of the disposition and habits of the dog in eastern countries; but he has included one additional circumstance that remains to be noticed to complete the description of the oriental breed. He calls them 'dumb dogs; they cannot bark;' and this too is in exact accordance with what is found to be the case still; for travellers who have attended to this point, inform us, that the canine species degenerate so much in hot countries, that in a short time they lose their voice and cannot bark, so that they either make a hideous melancholy howl, or, as in some places, become altogether dumb. These animals, driven by hunger, greedily devour every thing that comes in their way; they glut themselves with the most putrid and loathsome substances that are thrown about the cities, and of nothing are they so fond as of human flesh: a repast, with which the barbarity of the despotic countries of Asia too frequently supplies them, as the bodies of criminals slain there for murder, treason, and violence, are seldom buried, and lie exposed till the mangled fragments are carried off by the dogs. Many travellers in the east mention their having met with such disgusting spectacles, and Bruce, in particular, describes the streets of Gondar, the capital of Abyssinia, as strewn with pieces of carcases, and the very courts of the governors polluted by such remains: while Sir Thomas Roe presents scenes of a still more revolting nature in Constantinople. With these circumstances in our knowledge, we cannot be surprised at those parts of the sacred history which describe the readiness of the dogs to lick up the blood of the much injured Naboth; or at the wretched fate of the royal accomplices in this murder; with one of whom, the atrocious Jezebel, the dogs had been so busy, that when the messenger came to bury her corpse, 'they found no more of her than the skull, and the feet, and the palms of her hands.' And we are enabled to judge also of the severity of the divine judgment upon the guilty and impenitent nations of old, when the Almighty threatened to visit them, among other terrible scourges, with multitudes of furious and ravenous dogs: 'I will appoint over them four kinds, saith the Lord; the sword to slay, and the dogs to tear, and the fowls of heaven, and the beasts of the earth to devour and destroy.' (Jer. xv. 3.) The unsocial hands: "so punctually was the prophet's prediction fulfilled concerning this wicked and idolatrous woman!

Having thus settled himself in a quiet possession of Jezreel, Jehu sent a letter to the nobles, and other great men, who were at Samaria, and had the care of the princes of the blood, to choose out whom they thought the fittest to sit upon the throne of Israel: but they being well aware with what intent he did this, and not unacquainted with the fate of the two kings, he had already dispatched, returned him a very submissive answer, wherein they declared themselves entirely at his devotion. This declaration he took the advantage of; so that, in his next message, he commanded them and disgusting propensities which the dog exhibits, together with the general state in which he lives as a wandering outcast, have made him be regarded, in all ages, by the people of the east, with the greatest aversion and contempt; and hence one of the strongest terms which they can ever employ towards one whom they hold in little or no estimation, is, to call him a dog. Various examples of this occur in the course of the sacred history. 'Am I a dog,' said the Philistine champion to David, 'Am I a dog, that thou comest to me with staves?' alluding to the defences with which people are obliged to furnish themselves against the attacks of these furious animals. 'After whom,' said David, wishing to express his own insignificance as an enemy of Saul, 'after whom is the king of Israel come out? After whom dost thou pursue? after a dead dog?' Mephibosheth, by way of expressing his own humility, and thereby magnifying the liberality of king David towards him, said 'What is thy servant that thou shouldst look upon such a dead dog as I am?' Abner, when accused of an odious crime, by his master Ishbosheth, made this indignant reply: 'Am I a dog's head, that thou chargest me to-day with a fault concerning this woman?' that is, am I the head, the foremost and most headstrong of a band of grovelling dogs, that thou treatest me so? Hazael, too, when informed by the sorrowing prophet of the dreadful cruelties he would perpetrate on the land of Israel, when he ascended the throne of Syria, the haughty soldier indignantly repelled them as an imputation on his honour. 'But, what, is thy servant a dog, that he should do this great thing?'—Jamieson's Eastern Manners.—Ed.

a Jezebel was the daughter of Ethbaal, king of Tyre; the wife of Ahab, and mother of Jehoram, kings of Israel; the mother-in-law of Jehoram king of Judah; and the aunt of Abaziah, who was likewise king of Judah.—Calmel's Commentary.

b The words in the original, which our translation has followed, are, 'Jehu wrote letters, and sent to Samaria, unto the rulers of Jezreel, to the elders, and to them that brought up Ahab's children, (2 Kings x. 1.) But then, the question is—How the rulers of Jezreel came to be at Samaria? Some have imagined indeed a mistake in the transcriber, and that, instead of Jezreel, the word should be Israel, which is no great variation: but why may we not suppose, that, upon hearing how Jehu had slain Jehoram, the great men of his court might take the children, and, for fear that they should fall into his hands, flee with them to Samaria, as the capital and strongest place in the kingdom, where they might think of defending themselves against his usurpation, and, as his letters seem to import, of filling, with one of Ahab's family, the vacant throne. It was customary for princes of the blood, in those days, to be brought up in the families of the prime nobility of the nation; and therefore, whatever persons of this quality had these princes under their care, and saw the revolution that was likely to happen, they might think it the most advisable way to hasten with them to Samaria, as a place of the most security: or, for this very reason, Jehoram, when he went against Ramoth Gilead, might have sent them thither, that they might be under cover from any ill accident that might possibly happen in his war with the king of Syria.—Patrick's Commentary and Poole's Annotations. [Instead of the words of the text (2 Kings x. 1.), as given in this note, Boothroyd translates, 'Jehu wrote letters, and sent to Samaria, unto the elders of the city,' which the whole context shows to be the true reading.]—Ed.

c Besides the accomplishment of the divine decree, Jehu had this farther design in requesting this cruel service of the rulers and elders, and great men of the nation, namely, that thereby he might engage them in the same crime and conspiracy with to send him the heads of all the princes, who ^a were no less than seventy; ^b and on this likewise being punctually obeyed, without any farther delay, he proceeded to extirpate every one that remained of Ahab's family, the great men of his court, and all his friends. For, in his way to Samaria, meeting with some nephews and other relations of Ahaziah, who, ^c knowing nothing of these transactions, were going to pay a visit to the court at himself. For, by prevailing with them to murder Ahab's kinsmen in this manner, he tied them to his interest so closely, that if any of the inferior people had been minded to oppose his designs, they were, by this means, deprived of any man of figure and distinction to head them; and not only so, but, by this expedient, Jehu thought likewise that he might, in a great measure, justify, at least lessen the odium of his own cruel and perfidious conduct; for this is the sense of his appeal to the people, 'Ye be righteous; behold I have conspired against my master, and slew him; but who slew all these?' (2 Kings x. 9). As if he had said, 'I own, indeed, that I was a great instrument in taking off the late king; but am I more culpable than are the friends, the counsellors, the officers of Ahab? I pretend not to conceal my fault; but the approbation which the principal men of the nation have given it, in taking up arms against the house of Ahab, and the wonderful success that has attended this enterprise of mine, are not these a certain proof that God has raised me up to execute his decree in this respect? And ought you not to acknowledge, in this case, the interposition of his hand?'—Cabnet's Commentary.

Samaria, he ordered these likewise, which in all amounted to the number of forty-two, to be slain; and so, to give a better face to what he did, taking ^d Jonadab the son of Rechab, a man of great strictness and sobriety of life, into the chariot with him, ^e he proceeded on his journey to Samaria.

^a The sacred historian takes care to repeat the number of these princes of the blood in two separate places, (2 Kings x. 1. and 6.) on purpose to show the vile spirit of these great men, who could destroy so many royal persons, to whom they were governors, and to whom they owed a just protection and defence; and therefore it was no more than they deserved, if, when Jehu 'slew all that remained of the house of Ahab, and all his great men, till he left none,' he included in that number, as some imagine, these base perfidious time-servers.—Patrick's Commentary.

^b It appears from the text that Jehu caused the heads of the king's sons to be piled up in two heaps at the gates of the palace. "Such barbarities, shocking as they are, are far from being uncommon in the east, and so gratifying a spectacle does a number of enemies' heads seem to afford to the savage princes of that quarter of the world, that there is scarcely any one country there, even the most advanced in civilization, where instances may not be found, of sovereigns and chiefs adorning the walls and avenues of their palaces with these bloody trophies. On passing one of the gates of the seraglio in Constantinople, which stood open, Carne saw lying a number of heads of the wretched Greeks, which the boys were tumbling about like footballs. A traveller, who was invited to the court of the dey of Algiers, says the first object that struck his eyes, were six bleeding heads, ranged along the entrance to the palace; and Sir John Malcolm informs us, that at the storming of Ispahan, where the slaughter was beyond all description, Timour ordered 70,000 heads to be piled up as a monument of his conquest. So fond are eastern conquerors of these sanguinary trophies, that prisoners have been known to be put to death in cold blood, in order that a greater number of heads might be dispatched from the seat of war to the victorious monarch, and so callous are the persons charged with the arrangement of them, that they often selected a head of peculiar appearance and long beard, to grace the summit of the pyramid. Brutal and savage, then, as it was, the conduct of Jehu has its parallel in the habits of so many other eastern princes, that it must be imputed, less to the barbarous temper and ferocity of the man, than the delight in blood and cruelty common to all uncivilized people."—Jamieson's Eastern Manners.—Ed.

^c Jehu must certainly have made wonderful expedition and secrecy in what he did, to have prevented the report, which generally spreads very fast, of what had passed at Jezreel. Two kings and a queen killed, the whole family of Ahab extinct, and a general change and revolution in the state; and yet not a word of this known at Jerusalem, which was not quite fourscore miles distant from Jezreel, even though Ahaziah the king of Judah, was one of the princes that were slain.—Cabnet's Commentary.

^d Several learned men are of opinion, that this Jonadab was not the person who gave the precepts mentioned in Jeremiah, (ch. xxxv.) to his children, but another of that name, who lived in the days of Jeremiah; for it is not likely, they think, that a man addicted to such a quiet and retired life as he instituted, would have come to meet Jehu; and therefore they rather imagine, that it was some military person of great note and esteem among the populace, whose interest might do Jehu great service, and whose advice in many things he afterwards followed. But why might not Jonadab, how well soever he might love retirement, come, upon this occasion, to congratulate Jehu's zeal against idolatry, and to advise and encourage him to proceed in fulfilling the will of God revealed to him? And the reason is obvious why Jehu might be glad of the countenance and company of such a man, whose known piety would gain him more reverence and respect, than the attendance of any great captain could procure him. But, though Jonadab the son of Rechab is allowed to be a good man, yet it does not therefore follow, that he revived the ancient rules of the Rechabites, as some are apt to think, upon a religious account, but purely as a matter of policy. The story is this: the Rechabites were of the race of Hobab, or Jethro the Kenite, priest of Midian, and father-in-law to Moses, (1 Chron. ii. 55.) so that the Kenites were Midianites, and the Midianites were dwellers in tents from the beginning; for in this manner Abraham lived while he sojourned in the land of Canaan; and, in imitation of him, the Midianites, who were of his posterity, might do the same. Now, when the children of Hobab, who were all Kenites, were invited by Moses to go along with the people of God into Canaan, they might retain this pastoral manner of life, not only as a badge of the nation from whence they were descended, but as a means likewise to make their habitation more quiet and secure, in a land where they were strangers, both from the envy of the Jews at home, and the danger of enemies abroad. For, having neither houses nor lands, but tents and cattle only, which they could move upon occasion from place to place, they could not be so subject to hostile invasions. But as, in length of time, these Kenites were tempted, by the more pleasant living of the Israelites, to think of changing this custom of their ancestors, this Jonadab the son of Rechab, a famous Kenite, and of much esteem and authority among them, took occasion to renew it again, and to bind his posterity to observe it; for which end he forbade the drinking of wine, lest the desire of so delicious a liquor might tempt them to plant vineyards, and build houses, as the Jews did. What authority he had to enforce these arbitrary injunctions, we cannot learn. It is plain, that he laid his posterity under no curse in case of disobedience; on the contrary, we find, that the prophet Jeremiah, (ch. xxxv. 2, &c.) was directed by God to bring them to an apartment in the temple, to set wine before them, and invite them to drink; which would have been an unworthy action, if they had been under an indispensable obligation of abstaining from it; and, on the other hand, the Rechabites refused it, not because their father laid them under any curse if they disobeyed him, but because he promised, that 'they should live many days in the land wherein they were strangers,' if they obeyed his voice (Jer. xxxv. 7.); which promise, being also made to those who 'honoured their parents,' (Exod. xx. 12.) might the more incline them to that strict obedience, for which they are so highly commended by God in the place above cited. Upon the whole, therefore, it appears, that Jonadab only renewed what his ancestors had observed long before he was born; and that his authority prevailed among his brethren to continue this abstinence for two hundred years after he was dead, not as a matter of religion, but as a mere civil custom.—Patrick's Commentary and Bedford's Scripture Chronology, b. 6. c. 2.

^e 2 Kings x. 15. 'And he gave him his hand.' In token of acknowledging a newly elected prince, it was not uncommon, or inconsistent with the reverence due to his character, to take him by the hand. D'Herbelot, (p. 204.) in explaining an eastern term, which he tells us signifies the election, or inauguration of a khalif, he informs us, that this ceremony consisted in stretch-

As soon as he was come to Samaria, he first destroyed all that were left of the house of Ahab in that city, and then, pretending that he designed to offer an uncommon sacrifice unto Baal, he issued out a proclamation, commanding all his priests, prophets, and worshippers, upon pain of death, to be present at this great solemnity. They all came, and when they, and they only, for care was taken, that none of the servants of the Lord should be among them, were met together in Baal's temple, and the ^a priests in their proper vestments, he commanded his guards to go in, and fall upon them, and kill them all. After this, they ran to the temple of Baal, broke down his image, and the ^b other images of the like nature, and burned them publicly. They demolished the temple quite, laid it flat with the ground; and, that the place whereon it stood might in all future ages be looked upon as despicable, they made it a ^c common jakes.

Thus entirely did Jehu destroy the family of Ahab, and the worship of Baal in the kingdom of Israel; for which he was so far approved and rewarded by God, that he entailed the crown upon his family to the fourth generation: but policy prevailed against religion, and persuaded him to continue the old idolatry, even when he had destroyed the new. The calves which Jeroboam had set up, he would not part with: and therefore God, to make him sensible of his displeasure, stirred up Hazael king of Syria to invade his country; who, having taken several of his frontier towns, did thereby open a ing forth a person's hand, and taking that of him that they acknowledged for khalif. This was a sort of performing homage, and swearing fealty to him.—Harmer, vol. iii. p. 330. This was also sometimes done as a token of friendship and fidelity. (Gal. ii. 9). With this view it was also practised by the Romans, as appears from Virgil: "My father Auchises frankly gives the youth his right hand, and lodifies his mind by that kindly pledge."—Ed.

^a It was the custom of almost all idolaters to be very curious about the external pomp of their ceremonies, wherein, indeed, the chief part of their worship does consist. All the priests of Baal were clothed in fine linen, and their chief priests, no doubt, had some particular ornaments to distinguish them. Baal and Astarte were Phœnician deities: and therefore, as Silius Italicus, in his description of the priests of Hercules, has given us an account in what manner the Phœnician priests, when in their office, were habited, we have reason from thence to suppose, that the dress of the priests of Baal was much of the same kind. "Nor while sacrificing it is their custom to wear variegated robes; their bodies are covered with white linen, and the head is ornamented with Pelusian cloth. It is the part of those wearing flowing garments to offer frankincense, and according to the usage of their forefathers, to assume the sacrificial robe of the high priests."²

^b These idolaters, besides the supreme God whom they took Baal to be, worshipped several other lesser gods, whom they call Baalim, and whose images were placed in this temple: for it was an ancient custom, as Servius notes, after the priest had invoked the particular god for whom the sacrifice was intended, to address himself to all the other gods, lest any of them should think themselves neglected.—Patrick's Commentary.

^c The histories of the east furnish us with several examples of princes inflicting this kind of punishment upon such as were found guilty of high treason, or of contravening the king's commands. To this the decree which Darius made in favour of the Jews plainly alludes: "whosoever shall alter this word, let timber be pulled down from his house, and, being set up, let him be hanged thereon; and let his house be made a dunghill" (Ezra vi. 11.) And, to the same purpose, is that threat of Nebuchadnezzar to the magicians, &c. "If ye will not make known unto me the dreams, with the interpretation thereof, ye shall be cut in pieces, and your houses shall be made a dunghill." Dan. ii. 5.

way to make great ravages in several other places of his kingdom, especially in the country beyond Jordan, where the tribes of Manasseh, Gad, and Reuben suffered much. In a word, we may say of Jehu, that, as his conduct was of a mixed nature, God rewarded his obedience, but punished his idolatry; who, after he had reigned eight and twenty years, died, and was buried in Samaria, and, without any opposition, was succeeded by his son Jehoahaz.

Jehoahaz, to preserve the crown of Israel from uniting with that of Judah, pursued the same method that his predecessors had done, in relation to the political worship of the golden calves; so that, during his whole reign, God sorely afflicted both him and his people, by delivering him into the hands of Hazael, and his son Benhadad, the third Syrian king of that name, who reduced him to that low ebb, that he had no more than 50 horsemen, 10 chariots, and 10,000 foot soldiers left. At length, through the many defeats he had received, and the grievous oppression under which he laboured, grown weary of life as well as government, after a very troublesome reign of seventeen years, he died, and was succeeded by his son Joash, a prince more fortunate, and not altogether so irreligious as his father. But, to inquire a little now into the affairs of the kingdom of Judah.

When Athaliah, the daughter of Ahab, and wife to Jehoram king of Judah, understood that Jehu had slain her son Ahaziah, being a very ambitious, bloody-minded woman, and resolving to take the government upon herself, ^d she destroyed all the children that Jehoram had by another wife, and all their offspring, that so she might ascend the throne without any opposition. Jehoshaba, the sister of Ahaziah by the father's side, but not by the mother's, was, at this time, married to Jehoiada, the high priest; and while Athaliah's executioners were murdering the rest, she stole away ^e Joash, the son of ^d The consideration of the fate that attended these royal families, is enough to make any one bless providence for having been born of a meaner parentage. The whole offspring of Jeroboam, Baasha, and Ahab, kings of Israel, was cut off for their idolatry, so that there was not one left; and the kings of Judah, having contracted an affinity with the house of Ahab, and being by them seduced into the same crime, were so destroyed by three successive massacres, that there was but one left. For, first, Jehoram slew all his brethren; then Jehu slew all his brother's children; and now Athaliah destroys all the rest that her executioners could meet with. Enraged she was to see Ahab's family cut off; and therefore she resolved to do as much by the house of David. As she was one of Ahab's family, she had reason to apprehend that Jehu, who had a commission to extirpate all, would not be long before he called upon her: her only way therefore, to secure herself against him, was to usurp the throne; but this, she knew, she could not do without destroying all the royal progeny, who were no well-wishers to the worship of Baal, which she had abetted, and was resolved to maintain.—Poole's Annotations, Patrick's Commentary, and Bedford's Scripture Chronology, b. 6. c. 2.

^e Some interpreters are of opinion, that Joash was not the real son of Ahaziah, in whom the race of Solomon, in a direct line, was extinct, but properly the son of Nathan, and only called Ahaziah's, because he succeeded him in the throne: for had he been Ahaziah's true son, and Athaliah's grandson, why might not she have declared him king, and during his minority at least, taken the administration into her own hands? But therefore she exercised her cruelty, as they say, in destroying the princes related to Ahaziah, because she was unwilling to have the kingdom go into another branch of David's family. But notwithstanding these reasons, and the authority of those who produce

Ahaziah, and kept him, and his nurse concealed a in an apartment b of the temple, c for the space of six years.

In the seventh year, his uncle Jehoiada, being determined to place him upon the throne of his ancestors, and to this purpose having engaged the priests and Levites, and the leading men in all the parts of the kingdom, in his interest, in a public assembly produced him, and made them take an oath of secrecy and fidelity to him. Then putting himself in a proper posture of defence, d he distributed the arms which David had reposed in the temple, among his people, whom he divided into three bodies, one to guard the person of the king, and the other two to secure the gates of the temple, that none might be permitted to enter, except the priests and Levites, who were to officiate, upon pain of death. After this he brought out the young prince, set the crown on his head, e put the book of the law into his

them, in the second books both of Kings and Chronicles, we find this Joash so frequently called the son of Ahaziah, the king's son, &c., without any manner of restriction, that we cannot be persuaded to look out for any other father for him.

a Josephus relates this young king's escape and concealment thus:—"Jehoshabath, the sister of Ahaziah, and wife to Jehoiada the high priest, coming into the palace, found a male child, of about a year old, whose name was Joash, among the dead bodies of the sons of Ahaziah, whom the nurse, it seems, had there laid on purpose to save its life; she therefore conveyed it away to her own lodgings, and thence to the temple, where she took care of it, through the whole six years of Athaliah's reign, without making any one privy to the secret, except her own husband:" who, upon this extraordinary occasion, might dispense with the law, or rather custom, which allowed none but the priests who officiated, to lodge in the apartments of the temple.—Jewish Antiq. b. 9, c. 7. and Calmet's Commentary.

b In the text, 2 Kings xi. 2, it is called a 'bed-chamber.' A bed-chamber does not, according to the usage of the east, mean a lodging room, but a repository for beds. Chardin says, "In the east, beds are not raised from the ground with posts, a canopy, and curtains; people lie on the ground. In the evening they spread out a mattress or two of cotton, very light, of which they have several in great houses, against they should have occasion, and a room on purpose for them." From hence, it appears that it was in a chamber of beds that Joash was concealed.—Harmer, vol. ii. p. 489.—Ed.

c It is very likely, that Athaliah might imagine that she had slain all, and so think herself secure; or if she suspected that this one was preserved, she might not think it advisable to make any strict search, lest thereby she should alarm the people with the notion, that there was still a son of David's family left, which might be a means to make them uneasy under her government, and desirous of a change; besides that she might have the vanity to think of being able, in a short time, to secure the crown to herself, in such a manner as that she should not need to fear such a weak competitor.—Poole's Annotations.

d The captains and other officers, who were admitted to the knowledge of Jehoiada's design, came into the temple unarmed, for fear of giving suspicion; but as David had erected a kind of sacred armoury in one of the apartments of the temple, wherein the weapons, and other trophies which he, and several other generals, had gained from their enemies, and as monuments of their victories, had dedicated them to the Lord, were deposited, Jehoiada took care, upon this occasion, to have this magazine of military provisions opened, so that there was no want of any sort of arms.—Joseph Antiq. b. 9, c. 7.

e Those who think that the word Eduth, which we translate testimony, comes from the Hebrew root Adah, which signifies to clothe, put on, or adorn, suppose that it was some royal ornament, which the high priest put upon the king, as a mark of regal dignity, at the same time that he placed the crown upon his head; and this ornament they conceive to have been a bracelet, because in the story of the Amalekite, we read, that he brought to David the bracelet that was upon Saul's arm, as well as the crown that was upon his head. But since, in the 17th chapter of Deuteronomy, which treats expressly of the election and duty hand, and because his right had been interrupted, anointed him, and with the sound of the trumpet proclaimed him, which was seconded with the joyful shouts and acclamations of the people.

Athaliah, hearing the noise, made all the haste she could to the temple; but when, to her great surprise, she saw the young king on a throne, which was erected f in an eminent place, g and the people and great men about him rejoicing, she rent her clothes, and cried out, 'Treason! But Jehoiada soon silenced her: for having commanded the guards to seize and carry her out of the temple, and to put all to the sword who should pretend to rescue or assist her, they immediately executed their orders; and taking her out of the sacred ground, brought her, without any opposition, to the stable-gate belonging to the palace, and there slew her.

Joash, being thus seated on the throne, by the high priest's directions, made a covenant with the people, that they should restore the true worship of God, continue in it, and root out all idolatry; and then he made another between himself and the people, viz., that he should govern according to law, and that they should be mindful to obey him. When this was done, the multitude rose, destroyed the temple, demolished the altar, broke down the images, and killed Matan, the priest of Baal, who was then in waiting. After this, Jehoiada abolished some corruptions, which former reigns had introduced, made some reforms in the service of the

of a king, there is this injunction given—"That he should write him a copy of the law in a book, out of that which is before the priests, the Levites," ver. 18—others, with more probability, have thought, that, at his coronation, a roll, containing a copy of the law, which is frequently called a testimony, as being a witness of God's will and men's duty, was put in his hands, which he held for that time, in the way of a sceptre or a truncheon; though others will have it, that when Jehoiada crowned Joash, he laid the book of the law upon his head, to which custom holy Job (ch. xxxi. 35, 36.) as they think, seems to allude, when he wishes, 'O that mine adversary had written a book! Surely I would take it upon my shoulder, and bind it as a crown to me?' For the manner among the orientals, when they had received a letter from any person they highly respected, was to hold it up to their heads, before they opened it.—Patrick's and Calmet's Commentaries, and Poole's Annotations.

f The words in the text are, 'And when she looked, behold the king stood by a pillar, as the manner was.' (2 Kings xi. 14.) Now there were two famous pillars, which Solomon erected in the porch of the temple, whereof that on the right hand was called Jachin, and that on the left Boaz, and were each of them, according to the account we have, eighteen cubits high, (1 Kings vii. 15, 21.) Solomon's design in setting up these two pillars, is generally supposed to have been, in order to represent the pillar of the cloud, and the pillar of fire, which went before the Israelites, and conducted them in the wilderness. The pillar on the right hand represented the pillar of the cloud, and that on the left the pillar of fire; and near one of these pillars, in all probability, the royal throne was erected; unless we can suppose, that what is here called a pillar, was that brazen scaffold, five cubits long, five broad, and five high, which Solomon made at first, upon his dedicating the temple, but was afterwards continued for the king, upon any solemn occasion, to appear upon, and where doubtless there was a throne of state.—Calmet's Commentary and Bedford's Scripture Chronology, b. 6. c. 2.

g From various testimonies it appears, that a seat erected near a pillar or column, was particularly honourable and distinguishing. Homer furnishes an instance of this kind. Speaking of Ulysses, he says—

The monarch by a column high enthron'd
His eye withdrew, and fixed on the ground.

The same custom is also twice mentioned in Odyssey, b. viii. See also Kings xxiii. 3.—Ed.

temple, and then, with all the rulers, and officers, and people, conducted the king to the royal palace, and put him into a quiet possession of the kingdom of Judah.

Seven years old was Joash when he began to reign, which was in the seventh year of Jehu king of Israel; and, while he was under his uncle Jehoiada's guidance and direction, he governed the nation very well; but when once that good old counsellor died, (who in the 130th year of his age paid the last debt to nature, and in consideration of his many great services done the public, had the honour to be buried in one of the royal sepulchres,) he fell into the hands of such persons as were idolaters in their hearts, and they, taking the advantage of his youth, ^b by their crafty management and insinuations, first obtained a license for themselves to worship such idols as they should think fit, and then proceeded to delude him into the like apostasy.

In the beginning of his reign, he was very solicitous about the house of God, wherein he had so long, and so happily been concealed; and, as it was greatly gone to decay, through the negligence of former princes, and the depredation of Athaliah's children, he took no small pains to settle revenues, and procure contributions for its reparation. ^c But now, by his connivance at least, if not ^a This the historian takes notice of, as a life remarkably long in those days; and yet our learned Usher has observed, that in an age not far remote from our time, several men outlived this period. The words of Joseph Scaliger, which he quotes, are to this effect,—“Several persons we could mention, that have lived 120, 125, and 130 years, whom we knew, have seen, and well remember: but, in the year 1584, there was at Paris a miracle of an old man, who bore arms under Louis XI. and at the age of 140 years and upwards, had the use of his limbs and faculties entire.” But not a greater miracle was he, than our Thomas Parr, the son of John Parr of Wymington, in the county of Salop, who abode with his father as long as he lived, but after his decease, married his first wife at the age of eighty. With her he lived for the space of two and thirty years, in which time, being convicted of adultery with another woman, he did public penance in the church of Alderbury, when he was 105. In his 122d year, he married his second wife, who abode with him as long as he lived; but at length he was brought up to London by the earl of Arundel and Surrey, in the year 1635, and shown to the king of Great Britain, when he was some months more than 152 years old. Two years after this he died in Arundel house, and might probably have lived some years longer had he continued in his native air.—Chronologia Sacra, c. 12.

^b The Jews have a fancy, that the courtiers, who after the death of Jehoiada got possession of Joash, flattered him with a conceit, that he himself was worthy of divine honours, who had been brought up in the house of God, a favour that was never granted to a mere man, and that the king's being pleased with this kind of flattery, provoked God to send upon him the calamities we afterwards read of; even as the angel of God smote Herod, for assuming the glory to himself, when the people, in commendation of his oration, said, ‘That it was the voice of a god, and not of a man.’ (Acts xii. 22.) But this is mere fancy. If the princes of Judah wanted to obtain a toleration from the king for their idol worship, it would have been highly absurd for them to go about to persuade him that himself was a god, since they that have the folly to establish their own adoration are always very jealous of the worship of any other. Their making obsequence therefore to the king, denotes the humble posture wherein they represented their petition, that they might not be confined to unnecessary and troublesome journeys, in coming to Jerusalem to worship, but be indulged the liberty, which their forefathers had, of worshipping God in high places; which, when they had once obtained, they knew they might then worship idols, without observation or disturbance.—Patrick's and Calnet's Commentaries, and Poole's Annotations.

^c Jehoiada, the high priest, is supposed to die in or near the three and twentieth year of king Joash's reign, so that Joash might be about thirty years old when the princes of Judah seduced him to idolatry: and this makes it the more wonderful what possibly could give occasion to such a shameful change, in so advanced an age, unless we can suppose that the conduct of the priests in embezzling the money collected for the reparation of the temple, whereof he complains to Jehoiada, (2 Kings xii. 7.), might curdle his temper, and give him some disgust.—Le Clerc's Commentary, and Howell's History in the notes.

was not all; for no sooner was the Syrian army departed, but the distemper, or rather that complication of distempers, wherewith, some time before, God had afflicted Joash, grew worse and worse; so that being confined to his bed, two of his own servants, Zabad and Jehozabad, conspired against him, and ^a slew him; who, after a reign of forty years, was succeeded by his son Amaziah, and buried in the city of David, but ^b not in the royal sepulchres.

Amaziah was five and twenty years old when he began to reign, and for some time behaved tolerably well, though he followed the example of his ancestors in letting the high places stand, and in suffering the people to offer sacrifice and burn incense there. ^c As soon as he found himself settled in the throne, he very justly took revenge of the two traitors that had murdered his father: but ^d their children he did not touch, because it was contrary to the law that ¹ children should be put to death for their fathers. About four and fifty years before his accession, the Edomites had revolted, in the reign of Jehoram, from the kingdom of Judah; and therefore, having a design to reduce them to their former subjection, he new-modelled and new-officered his army, and upon a general muster found them to be no less than ^e 300,000 fighting men: but, thinking these too few for his intended expedition, he hired of the king of Israel 100,000 more, for whom he ^f paid him 100

^a These two murderers, (mongrel fellows, whose fathers were Jews, but their mothers aliens,) perhaps were of his bedchamber; and, having constant access to the king, might more easily accomplish their design; however, he was so weak and feeble that he could make no resistance, and had fallen into that contempt and disesteem, that his guards minded not what became of him.—Patrick's Commentary.

^b Though the people could not punish wicked kings for their impieties while they lived, yet they fixed an odium upon their memory when they were dead; whereby they both preserved the sacredness of their supreme power, (as Grotius, On the Law of War and Peace, b. i. c. 3. sect. 16. speaks,) and kept kings in some measure under awe for fear of what might befall them after their decease.—Patrick's Commentary.

^c It seems that these two assassins continued to be men of weight and interest at court, even after they had murdered their king; for his son, we may observe from 2 Kings xiv. 8. retained them in his service for some time, nor durst he venture to execute justice upon them, until he was well settled in his authority, and had divested those of all power who were their friends and abettors.—Patrick's Commentary.

^d In this he acted like a good man, and contrary to the wicked customs of many kingdoms, where, if any one be guilty of high treason, not only he, but his children likewise, who are neither conscious nor partakers of any of his traitorous practices, are equally devoted to destruction, lest they, forsooth, should form any faction against the prince, or seek revenge for their father's death.—Le Clerc's Commentary.

^e Hence some have made an observation, how much the iniquities of the people of Judah had diminished their numbers since the days of Jehoshaphat, which was a space of but eighty-two years: for this king could bring no more than 300,000 men into the field; whereas Jehoshaphat brought almost four times as many.—Patrick's Commentary.

^f If these be reckoned for talents of silver, as they generally are, each talent, at 125 pounds weight, and each pound weight at £4 in value, the whole will amount to £50,000 sterling, which will be but ten shillings to each man, officers included. Very low pay! unless we suppose, that this whole sum was given to the king of Israel for the loan of so many men, and that the men were to have their pay besides; or rather, that they were to have no other pay but the booty which they took from the enemy: and that this was the true reason why they were so exasperated at their dismissal, as to fall upon talents; but, ^g by the direction of a prophet whom God sent to him on purpose to dissuade him from employing these auxiliaries, they were, with much ado, discharged, and himself went in person against the Edomites with none but his own men, the people of Judah. However, being thus shamefully dismissed, as they thought, they were not a little exasperated against Amaziah; and therefore, in their return home, they plundered all the towns in their way, killed no less than 3000 men, and carried away a considerable booty, to make an amends for the plunder they had promised themselves in the Edomitish war.

Amaziah, as we said, with none but his own forces, marched against the Edomites. In the ^h valley of salt he gave them battle, slew 10,000 upon the spot, and took 10,000 prisoners. From thence he marched to Selah, ⁱ the metropolis of Arabia Petraea, of which he soon became master, and from the top of the rock whereon the town stood, ^j threw the ten thousand he had taken prisoners headlong, so that they were all dashed to pieces.^k

the cities of Judah, from Samaria even unto Beth-horon, (2 Chron. xxv. 13.) They went very probably first to Samaria, where they complained to their own king of the bad treatment they had received from Amaziah, and desired some reparation to be made them for the affront put upon them, and the loss of the profit which they might have made in the war; but, finding him not inclinable to make them satisfaction, they immediately fell foul upon the territories of Judah, and, from Samaria, for that is the place of their setting out, even to Beth-horon, a town not far distant from Jerusalem, ravaged the country, and did the mischief here mentioned; which they might more easily do, because the war with Edom had drained the country of all the forces that should have opposed them.—Patrick's and Calnet's Commentaries on 2 Chron. xxv. 6. 13.

^g The Jews will needs have it, that this prophet was Amos, the father of Isaiah; but their tradition is built upon a mistake, namely, that Amos the prophet was Isaiah's father.

^h This valley lay towards the land of Edom, and was so called, either from the salt springs which were therein, or from the salt that was dug up there.—Patrick's Commentary on 2 Sam. viii. 13.

ⁱ Selah, in the Hebrew tongue, signifies a rock, and so exactly answers to the Greek word petra, that most commentators, with very good reason, have agreed, that this Selah is the same with Petra, the metropolis of Arabia Petraea, and from whence, as some imagine, the whole country took its name; though others think, that, as this city had its situation on a rock, so the adjacent tract was called Arabia Petraea from its being overspread with such rocks, or rocky hills.—Wells' Geography of the Old Testament, vol. iii.

^j That this was an ancient punishment among the Romans, we may learn from Livy, Plutarch, and several others; as Mr Selden (de Synedrâis, b. 1.) observes, that it was in use among other nations; but we do not find it commonly practised among the Jews. It is not in the catalogue of the punishments which Moses enacts; neither was it ever inflicted by any regular judicature; and therefore one would think that the Edomites, either by some such like cruelty to the people of Judah, had provoked them to make a retaliation in this manner, or that they were, in their very disposition, so apt to revolt, that there could be no keeping them in subjection, without some such sad exemplary punishment as this.—Cabnet's Dissert. on Punishments, and Le Clerc's Commentary on 2 Chron. xxv. 12.

^k 2 Chron. xxv. 12. This mode of punishment was practised by the Greeks and Romans, as well as the Jews. In Greece, according to the Delphian law, such as were guilty of sacrilege were led to a rock, and cast down headlong. (Ælian, Var. Hist. b. xi. c. 5.) The Romans also inflicted it on various malefactors, by casting them down from the Tarpeian rock. (Livy Hist. b. vi. c. 20.) Mr Pitts, in his account of the Mahometans, (p. 10.) informs us, that in Turkey, at a place called Constantine, a town situate at the top of a great rock, the usual way of executing great criminals is by pushing them off the cliff. This

But his cruelty to the captives was not the worse thing he was guilty of in this expedition. In his return, he ^a brought with him the idols of Edom, to which he paid adoration, and offered incense; which thing provoked the Lord so, that he sent a prophet to reprove him for his apostasy, and to threaten him with the destruction which in a short time came to pass. For, being now elated with his success against the Moabites, and resenting the affront which the Israelitish army had lately put upon him, he ^b sent Joash king of Israel a challenge to meet and engage him in a pitched battle.

Joash, as it deserved, ^c received the message with contempt: but when he found that Amaziah was hereby but the more irritated, and persisted in his purpose of fighting, he met him, and gave him such a reception, that he routed his army, took him prisoner, and carried him ^d to his own city of Jerusalem; where he entered in is also mentioned as a capital punishment by Tacitus, (Annals, b. ii. c. 39.)—ED.

^a Idolatry, at the best, can no ways be apologized for; but no reason can be invented, why any person should make the objects of his adoration such gods as could 'not deliver their own people out of their enemies' hands,' as the prophet very justly reproves Amaziah, (2 Chron. xxv. 15.), unless we suppose that the images of these gods were so very beautiful, that he perfectly fell in love with them, or that he worshipped them for fear they should owe him a spite, and do him some mischief, in revenge for what he had done against the Edomites. How much more wise were the sentiments of Fabricius Maximus, upon the like occasion, who, having conquered Tarentum, and being asked, what should be done with their gods? bid them leave them with the Tarentines, "for what madness is it," as he adds, "to hope for any safety from those who cannot preserve themselves?"—Patrick's Commentary.

^b Josephus, in his account of this transaction, tells us that Amaziah wrote an imperious letter to the king of Israel, "commanding him and his people to pay the same allegiance to him that they had formerly paid to his ancestors David and Solomon; or, in case of their refusal, to expect a decision of the matter by the sword." Others think that he intended no war by this message, but only a trial of military skill and prowess, or a civil kind of interview between his men and those of Israel; for had he purposed to act in a hostile manner, he would have assaulted them on a sudden, and not given them this warning to stand upon their defence. The words of the message are, 'Come let us look one another in the face,' (2 Kings xiv. 8.) Much of the same kind with what Abner said to Joab, 'Let the young men now arise, and play before us,' (2 Sam. ii. 14.) But how polite soever the expressions may be, in both cases, they had in them the formality of a challenge, as both the king and general, who were not unacquainted with military language, did certainly understand them. So that the truth of the matter seems to be this:—Amaziah being encouraged by his late victory, determined to be revenged for the slaughter of his ancestors, by Jehu, (2 Kings ix.) and for the late spoil which the Israelites had made in his country; and thereupon resolving to have satisfaction, but in a fair and honourable way, he sent them this open declaration of war, but conceived in as mild terms as any thing of that harsh nature could be.—Calnet's and Patrick's Commentaries.

^c It was a custom among the oriental people to deliver their sentiments in parables, in which they made a great part of their wisdom to consist: and considering the circumstances of the person he addressed to, who was a petty prince, flushed with a little good success, and thereupon impatient to enlarge his kingdom, no similitude could be better adapted than that of a thistle, a low contemptible shrub, but upon its having drawn blood of some traveller, growing proud, and affecting an equality with the cedar, a tall stately tree that is the pride and ornament of the wood, till in the midst of all its arrogance and presumption, it is unhappily trodden down by the beasts of the forests, (2 Kings xiv. 9.) which Joash intimates would be Amaziah's fate, if he continued to provoke a prince of his superior power and strength.—Le Clerc's, Calnet's, and Patrick's Commentaries.

^d Josephus relates the defeat and captivity of Amaziah after triumph, plundered the temple and palace of all that was valuable, laid a tax upon the land, carried off hostages ^e for the security of the payment; and that, in case of any failure in this respect, the city might lie open to his invasions, he broke down all the fortifications of the wall, from the gate of Ephraim to the corner gate, about 400 cubits in length, and so ^f returned to Samaria.

After this shameful defeat, Amaziah lived above fifteen years; but we read of nothing remarkable concerning him, save that, persisting still in his idolatry, he continued under God's displeasure, and at length fell under the contempt of his subjects; insomuch that some of ^g the inhabitants of Jerusalem formed a conspiracy against his life, which he, having some intelligence of, endeavoured to escape by flying to Lachish, a town on the frontiers of the Philistines; but all in vain: for the conspirators sent after him, and had him there privately murdered; which, when his friends understood, they brought his corpse, without any state or formality, to Jerusalem, where he was buried among his ancestors, and, after a reign of nine and twenty years, was succeeded by his son Azariah, who, in the book of Chronicles, is called Uzziah. But to turn our thoughts now to the kingdom of Israel.

In the beginning of the reign of Jehoash, king of Israel, which was in the ^h thirty-seventh year of Joash, this manner:—"No sooner were his men advanced within sight of the enemy, but they were instantly struck with such a panic terror, and consternation, that they turned their backs, without striking a blow; and flying several ways, left Amaziah prisoner in the hands of his enemies, who refused to give him quarter upon any other terms than that the citizens of Jerusalem should set open their gates, and receive him and his victorious army into the town; which, between the pinch of necessity and the love of life, they were prevailed upon to do: so that Joash entered the town in his triumphal chariot, through a breach of 300 cubits of the wall, that he had caused to be made, with his prisoner Amaziah marching before him.—Jewish Antiquities, b. 9. c. 10.

^e These hostages were, in all probability, the great men's sons of the city, whom Joash took along with them, as a security that the kingdom of Judah should give him no farther molestation.

^f He never intended to make a thorough conquest of the kingdom of Judah, nor did he leave a garrison in Jerusalem; but contenting himself with what spoil he could get, he made all convenient haste home, because he had work enough at this time upon his hands, to defend his territories against the daily invasions of the Syrians.—Patrick's Commentary.

^g What provoked the people of Jerusalem more than any other part of the nation, against their king, was, their seeing their city spoiled of its best ornaments, exposed to reproach, upon account of the great breach that was made in their wall, and several of their children carried away as hostages for their good behaviour; all which they imputed to their king's mal-administration. Whereupon they entered into a conspiracy against him, which makes some commentators say, that he lived in a state of exile at Lachish, the space of twelve years, not daring to continue long in Jerusalem after the defeat which Joash had given him. But our learned Usher has placed this conspiracy in the last year of Amaziah's reign, as Jacobus Capellus, in his Sacred and Foreign History, supposes that it was set on foot by the great men of Jerusalem, upon the specious pretence of being guardians to the young prince, and taking better care of him than his father was likely to do.—Patrick's and Calnet's Commentaries.

^h The synarchies, or joint reigns of father and son, in these times have rendered the chronology a little difficult, as it is in this case: for in 2 Kings xiii. 1. it is said, that Jehoahaz, king of Israel began to reign in the twenty-third year of Joash king of Judah, and reigned seventeen years; from whence it follows, that Jehoash began to reign, not in the thirty-seventh, but in the thirty-ninth or fortieth year of Joash king of Judah: but by this it only appears, that he reigned three of these years in conjunction with his father.—Howell's History in the notes and Patrick's Commentary.

king of Judah, the prophet Elisha fell sick of a disease, whereof he died. The king of Israel, upon this occasion, came to visit him; and having much ^a lamented the loss which all Israel would have by his death, he received his blessing, and dying counsel to wage war against the Syrians with all courage and bravery; giving him assurance, and, ^b by the emblem of a bow and arrows, making him sensible of the several victories which God had decreed that he should obtain.

This was the last prediction of Elisha that we read of, for soon after this he died; but it was not the last miracle that we find he did: for, some time after his interment, a company of Israelites, as they were going to bury a dead person, perceiving a band of Moabites ^c making towards them, ^d put the corpse for haste into

^a His words are, 'My father! my father! the chariot of Israel, and the horsemen thereof,' (2 Kings xiii. 14.) which are the very same that Elisha used concerning his master Elijah, when he was taken up into heaven, (2 Kings ii. 12.) signifying the great authority he had maintained among them, included in the word 'father,' and the many glorious victories which he had obtained for them, by the efficacy of his counsels and prayers.—Patrick's Commentary.

^b This was a symbolical action, whereby the prophet intended to represent the victories, which he had promised the king of Israel against the Syrians more fully and plainly to him. His shooting the first arrow eastward, or to that part of the country which the Syrians had taken from his ancestors, was a declaration of war against them for so doing; and his striking the other arrows against the ground, was an indication how many victories he was to obtain: but his stopping his hand too soon, denoted the imperfection of his conquests, which did not please the prophet so well, and for what reason we shall see in the course of the objections.—Le Clerc's Commentaries. ["It was an ancient custom to shoot an arrow or cast a spear into the country which an army intended to invade. Justin says that, as soon as Alexander the Great had arrived on the coasts of Ionia, he threw a dart into the country of the Persians. 'When they had reached the continent, Alexander first threw a javelin as if upon a hostile land.' (Just. b. ii.) The dart, spear, or arrow thrown, was an emblem of the commencement of hostilities. Virgil (Æn. ix. 51.) represents Turnus as giving the signal of attack by throwing a spear:—

'Who first?' he cried, "with me the foe will dare?"
Then hurled a dart, the signal of the war.

Pitt.

Servius, in his note upon this place, shows that it was a custom to proclaim war in this way: the pater patrius, or chief of the families, a sort of heralds, went to the confines of the enemy's country, and, after some solemnities, said with a loud voice, 'I wage war with you, for such and such reasons:' and then threw in a spear. It was then the business of the parties thus defied or warned to take the subject into consideration; and if they did not, within thirty days, come to some accommodation, the war was begun.—Dr A. Clarke's Commentary.—Ed.

^c These Moabites were not such a gang of robbers as sometimes infest our roads, but a regular body of men, well appointed, and under proper officers, to the number of a small army, who made incursions into the territories of Judah and Israel, generally at the beginning of the year, which is the season proper for armies to take the field; and therefore some have observed that the month Nisan, which, with the Jews, is the first in their year, had its name from Nisim, which signifies the 'engines of war,' which were usually set up in that month; in like manner as the month, which we call March, and, in part, answers to the Jewish Nisan, had its name among the Romans from Mars, their god of war; because most nations, at that time, began their military expeditions.—Patrick's and Calnet's Commentaries.

^d The common places of burying among the Hebrews, were in the fields, in caverns dug into a rock, with niches for the corpses to be placed in, and, at the entrance of the sepulchre, there was a hewn stone, which might be removed or replaced without any damage to the tomb. The Jews, as Josephus informs us, gave Elisha a pompous and honourable interment, answerable to the dignity and merit of so great a prophet; but he does not tell us

Elisha's tomb, which, as soon as it had touched his body, ^e immediately revived, so that the man stood upon his feet, and went home, no doubt, with the company. This miracle, which was a divine confirmation of the truth of all Elisha's prophecies, could not fail of being a powerful means to encourage Jehoash in his engaging in war with the Syrians. Nor was his success less than the prediction; for, ^f in three pitched battles he vanquished Benhadad, (his father Hazael being then dead,) recovered all the cities that had been taken from his father Jehoahaz, and reunited them to the kingdom of Israel. After this he lived quiet from all enemies, until Amaziah king of Judah gave him the small disturbance we have spoken of: but, after the victory which he gained over him, we hear no more of his appearing in the field, and may therefore conclude that, after a reign of sixteen years, he died in peace, and was succeeded in his throne by his son Jeroboam.

In the fifteenth year of Amaziah king of Judah, this Jeroboam, the second of that name, began to reign over Israel, and by ^g the encouragement which the prophet where the place of his sepulture was. Hereon some have imagined, that he was carried to Abelmeholah, the place of his nativity, to be there interred among his ancestors: others think that he was at first buried on Mount Carmel, a favourite place of his, and afterwards removed to Samaria: others again say, that he was buried at Nineveh: and, to this very day, the inhabitants show his monument at Mosul, which was built, as they say, upon the very same spot where old Nineveh stood. But the most prevailing opinion, founded upon a constant tradition, is, that he was buried somewhere in the neighbourhood of Samaria, because there, in all appearance, he died. The tomb, however, that is usually shown for his in that city, can be nothing more than the repository of his remains, since his original burying-place was certainly at some distance from it.—Jewish Antiq. b. ix. c. 9.

^e Josephus, in his account of this transaction, varies a little from the sacred history: for "it happened, after Elisha's burial," says he, "that a traveller was killed upon the way by some thieves, and his body thrown into Elisha's monument, which, upon the bare touch of the prophet's corpse, instantly revived." The Jewish doctors, who love to improve upon every miracle, tell us that this person, whom they pretend to call Sellum, after he was revived, did presently die again, because he was a wicked man, and did not deserve to live long; never considering, that his hasty death afterwards was the ready way to impair the credit of the miracle, and make it indeed of no effect. However this may be, it is certain, that by this miracle, as we find it related in Scripture, God did the highest honour to his prophet, and confirmed the truth of what he had promised to the king of Israel, as well as the certainty of a future life; in which sense some part of the character, which the author of Ecclesiastics, (chap. xlviii. 12.) gives him, may not improperly be understood: 'Elisha was filled with Elijah's spirit; whilst he was not moved with the presence of any prince, neither could any bring him into subjection: no word could overcome him; and after his death his body prophesied: he did wonders in his life, and at his death were his works marvellous.'—Jewish Antiq. b. ix. c. 9. and Calnet's Commentary.

^f We have no particulars of the war between Jehoash and the Syrians, nor can we tell where these three battles were fought; but the success of them was so great, that the king of Israel not only retook all the places that had been lost in his own dominions, but repulsed the enemy into their own country, and there obtained a signal victory over them.—Patrick's Commentary.

^g The only mention we have of this prophet, whom the Jews will have to be the son of the widow of Zarephtha, whom Elijah raised from the dead, but without any foundation of reason, is in this passage, and the account of his famous mission to Nineveh. What the prophecies were, whereby he encouraged Jeroboam to proclaim war against the king of Syria, we have no where recorded; but as we have not every thing which the prophets did write, so several prophets, we must know, did not commit their predictions to writing. From this place, however, [we may observe

Jonah gave him, proved successful in many military achievements. He recovered a large territory, which several kings had taken from his predecessors, even all the country from Libanus on the north, to the Lake Asphaltites, on the south; but especially on the east of Jordan, whereby he enlarged those conquests which his father Joash had made: and whereas Hamath and Damascus had, in the days of David and Solomon, been tributaries to the kings of Judah, but had now revolted from Israel, he conquered them again, and ^a made them pay homage to him, as they had formerly done to his predecessors. So that, after a long reign of ^b one and forty years, wherein his arms were all along successful, he ^c died in much honour and renown, and was buried with his ancestors; but whether it was through wars abroad, or through discord and dissension at home, he left the government in such confusion, that after his decease, there was an interregnum for the space of two and twenty years.

During the time of this interregnum, Jonah, ^d the son of Amittai, who had prophesied before, in the time of Jeroboam, was now sent upon another errand. His commission was expressly to Nineveh, whither he was to go, and to exhort the inhabitants to repentance, because the 'cry of their sins had reached heaven.' But instead of obeying the divine command, the sacred history informs us that he bent his course another way, and intending to retire to Tarsus, a city in Cilicia, embarked at Joppa, ^e a seaport on the Mediterranean; that as soon as he had well got to sea, an unaccountable storm arose which gave the mariners a suspicion, that some great malefactor was got on board, upon whose account the heavens seemed so very angry; ^f that therefore calling all the people together, they made them cast lots, in order to know who this guilty person was; that when the lot fell upon Jonah, he freely owned, that he was a Jew, who worshipped the God of heaven, and not only a Jew, but a prophet likewise, who had been ordered to go to Nineveh, but was now endeavouring to flee from the divine presence; that since he found it was impossible to do that, and every one's life, upon his account, was in such imminent danger, he wished them to throw him overboard, as the only way to appease the storm; that with some reluctance, ^g the seamen did it, whereupon there immediately ensued a calm, which struck the

that God was very merciful to the Israelites, though they were certainly a very wicked people, in continuing a race of prophets among them, even after Elisha was dead.—Patriek's Comment.

^a Some are of opinion, that when Jeroboam reconquered these two chief cities of Syria, he restored them to the kingdom of Judah because they belonged to it of right, and reserved to himself only a small tribute to be paid him by the way of acknowledgment. This is what the original Hebrew, as well as the Chaldee and Septuagint versions seem to favour: but the Syriac and Arabic translators have omitted the word Judah, and may therefore be supposed to think, as several others do, that Jeroboam kept to himself all these places which he had recovered at his own hazard and expense.—Calmet's Commentary.

^b This was much longer than any of the kings of Israel had reigned; for even Jehu himself, though his reign was longer than that of any who went before him, reigned but twenty-eight years; God having on purpose prolonged this prince's reign, because he was not minded to blot out the name of Israel from under heaven, but to save them by his hand.—2 Kings xiv. 27.

^c The prophet Amos, who lived in the reign of this prince, was accused by Amaziah the priest of Bethel, for prophesying 'that Jeroboam should die by the sword;' but Amos never made any such prediction. It was a false accusation which this idolatrous priest sent against him, because he was desirous, to have him removed out of the way.—Amos, vii. 10, &c.

^d It is a very common opinion among the Jews, as we said, that Jonah was the widow of Zarephtha's son; and this opinion they found upon the words of the mother, when she received her son alive from the prophet's hand: 'By this I know, that the word of the Lord in thy mouth is truth,' (1 Kings xvii. 24.) for therefore, say they, was the child called the son of Amittai; because Amittai signifies truth: a weak reason, God wot! and such as is plainly repugnant to the testimony of Scripture. For this we know for certain, that Jonah lived in the reigns of Joash and Jeroboam the Second, kings of Israel, and therefore could not be the widow of Zarephtha's son, since the former of these princes did not begin to reign till sixty years after the translation of Elisha. Others pretend that he was son to the Shunamite woman, whom the prophet Elisha raised from the dead; but Shunam and Gath-hepher, where we are certain Jonah was born, were two quite different places, the former in the tribe of Issachar, the other in that of Zebulun; and therefore, we may conclude, that Amittai was the proper name of Jonah's father, who lived in a little canton of the tribe of Zebulun, called Hepher or Hopher, wherein was the town of Gath, which is generally believed to be the same with Jotapata, so famous for the siege which Josephus the Jewish historian, there maintained against the Roman army, a little before the destruction of Jerusalem.—Calmet's Preface on Jonah, and his Dictionary under the word.

^e Joppa is a seaport town in Palestine, upon the Mediterranean, and was formerly the only port which the Jews had upon that coast, whither all the materials that were sent from Tyre, towards the building of Solomon's temple, were brought and landed. The town itself is very ancient; for profane authors reckon it was built before the flood, and derive the name of it from Joppa, the daughter of Elolus, and the wife of Cepheus, who was the founder of it. Others are rather inclined to believe, that it was built by Japhet, and from him had the name of Japho, which was afterwards moulded into Joppa, but is now generally called Jajia, which comes nearer to the first appellation. The town is situated in a fine plain, between Jamnia to the south, Casarea of Palestine to the north, and Rama or Ramula, to the east; but at present is in a poor and mean condition; nor is its port by any means good, by reason of the rocks which project into the sea. The chief thing for which this place was famous, in ancient pagan history, is the exposition of Andromeda, the daughter of Cepheus king of Egypt, who, for her mother's pride, was bound to a rock, in order to be devoured by a sea monster, but was delivered by the valour and bravery of Perseus, who afterwards married her; for in the times of Mela and Pliny, there were some marks remaining, as they themselves testify, namely, Mela, b. i. c. 11; Pliny, b. v. c. 13; Joseph. on the Jewish Wars, b. iii. c. 15, of the chains wherewith this royal virgin was bound to the rock which projects into the sea. But all this is mere fiction, first founded upon the adventure of Jonah, who set sail from this port, and then improved with the accession of some particular circumstances.—Calmet's Commentary on Jonah, i. 3.

^f The Jewish doctors, who are great lovers of prodigies, are not even satisfied with what they meet with in this history of Jonah, but have over and above added, that as soon as the ship, wherein he was embarked, was under sail, it all on a sudden stood stock still, so that it could be made to move neither backward nor forward, notwithstanding all the pains that the mariners took in rowing; but others, with more probability say, that while all the rest of the ships were quiet and unmolested, the storm fell upon none but that wherein Jonah was, which made the seamen think that there was something miraculous in it; and thereupon called upon the company that sailed with them, to come and cast lots, as the superstitious custom among the heathens was, whenever they were in any great distress; that accordingly they cast lots three different times, which still fell upon Jonah; and that they let him down several times with a rope, without plunging him into the sea, and as often as they did it, found the storm abate, and whenever they pulled him up again, found it increase: so that at last they were forced to commit him to the mercy of the waves; all which are circumstances which the Scripture account neither favours nor contradicts.—Calmet's Commentary.

^g The people of the east have a tradition, that it was not above four leagues from Joppa, over against Antipatris, that the seamen threw Jonah overboard.

people with such devotion, that they offered a sacrifice to the Lord, and made their vows; that in the mean while God had prepared a great fish to swallow up Jonah, in whose belly he continued for three days and three nights, and then upon his supplications to heaven, was thrown out upon the shore; that being thus wonderfully delivered, he disputed the divine command no longer, but made the best of his way to Nineveh, which, at that time, was a very large city, and having got into the heart of it, delivered his message, namely, that within forty days that city should be destroyed, with great boldness and intrepidity; that the people of Nineveh, believing this message to be sent from God, proclaimed a "most solemn fast, and from the highest to the lowest, putting on sackcloth,^b and addressing their prayers to God, showed such tokens of sorrow and repentance, that he reversed their doom, or at least deferred it for some years; that Jonah being sore displeased at this, as fearing that it might bring some disgrace upon his prophetic office, after some expostulations with God, retired out of the city, and having built him a booth, sat under the cover of it, to see what the end would be; that while he was here, God^c caused a gourd to spring hastily up, which by its spreading leaves so shaded his booth from the heat of the sun, that it pleased him much; but being next morning gnawed by a worm, it withered away, which so fretted the impatient man, that he even desired to die; and that hereupon God took occasion to expostulate with him, and show him the unreasonableness of his repining at the loss of a plant, which cost him nothing, which rises in one night, and dies in another, and yet having no concern or commiseration for the destruction of a populous city, wherein there were above 120,000 innocent babes, and consequently the number of all its inhabitants vastly large; and with this way of reasoning,^d we may suppose, he reconciled his prophet's wayward thoughts to this his merciful method of proceeding. But to return to the affairs of Judah.

After the murder of Amaziah at Lachish, Uzziah, who is^e likewise called Azariah, in the sixteenth year of his age,^f which was in the seven and twentieth year of the

^a The history tells us, that "by a decree from the king and his nobles, neither man nor beast, neither herd nor flock were allowed to taste any thing, but were kept up from feeding and drinking water," (Jonah iii. 7.) This was carrying their abstinence to a greater severity than what we find practised among the Jews. For though in times of public calamity, and on the day of solemn expiation, we find that they made their children fast, as we may gather from Joel ii. 16, yet we nowhere read of their extending that rigour to their cattle. Virgil indeed, in one of his eclogues, brings in a shepherd, telling his companion, that for the death of Julius Caesar, the mourning was so general, that even the sheep and other creatures were not driven to water. But then the question is, whether this may not be looked upon as a poetical exaggeration. From Homer, and some other ancient authors, we learn, that when any hero, or great warrior died, the custom was to make his horses fast for some time, and to cut off part of their hair; nor may we forget mentioning, what some historians tell us, of the people inhabiting the Canaries and Peru, namely, that in times of great drought, they shut up their sheep and goats, without giving them any thing to eat, upon presumption that their loud cries and bleating will reach heaven, and prevail with God to give them rain.—Horn on the Origin of the American Nations, b. 2. c. 13.

^b The text tells us of the king of Nineveh, that upon the preaching of Jonah, "he laid his robe from him, and covered him with sackcloth, and sat in ashes," (Jonah iii. 6.) and, what is pretty strange, some have thought, that the king thus penitent upon this occasion, was Sardanaupalus, a man famous among heathen authors for his luxury and riches, and in whose reign the famous city of Nineveh was taken by Arbaces and Belesis. But others, with more probability, suppose, that it was Pul, the father of this Sardanaupalus, whom some heathen authors call Anabaxarus, and others Anaeydaraxus. For, as he died, according to Usher, about the year of the world 3237, he might be upon the throne in the reign of Jeroboam II. king of Israel, which was the time when Jonah was sent to Nineveh.—Calmet's Commentary, and Usher at A. M. 3254.

^c The word Kikajon, by the Septuagint, Arabic, and Syriac versions, is called a gourd; but most of the ancient Greek translators, following St Jerome in this particular, choose rather to render it ivy. St Jerome, however, acknowledges, that the word ivy does not answer the signification of the Hebrew Kikajon, though he thinks it much better in this place than a gourd, which, growing close to the earth, could not have shaded Jonah from the heat of the sun: for the Kikajon, according to him, is a shrub which grows in the sandy places of Palestine, and increases so suddenly, that in a few days it comes to a considerable height. It is supported by its trunk, without being upheld by any thing else; and by the thickness of its leaves, which resemble those of a vine, affords, in hot weather, a very agreeable shade.—Calmet's Dictionary, under the word Kikajon. ["The best judges say the ricinus or palma Christi, from which we get what is vulgarly called castor oil, is here meant. It is a tree as large as the olive, has leaves which are like those of the vine, and is also quick of growth. This in all probability was the plant in question, which had been already planted, though it had not attained its proper growth, and was not then in full leaf. Celsus, in his Hierobot., says it grows to the height of an olive tree; the trunk and branches are hollow like a kex, and the leaves sometimes as broad as the rim of a hat. It must be of a soft or spongy substance, for it is said to grow surprisingly fast. See Taylor under the root p. 1670. But it is evident there was something supernatural in the growth of this plant, for it is stated to have 'come up in a night;' though the Chaldee understands the passage thus: "It was here last night and is withered this night." In one night it might have blown, and expanded its leaves considerably, though the plant had existed before, but not in full bloom till the time that Jonah required it for a shelter.]—Dr A. Clarke's Commentary.—ED.

^d The book of Jonah ends as abruptly as it begins: it begins with a conjunctive copulative, "and the word of the Lord came upon Jonah," so it should be read, which has made some commentators think, that it was but an appendix to some of his other writings; and it ends without giving us any manner of account, either what became of the Ninevites, or of Jonah himself, after this expedition. It is likely indeed, from the compassionate expressions which God makes use of towards the Ninevites, that for that time he reversed their doom: and it is not improbable that Jonah, when he had executed his commission, and been satisfied by God concerning his merciful procedure, returned into Judea; but the author of the lives and deaths of the prophets, who goes under the name of Epiphanius, tells us, that, returning from Nineveh, and being ashamed to see that his prediction was not fulfilled, he retired with his mother to the city of Tyre, where he lived in the plain of Sear, until he died, and was buried in the cave of Cenezus, judge of Israel; but who the author means by Cenezus, unless it be Caleb, who is frequently surnamed the Kenazite, though we do not read of his being ever a judge of Israel, or rather Othniel, who was the son of Kenaz, and one that judged Israel, we cannot tell.—Calmet's Dictionary under the word Jonah, and Hovell's History, in the notes.

^e The words are much of the same signification; for the former signifies the strength, and the other the help of God.

^f Commentators have been at a good deal of trouble to reconcile a seeming contradiction in this computation. For if Amaziah, the father of Azariah, lived but fifteen years, after the beginning of Jeroboam's reign, as appears from 2 Kings xiv. 17, then Azariah must begin his reign, not in the twenty-seventh, but, if he succeeded his father immediately, in the sixteenth, or fifteenth rather, of Jeroboam: but our learned Dr Lightfoot solves this at once, by supposing, that there was an interregnum, wherein the throne was vacant eleven, or rather twelve years, between the death of Amaziah and the inauguration of his son Azariah, who being left an infant of four years old when his father died, was committed to the guardianship of the grandees of the reign of Jeroboam king of Israel, succeeded his father, and, in the former part of his reign, behaved well; for which God prospered him in all his undertakings, and blessed his arms with great success: for he worsted the Philistines in many battles, dismantled several of their towns, and built cities in the country thereabout to keep them in subjection. His next expedition was against the Arabians that were upon the borders of Egypt, and against the Mehunims, who lived in their deserts, whom he utterly subdued; and not long after, so terrified the Ammonites, that they, as the others were, became tributaries to him. He then repaired the walls of Jerusalem, and, at proper distances, built towers, from whence, ^a with engines that threw darts and stones, he might be able to annoy an invader; and, as he was a great lover of husbandry, he employed several plowers and planters in the plains, vine-dressers on the mountains, and shepherds in the valleys, whereby he acquired considerable wealth. But the chief glory of his kingdom lay in his army, which consisted of above 370,000 select men under the command of 2,000 brave experienced officers, all armed with proper weapons both offensive and defensive, and trained up in the most perfect manner of martial discipline.

Thus prosperous was Uzziah in every circumstance of life, ^b while Zechariah lived and had him under his nation, who, during his minority, took the administration of public affairs upon themselves, and when he was become sixteen, devolved it upon him; so that when he came into the full possession of the throne, it was in the seven and twentieth year of Jeroboam.—Patrick's Commentary.

^a This is the first time that we read of any machine, either for besieging or defending towns; which is plainly the reason why sieges were of so long a continuance before the invention of these. Homer, who is the most ancient Greek writer we know of that treats of sieges, describes a kind of entrenchment, though a poor one, some lines of circumvallation, and a ditch with palisades; but we hear not one word of any machines, such as the ballistæ and the catapulte, which were used for hurling stones and throwing darts; and therefore we need less wonder that the famous siege of Troy continued so long. Sardanapalus, king of Assyria, maintained himself in Nineveh for seven years, because the besiegers, as Diodorus observes, (b. 2.) wanted such engines as were fit for demolishing and taking of cities, they being not then invented. Salmaner lay three years before Samaria, (2 Kings xvii. 5, 6.) and, as some say, Psammeticus (vid. Aristæus de LXX. interp.) twenty, before Azoth. Now of Uzziah it is said, 'That he made in Jerusalem engines, invented by cunning men, to be on the towers, and upon the bulwarks, to shoot arrows and great stones' (2 Chron. xxvi. 15.); so that it must needs be a mistake, to attribute the invention of the ballistæ, the scorpia, or the onager, whereof Ammianus Marcellinus (b. 23. c. 2.) has given us the descriptions, to the Greeks or Romans, because we find them made use of in the east, before ever the Greeks had brought the military art to any great perfection. Uzziah was certainly the first inventor of them; and therefore it is said that, for these and other warlike preparations, 'his name was spread abroad.' From this time they began to be employed, both in attacking and defending towns; and therefore we find the prophet Ezekiel describing the future sieges of Jerusalem and Tyre, where he makes mention of battering rams, and engines of war, or, as it should be rendered, 'machines of cords,' which in all probability were what later ages called their ballistæ and catapulte.—Calmel's Dissertation on the Military Services of the ancient Hebrews.

^b Some are of opinion that the person here mentioned was a prophet, and the same with that Zechariah whose book of prophecies is extant in the bible; but, as he wrote in the reign of Darius, it is plain that he lived almost three hundred years after this. It is not unlikely, however, that he was the son of that Zechariah, the son of Jehoiada, who, by the command of king Joash, was slain in the temple; that he was called after his direction; but when once that faithful counsellor died, which was in the three and thirtieth year of his reign, he soon grew so ^c intoxicated with the thoughts of his power and greatness, that forgetting himself he would needs intrude into the priestly office. Accordingly, having taken it into his head one day to ^d offer incense, he went into the sanctuary, and when Abaziah, and some other of the priests, endeavoured to dissuade him from it, he fell into a rage, and received their remonstrances with threats. God, however, took care to vindicate the sacredness of the sacerdotal office: for the moment that he took the censer in his hand, and was going to burn incense, he was ^e struck with a leprosy, which no art of man could ever after cure; so that, while his son Jotham, as his father's viceroy, took the public administration upon him, he was forced to live in a separate place by himself; and, after a reign of two and fifty years, died, and was buried, not in the royal sepulchres, but in the father's name; was preceptor to Uzziah; and, though not a prophet, a man very skilful in expounding the ancient prophecies, and giving instructions out of them, as Grotius understands it.—Patrick's and Calmel's Commentaries.

^c How hard a matter is it, says Bishop Patrick, hereupon to bear great prosperity with moderation, and humble thankfulness!

^d What it was that tempted the king to this extravagant folly, it is hard to imagine; but the most likely conjecture is, that he had a vain ambition to imitate heathen princes, who, in several countries, joined both the regal and sacerdotal offices together. But, however it may be in all other countries, the priesthood in Judea was confined to the house of Aaron only, and every one that pretended to usurp that office, was, by the law of the land, to be put to death; 'for thou, and thy sons with thee,' says God to Aaron, 'shall keep your priest's office for every thing of the altar, and within the veil, and ye shall serve. I have given your priest's office unto you as a service of gift: and the stranger that cometh nigh shall be put to death.' (Numbers xviii. 7.)

^e The punishment for such as would intrude into divine ministrations was capital, we see; and therefore God smote Uzziah with such a disease, as was a kind of death; because it separated the person that was afflicted with it from the commerce and society of men, even as if he were departed this world, and, as the Psalmist expresses it, become 'free among the dead,' (Ps. lxxxviii. 5.) But, besides the infliction of this disease, Josephus tells us, 'that, the very moment that Uzziah was going to burn incense, there happened a terrible earthquake, and, as the roof of the temple opened with the shock of it, there passed a beam of the sun through the cleft, which struck directly upon the face of this sacrilegious prince, whereupon he instantly became a leper; nay, that this earthquake was so very violent, that it tore asunder a great mountain, towards the west of Jerusalem, and rolled one half of it over and over a matter of four furlongs, till at length it was stopped by another mountain, which stood over against it, but choked up the highway, and covered the king's gardens all over with dust.' But all this may be justly suspected. That there was a great earthquake in the reign of Uzziah, is evident from the testimony of two prophets, (Amos i. 1. and Zechariah xiv. 8.) but that it happened exactly when Uzziah attempted this invasion of the priesthood, is far from being clear; on the contrary, if we will abide by Bishop Usher's computation, the Jewish historian must be sadly mistaken. For since the prophet Amos tells us, that he began to prophesy two years before this earthquake happened, in the reigns of Uzziah king of Judah, and Jeroboam the second king of Israel; and since we may gather from the sacred history, that Jeroboam died two years before the birth of Jotham the son of Uzziah; that Jeroboam died in the six and twentieth year of the said Uzziah, and Jotham his son was born in the three and twentieth year thereof, and yet was of age sufficient to be made regent of the kingdom, when his father was thus struck with a leprosy, which must have been several years after Jeroboam's death, it must needs follow that this earthquake could not happen at the time which Josephus assigns, but must have been much later.—Josephus's Jewish Wars, b. 9. c. 11. and Calmel's Commentary on 2 Chron. xv. 5.

same field, " at some distance from them, because he was a leper, and was succeeded by his son Jotham.

During the reign of this Uzziah, there happened some events, mentioned in other parts of Scripture, which are not to be found in the books that are purely historical. Such are that terrible earthquake whereof Amos¹ prophesied two years before it happened; that sore plague of the locusts, whereof Joel² gives us so full and lively a description; and that extreme drought, mixed with fearful flashes of fire, which fell from heaven, and, as the prophet³ expresses it, 'devoured all the pastures of the wilderness, and burned up all the trees of the field.'

But that which we are chiefly concerned to take notice of, is the succession of prophets in Israel and Judah, whom God raised up to give them instructions and exhortations, and to denounce his threatenings and judgments against them, upon their persisting in their impieties: and these he appointed, not only to warn them by word of mouth, as his former prophets had done, but to commit their admonitions to writing, that posterity might see the ingratitude of his people, and all other nations, from their backslidings and punishments, might learn not to do so wickedly.

The first of these prophets was Hosea, the son of Beeri, who, according to the introduction to his book, prophesied in the reign of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah, and in the days of Jeroboam the second king of Israel; and consequently continued to be a prophet at least seventy years, unless we may suppose, as⁴ some have done, that this is a spurious title of some ancient transcribers, and that the true beginning of his work is at the second verse, 'The beginning of the word of the Lord by Hosea.' However this be, we may observe, that he speaks positively of the captivity of the ten tribes, and inveighs strongly against their disorders; that he foretells, that the kingdom of Judah should for some time subsist after them, but that at length they too should be carried away captive beyond the Euphrates; and through the whole lays open the sins, and declares the judgments of God against a people hardened and irreclaimable.

The next prophet is Joel, the son of Pethuel. He mentions the same judgment that Amos does; and, under the idea of an enemy's army, represents those vast swarms of locusts, which, in his time, fell upon Judea, and occasioned great desolation. He calls and invites the people to repentance, and promises mercy and forgiveness to those that will listen to the call. He speaks of the teacher of righteousness, whom God was to send, and of the Holy Spirit which he was to pour out upon all flesh; and, in the conclusion, relates what glorious things God would do for his church in the times of the gospel.

The next prophet is Amos; for he lived in the days of Uzziah king of Judah, and of Jeroboam the second king of Israel. He begins his prophecies with threatenings against the neighbouring nations, that were enemies to Israel; then reproves the people of Israel and Judah for their idolatry, effeminacy, and other sins; exhorts them to repentance, without which their hypocritical services will do them no good; foretells their captivity, and heavy judgments of God; and, at last, speaks of the restoration of the church among the Jews, and the happy accession of the Gentiles.

The next prophet is Obadiah; for he was contemporary with Hosea, Joel, and Amos. He denounces God's judgments against the Edomites for the mischief they had done to Judah and Jerusalem, whom he promises that they should be victorious over these Edomites, and their other enemies; and, at last, foretells their reformation and restoration, and that the kingdom of the Messiah should be set up by the 'bringing in of a great salvation.'

The book of Jonah is a history rather than a prophecy; and, if it was written by himself, it is a frank acknowledgment of his own faults and failings, and a plain evidence, that, in this work, he designed God's glory, and not his own. For it contains remarkable instances of human frailties in the prophet, of God's compassion and condescension to him, and a noble type of our Saviour's burial and resurrection.

The other prophet that lived in these times was Isaiah, the son of Amos, whose prophecies may be divided into three parts. The first part includes six chapters relating to the reign of Jotham, the six following chapters relate to the reign of Ahaz, and all the rest to the reign of Hezekiah. The great design of what he does, is to foretell the captivity of Babylon, the return of the people from that captivity, and the flourishing kingdom of the Messiah: but^b the whole book is highly serviceable to the church of God in all ages, for conviction of sin, direction in duty, and consolation in trouble; and its author may justly be accounted a great prophet, whether we consider the extent and variety of his predictions; the sublimity of the truths which he reveals; ^c the majesty and elegance of his style; the loftiness of his metaphors, or the liveliness of his descriptions.^d

^b St Jerome, in his introduction to Isaiah's prophecy, tells us, that his writings are, as it were, an abridgment of the holy Scriptures, and a collection of all the most uncommon knowledge that the mind of man is capable of. His words are, "What shall I say of physics, ethics, and theology? Whatever belongs to the holy Scriptures, whatever the tongue of man can utter, and the senses of mortals can perceive, is contained in that volume."—Jerome's Preface to Isaiah.

^c Grotius compares this prophet with the great Grecian orator, Demosthenes; for in him, says he, we meet with all the purity of the Hebrew tongue, as in the other, there is all the delicacy of the Attic taste. Both are sublime and magnificent in their style, vehement in their emotions, copious in their figures, and very impetuous, when they set off things of an enormous nature, or such as are grievous or odious. But there is one thing, wherein the prophet was superior to the orator, and that is in the honour of his illustrious birth, and relation to the royal family of Judah; and therefore what Quintilian says of Corvinus Messala, may be justly applied to him, namely, that he speaks in an easy flowing manner, and in a style which shows him to be a man of quality.—Grotius on 2 Kings xix. 2. and Quintil. l. 10. c. 20.

^d Who Isaiah was, is uncertain: the Jewish tradition is that he was of the seed-royal, and nearly allied to Amaziah; but there is no proof of this assertion. Certain it is, he was much at court, and his style and manner refined, and particularly elegant and lofty.—Hawcis.—Ed.

CHAP. II.—Difficulties Obviated and Objections Answered.

ST PAUL, speaking of the propagation of the gospel, and the seeming insufficiency of the means which God had employed to effect it, has these remarkable words: ¹ 'Ye see your calling, brethren, how that not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble are called; but God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise, the weak things of the world to confound the mighty, the base things of the world, and things that are despised, yea, and things that are not, to bring to nought things that are, that no flesh should glory in his presence.' And then proceeding to speak of himself; ² 'And I, brethren,' says he, 'when I came to you, came not with excellency of speech, or of wisdom, declaring unto you the testimony of God; but was with you in weakness, and fear, and in much trembling: and my speech and my preaching was not with enticing words of man's wisdom, but in demonstration of the Spirit and of power, that your faith should not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God.'

Now, if God in the conversion of the world to Christianity, made use of instruments in themselves so incompetent for the work, lest the work might be imputed to human powers; by parity of reason we may presume, that, in the conversion of the Ninevites, God might not employ a prophet of the best natural temper and qualifications, since Isaiah was then of age, and seems to have been better fitted for such a mission, that the glory of the event might not be ascribed to any innate abilities of the prophet, but to the sole power of God which accompanied him, and ³ 'made the foolishness of his preaching,' as the apostle expresses it, 'effectual to save them that believed.'

We must not imagine, however, that, in his address to the people of Nineveh, the prophet had nothing to say but this one sentence, 'Yet forty days, and Nineveh shall be overthrown.' This indeed was the sum and substance of his preaching, but we may well presume that he took frequent occasions to expatiate upon it; by reminding them of the number and nature, and several aggravations of their offences; by acquainting them with the holiness, justice, and omnipotence of God; that holiness which could not behold iniquity without detestation; that justice which, sooner or later, would not suffer it to go unpunished; and that almighty power, which could, in a moment, lay the stateliest cities in ashes; by exhorting them to repentance from a dread of his impending judgments; and by instructing them in the method of pacifying his wrath, and affecting a reconciliation with him.

Some of the ancients are of opinion that Jonah received no orders from God to limit the destruction of Nineveh to forty days, because there is no such time fixed in his instructions; all that God appoints him to do is, ⁴ 'to go unto Nineveh, that great city,' as he calls it, 'and to preach unto it that preaching which he should bid him:' and therefore they suppose that the space of forty days was an addition of the prophet's own, and, for that reason, not exactly fulfilled; but there is no occasion for charging him with any such falsification, since the comminations of God are always conditional, ^a and answer his gracious purposes much better when they are averted than when they are executed.

And indeed, though in this case they were averted for a while, yet, when the people relapsed into their former iniquities, the prophet's prediction did not fail of its accomplishment. For, if we take the forty days to denote forty years, a day for a year, and the overthrowing of Nineveh, not to signify its final destruction, but only the subversion ⁵ of that ancient empire of the Assyrians, which had governed Asia for above 1300 years, and was destroyed under the effeminate king Sardanapalus; then was the prophecy literally fulfilled, and from its fulfilling we may trace the time of Jonah's mission.

But though this prophecy of Jonah was not fulfilled at the end of forty days, as he expected, and at the end of forty years there was only a destruction of the monarchy, and not of the city; yet his miraculous preservation in the whale's belly gave him such credit, that it was always believed that the time of its accomplishment was uncertain. To this purpose we find Tobit ⁶ giving his son Tobias instructions to depart out of Nineveh, 'because those things which the prophet Jonah spake should certainly come to pass:' and accordingly, before Tobias died, he heard of the destruction of Nineveh, which was taken by Nebuchodonosor and Ahasuerus: ⁷ for these two princes being related by marriage, entered into a confederacy against the Assyrians, and, joining their forces together, besieged this city, and, after having taken it and slain Saracus, the king thereof, they utterly destroyed it, and from that time made Babylon the place of royal residence, and the sole metropolis of the Assyrian monarchy. Thus was the prediction of Jonah, concerning the destruction of Nineveh, though not in the time which he had prefixed, fulfilled; nor can the delay of it be looked upon as any breach of the divine veracity, whatever unreasonableness it gave the prophet. The truth of the matter is,—Jonah was a man of an unhappy temper, peevish and passionate, and, in this case, fearful of being accounted a false prophet, of having his ministry exposed to contempt, or his person perhaps to violence from the Ninevites, because the event did not answer the prediction. And the proper lesson we are to learn from his behaviour is,—That the gift of prophecy does not alter men's natural tempers, nor set them above the level of human frailty: for ⁸ 'we have this treasure,' as the apostle speaks, 'in earthen vessels, that the excellency of the power may be of God, and not of us.'

That stratagems in war, and other artifices to delude and ensnare an enemy, are not prohibited by the law of God, the generality of casuists are agreed; and therefore, upon the supposition that Elisha's speech to Benhadad's men was framed on purpose to deceive, he did no more than make use of the common privilege which every nation, engaged in war one with another, is permitted to employ: but upon a nearer examination, we cannot charge his words with a direct falsehood, though we must allow that there is some ambiguity in them.

When the prophet perceived that the Syrian army had encompassed the place where he abode, he went out of the city, and told them, ¹ 'This is not the way, neither is this the city,' namely, where they would find the man for whom they were sent; because, at that time, he was come out of the city; and therefore, if they proceeded in their march, they would be sure to miss him. But 'follow me, and I will bring you to the man whom ye seek;' and so he did, but not in the manner, it must be owned, that they either expected or desired. The whole conduct of the prophet, therefore, in this respect, was no more than what the practice of war always allows, namely, a feint to cover his real designs, and, by counterfeit motions and false alarms, to draw the enemy into such intricacies, that he might come upon them, and surprise them when they least of all thought of it.

The formality of a lie, as some will have it, does not consist so much in saying what is untrue, as in making a false representation of things with a purpose to do hurt: but the prophet's generous treatment of the enemy, when he had them at his mercy, shows that he had no malignity in his intention, no design to make an advantage of their deception; but, on the contrary, took the most effectual means, both to cure their inveterate hatred against the Israelites, and to reconcile them to the worship and service of the true God, who had wrought such a miracle for their conviction, as well as the preservation of his prophet.

² 'He smote them with blindness, according to the word of Elisha: but then we are not to imagine that this blindness was so total that they quite lost the use of their eyes, but only that it was such a dimness and confusion in their sight, as hindered them from distinguishing one object from another, the city of Dothan, for instance, from the city of Samaria; even, in like manner, as we read of the people of Sodom, that when the angels ³ smote them with blindness, which they might easily do by some small alteration, either in their sight, or in the air, 'they wearied themselves to find out Lot's door.' They saw the house, it seems, but did not discern the door, because this sudden disorder in their imagination might either make the door appear to them like the solid wall, or the solid wall like so many doors.

This is no more than what happens to several men in their liquor; that, though their eyes be open, and can perceive the several objects that surround them, yet they cannot discern wherein they differ. And if we may suppose that the Syrian army was under the like ἀνομασία, as the Greeks very happily term it, we need no longer wonder that they readily accepted of a guide, who offered his services, and bespoke them fair, whom they might indeed take for some deputy of the town, with authority to deliver up the prophet to them, than that a drunkard, who, after a long while having lost his way, and found himself bewildered, should be thankful to any hand that would promise to conduct him safe home.

came to consult Elisha, concerning his master's illness, which was a considerable time after the prophet Elijah's translation, we find by the whole interview, that he was entirely ignorant of his own designation for the throne of Syria, which he could not have been, had he been anointed before this time. Either therefore we must take the word in a figurative sense, to denote no more than God's purpose or determination, that Hazael should succeed in the throne of Syria, to execute the designs of his providence upon the people of Israel, even as Cyrus, for the same reason, is called ⁵ 'the Lord's anointed,' though he was never properly anointed by God; or, if we take it in a literal sense, we must suppose some reason why Elijah waved the execution of that command, even because he foresaw the many sore calamities which Hazael, when advanced to the crown of Syria, would bring upon Israel, and thereupon prevailed with God, that he might be excused from that ungrateful office, and that, in his time at least, a succession which would be attended with such direful consequences might not commence.

It may possibly be thought, indeed, that Elisha's foretelling his advancement to the throne might be a spur and incitement to his ambition; but the means whereby he accomplished his design were entirely from his own wicked and corrupt mind, which would not stay for the ordinary methods of divine providence to bring it innocently about, but chose rather to carve for himself, and, by murdering his master, to cut him out a more expeditious way of coming into immediate possession. And this solves the seeming difficulty of the prophet's sending one answer to Benhadad, and telling Hazael quite another story: for when Hazael understood that his master's disease was not mortal, but that, if no violence intervened, he might easily get over that indisposition, for that is the sense of ⁶ 'he may certainly recover;' and, at the same time, was told by the prophet, that he would not, however, recover, because he foresaw that violence would be used to take away his life, as this is the sense of 'he shall surely die,' Hazael went his way, and not willing to trust Providence with his master's recovery, took care the next morning to have him despatched.

There is, however, another, and, as some think, a much plainer interpretation of the prophet's words: for, since this is a passage which admits of a various lection, the adverb to, as it is in the textual reading, signifies not, but in our translation, which in this place follows the marginal, it is rendered, to him: so that, if the Hebrew text be right, as some learned men, upon examination, have given it the preference, the plain reading of the words will be, 'Go, say, thou shalt surely not live; for the Lord hath shewed me that thou shalt surely die.' This was the sense of the prophet's answer to Benhadad; but Hazael, who was a wicked man, went and told him a quite contrary thing, on purpose to lull him into a state of security, that thereby he might have a fairer opportunity of accomplishing his design upon him.

Thus, whether the marginal or textual reading be right, and consequently, whether the prophet's message to Benhadad be taken in an affirmative or negative sense, he cannot justly be charged with baseness and ingratitude; since, whether he accepted of his present or no, it is manifest that he could not return him any false and delusive answer: and yet the more probable opinion is, that, in conformity to his practice, in the case of Naaman the leper, he did, upon this occasion, 'reject the good things of Damascus' which Benhadad sent, because the same reasons which induced him to refuse them from the hand of Naaman were still in force, and might equally prevail with him not to accept them from the hand of Hazael.

Thus, with regard to Benhadad king of Syria, the prophet stands clear of any imputation of falsehood or ingratitude; and, in like manner, if we consider the matter as it stood, between him and Joash king of Israel, we shall find no unbecoming passion or peevishness in his conduct, but a great deal of zeal and concern for the honour both of his king and country. For whether king Joash before this interview with Elisha, was acquainted or not with the nature of parabolical actions, whereby prophets more especially were accustomed to represent future events; by the comment which Elisha made upon the first arrow that he shot, which he calls 'the arrow of deliverance from Syria,' he could not but perceive that this was a symbolical action, and intended to prefigure his victories over that nation; and therefore, as the first action of shooting was a kind of prelude to the war, he could not but understand farther, even though the prophet had said nothing to him, that this second action of striking the ground with the arrow, was to portend the number of the victories he was to obtain. ² But then, if we may suppose with the generality of interpreters, that the prophet had apprised him beforehand, that such was the symbolical intent of what he now put upon him; that the oftener he smote upon the ground, the more would their victories be which his arms should obtain; that this was the decree of heaven; and that thus, in some measure, his success in war was put in his own power; the king's conduct was utterly inexcusable, if, diffident of the prophet's promise, and considering the vast strength of the kings of Syria more than the power of God that was engaged on his side, he stopped his hand after he had smitten thrice; supposing indeed, that the prediction would never have been fulfilled, had he gone on and smitten upon the earth oftener. Upon the whole, therefore, the prophet had just reason to be offended at the king for not believing God, who had done so many signal miracles in favour of the Israelites; for not believing him, who, according to his own acknowledgment, had been a constant defender of the state, ³ 'the chariot of Israel and the horsemen thereof,' and now, in his dying hours, was full of good wishes and intentions for his country; and, by this unbelief of his, for eclipsing the glory of his own arms, and curtailing the number of his victories: for ⁴ 'thou shouldst have smitten five or six times,' says the prophet to the king, 'then shouldst thou have smitten Syria, till thou hadst consumed it; whereas now thou shalt smite Syria but thrice.'

'and some of them ye shall kill and crucify, and some of them ye shall scourge in your synagogues, and persecute them from city to city; that upon you may come all the righteous blood shed upon the earth, from the blood of righteous Abel, unto the blood of Zechariah, the son of Barachiah, whom ye slew between the temple and the altar:' and hereupon some names of great authority have inferred, that the Zechariah, son of the high priest, whom Joash, king of Judah, commanded to be slain, was the same with the person whom our Saviour here mentions; for though he calls his father by a different name, Barachiah, and not Jehoiada, yet this he might do, say they, to denote the divine graces, which were so conspicuous in him; for so the word Barachiah means.

It must be observed, however, that as there is a difference in these two persons, not only in regard to their father's names, but to the place likewise where they suffered, the one ⁶ 'between the temple and the altar,' that is, in the court of the priests, and the other ⁷ 'in the court of the house of the Lord,' that is, in the court of the Israelites, where he was mounted on high, and inveighing against their idolatry, there are some grounds to believe, that the Zechariah in the gospel is not the same with him whose death we find recorded in the Chronicles of the kings of Judah.

Our blessed Saviour, it must be owned, not only foretold the utter excision of the Jews, but described likewise several preceding calamities almost in the very manner wherein their own historian has related them. Now, in the times of the Jewish war, Josephus ⁸ makes mention of one Zacharias, and gives us these circumstances concerning his murder: That he was the son of one Baruch, a man of the first rank, and of great authority, virtue, and wealth, a friend to all good men, and a constant enemy to the wicked; that his son Zacharias was, by the zealots of that time, looked upon as a man so very popular, that they could not think themselves safe, without taking away his life; that to this purpose they brought him before a sham court of their own erecting, where they accused him of a conspiracy to betray Jerusalem to the Romans, and of holding a criminal correspondence with Vespasian; that upon his trial, his innocence appeared so clear, and the accusations against him so false and malicious, that their own court, contrary to their expectation, acquitted him; but that, after he was acquitted, two ruffians of their company fell upon him, and, having murdered him in the middle of the temple, threw his dead body down the precipice whereon it stood.

This is the person, as others imagine, that our Saviour intends; for as he begins with Abel, the first instance of a person suffering by violence, it is but reasonable, they think, that he should conclude with one of the latest among the Jews while their government subsisted; and therefore they look upon our Lord's words, not as a recital of what had been done, but a prediction of what would be done; and a glorious evidence it is of his divine omniscience, which could foretell the names both of father and son, above forty years before the event happened.

However this be, we must not accuse the father of that Zacharias, who died a martyr in the reign of Joash king of Judah, of showing a busy and pragmatist spirit, in placing this Joash, when a child, upon the throne of his ancestors. Jehoiada, as he was high priest, had a large authority even in civil affairs; ¹ the dignity of his station set him at the head of a very powerful body of men, the priests and Levites; and his quality, as first judge and president of the great council of the nation, gave him a right to defend oppressed innocence, and made it his duty to oppose the unjust usurpation of Athaliah, who had no pretence of claim to the crown, and was descended likewise from a wicked family, which God had particularly devoted to destruction.

² The constitution of the nation moreover was such, that the crown, by divine appointment, was appropriated to the sons of David; and therefore the hereditary right was inherent in him whom he had set up, whose aunt he had married, whose kinsman he was by birth as well as marriage, and who upon these accounts, as well as all necessary qualifications for so high a trust, was the properest guardian of the succession. For he had a large share of wisdom and experience, an ardent love for the public good, courage and activity in his complexion, and a solid piety towards God ruling in his heart; and yet he did not act alone in this important affair, but had the consent and concurrence of the chief officers, both civil and ecclesiastic, the special motion and assistance of God's blessed Spirit, and, as we may suppose, the direction and encouragement of the principal prophets that were then alive.

His son indeed was but badly requited for all the care which his father had taken in setting the crown upon young Joash, when, in his reign, and by his orders, he was stoned to death, and as he was expiring, cried out, ³ 'Lord, look upon it, and requite it.' But we must not by these words imagine that he died with a spirit of revenge, for far be it from so good a man, but that, by the spirit of prophecy, he only foretold, that it would not be long before God would find out some means of punishing the king for his barbarous usage of him; which accordingly came to pass; for in the following verses we read, that ⁴ 'at the end of the year, the host of Syria came up against him,' and not long after that, ⁵ 'his own servants conspired against him, and slew him on his bed.'

The spirit of the gospel, it must be owned, is of a much more gentle and forgiving temper than that of the law, under which we meet with several such imprecations, especially in the Psalmist, as cannot, without violence, admit of any other construction. ^a Our blessed Saviour, in his reasoning with the Jews, tells them, ⁶ that Moses did indulge them in some cases, 'because of the hardness of their hearts;' not that God ever did, or ever will humour any man, because he is obstinate and obdurate; kindness and good will, Exod. xxii. 21—24; Lev. xix. 17, 18, 34; xxv. 35; Deut. x. 19; Prov. xv. 17; xvii. 17; xviii. 24; xxvii. 10; David, the sweet Psalmist of Israel, extols and recommends benevolence and mercy, forgiveness and kindness, to enemies, Ps. xv. 5; xxvii. 2, et seq.; xxxiv. 14; xxxvii. 1, 8, 21, 26; xxxviii. 12—14; xxxix. 1; xl. 1, 3; xciv. 1; ci. 5; cix. 4, 5; cxii. 5, 9; cxx. 6, 7; cxxxiii. 1—3; and his own conduct afforded a noble exemplification of these virtues, as will be apparent by consulting the following passages: Ps. xxxv. 12—15; 1 Sam. xxiv. 1, et seq.; xxvi. 1, et seq. 2 Sam. i. 4, et seq.; iv. 8—12; xvi. 7—11; xix. 21—23. It cannot then be credited that one so distinguished for tenderness and benevolence of heart, as well as for pre-eminent piety, could utter any thing in direct opposition to those feelings of mercy and forgiveness which he both highly recommended, and exhibited in his own practice. Independently of this we may rest assured that no unmerciful and revengeful sentiment was ever suggested by the Holy Spirit, or ever found entrance into a work of inspiration. From these observations we may with certainty infer that the passages in question, however they may appear, were undoubtedly not intended to convey any bitter and unrelenting malediction. Nor will they be deemed to do so, provided due allowance be made for the bold phraseology of oriental poetry, which must generally be received with considerable abatement; and provided also, they be understood with the reservation which ought to accompany all our wishes and addresses to the Deity, namely, that he would grant them only so far as may be consistent with his will and providence. If the imprecative parts of the book of Psalms be taken with these limitations, as in reason they ought, they will be found in substance merely to express a wish that the wicked men spoken of might receive the just recompence of their deeds, and that the punishment they deserved might speedily overtake them, if such were the will of God. The impious and transgressors are those alone upon whom the Psalmist imprecates the Divine vengeance; and there is nothing of vindictive feeling in praying for that which he believed the Divine justice, as well as the Divine promise were engaged to inflict; while at the same time his entire confidence in the absolute perfections of the Supreme Being affords ample evidence that he calls for this vengeance only so far as might be accordant with the divine attributes of wisdom, goodness, and equity. A strong confirmation of this reasoning is supplied by Ps. xxviii. 4, 5, where he prays the Almighty to 'give them according to their deeds, according to the wickedness of their endeavours; to give them after the work of their hands; to render them their desert;' and he immediately subjoins as a reason for the petition, and a vindication of it, 'because they regard not the works of the Lord, nor the operation of his hands, he shall (will) destroy them, and not build them up.' Such imprecative addresses are in reality the expression of an earnest desire that the will of God may be done in earth as it is in heaven, and that, if it seemed good unto him, he would assert his own honour as well by the punishment of the iniquitous as by the preservation of the righteous. The persons to whom the imprecations refer, were inveterate adversaries, plotting against the life of the Psalmist, and maliciously intent upon effecting his ruin. To pray to be rescued from their wicked devices, was clearly lawful; and, considering their numbers and persevering malignity, his escape might seem utterly impracticable without their entire overthrow or extirpation; a prayer for their destruction, therefore, was equivalent to a prayer for his own preservation and deliverance. Besides, they were for the most part not only personal enemies, but hostile to the people of Israel, rebels to their heavenly king, and violators of his commands. To desire the punishment of such characters arose, it may fairly be presumed, not from personal vindictive feelings, but from a regard to religion, and hatred of iniquity; and was in fact tantamount to desiring the Almighty to vindicate his glory by inflicting the chastisements, which they deserved, and which he has denounced against the proud contemners of his laws. By many writers the passages objected to are explained as predictions; and this is not at variance with the Hebrew idiom; which admits, under some circumstances, the use of the imperative for the future as Ps.

^a It must be confessed that, at first sight, these imprecations appear cruel and vindictive, irreconcilable with the gentle spirit of piety and religion; and some unhesitatingly acknowledging them to be indefensible on Christian principles, rest the defence solely on their accordance with the character of the Jewish dispensation; which, say they, did not inculcate that cordial forgiveness of injuries, and even love of our enemies, which form an essential and peculiar doctrine of the gospel. In this representation the inquirer will not be disposed to acquiesce, when he reflects that the Hebrew Scriptures do forcibly enjoin the duties of forgiving injuries, Exod. xii. 49; xxiii. 4, 5; Lev. xix. 17, 18; Deut. xxxii. 35; Prov. xi. 17; xix. 11; xx. 22; xxiv. 29; Zech. vii. 10; of doing good to enemies, Exod. xxiii. 4, 5; Prov. xxv. 21; Jer. xxix. 7; and of cultivating mutual but the sense of the word is, ¹ that God therefore con-vined at some things, because the dispensation under which they lived wanted proper efficacy to work their hearts to a greater softness. We are not therefore to wonder that we find some disparity in the behaviour of a Christian and Jewish martyr; but that such prophetic declarations, concerning the future punishment of enemies and persecutors, were not thought wicked and uncharitable, even under a more perfect dispensation, we have the example of the great apostle of the Gentiles to evince; who, speaking of Alexander the coppersmith, who had greatly opposed him, ² 'the Lord reward him,' says he, 'according to his works;' where it is to be observed that the king's manuscript reads ἀποδώσει, and not ἀποδώγῃ, that is, shall or will reward, and most of the ancient commentators have remarked, that this is not an imprecation, but a prediction only, not unbecoming an apostle.

What God says of the king of Assyria, whom he calls 'the rod of his anger, and the staff of his indignation,' is not unapplicable to Jehu, after he was advanced to the throne of Israel: 'I sent him against the people of my wrath to tread them down, like mire of the streets, howbeit, he meant not so, neither did his heart think so, but it was in his heart to destroy, and cut off nations not a few.' Jehu indeed made great ostentation of 'his zeal for and the employment of the imperative mood, when declaring future events, is not unusual with the sacred writers, as in Is. vi.

 10; viii. 9, 10; ix. 3; xvii. 1; xxix. 9; Jer. i. 10; Ezek. xlii. 3.
 In some instances, a prayer or wish for the punishment of sinners may be nearly equivalent to a prediction, inasmuch as it is founded on the belief, and meant to imply, that, according to God's moral government of the world, punishment must certainly await them. Some of the imprecations in the Psalms may, then, be understood as declarative of the just judgments of God, which would inevitably fall upon the impious; but in others, and perhaps most of them, both the natural construction of the sentences, and the full force and propriety of the expressions, require them to be taken in an imprecative sense. To explain them in any other sense is doing violence to the laws of grammatical interpretation: yet even in this light, considered as imprecations, they amount to no more than a wish that the impious may be dealt with according to the eternal and unalterable laws of divine justice, that they may openly and before the world receive the penalties of crime, provided it be the will of God; which surely is neither an unnatural nor unreasonable wish in those, who anxiously seek the punishment of vice, and the maintenance of true religion and virtue. In the Psalmist, moreover, it is a wish not proceeding from a desire to gratify a personal and vindictive feeling, but partly from a desire of self-preservation, and partly from anxiety to see the worship and glory of God triumphant over all enemies. Imprecations, therefore, made with the limitations, and originating in the motives just mentioned, so far from being liable to the charge of maliciousness and revenge, are in accordance with the purest spirit of religion, and with the exercise of the most extensive charity. Of all those tremendous imprecations which appear in our common English version of Dent, xxvii. 15—26, there is not one authorized by the original. The Hebrew texts express no kind of wish, but are only so many denunciations of the displeasure of God against those who either were or should be guilty of the sins therein mentioned, and of the judgments which they must expect to be inflicted upon them, unless prevented by a timely and sincere repentance. And agreeably to this view, the sacred text should have been rendered 'cursed they,' or 'cursed are they,' and not 'cursed be they,' in the sense of Let them be cursed; the word be, though inserted in our translation, having nothing answerable to it in the Hebrew.
 —Horne's Introduction.—Ed.

'there should fall to the earth nothing of what he had said concerning the house of Ahab;' and it must be acknowledged, that for his performance of the divine commands in this regard, ⁴ he received commendations from God, and a settlement of his family in the throne of Israel for four successions; and yet we may say of him, 'that he meant not so, neither did his heart think so:' he was still a bad man, though 'he did well in ex-cuting that which was right in God's eyes,' as to the abolishment of the worship of Baal; ⁵ but his obstinate persistence in the sin of Jeroboam may be justly all against him, as an argument of his false-heartedness in all his other actions.

Why he continued in this kind of idolatry, the reasons were much the same with him, that they were with the first institutor of it,—lest, by permitting his subjects to go to the place appointed for divine worship, he might open a door for their return to their obedience to the house of David; and not only so, but disoblige likewise a great part of the nobility of the nation, who, by this time, had been long accustomed, and were warmly affected to the worship of the golden calves: herein, however, he made a plain discovery of his sin and folly, in not daring to trust God with the keeping of his kingdom, though it was from his kindness and donation that he had it, and in apprehending any danger from the house of David, or the kingdom of Judah, which were both now in so weak and declining a condition, that they were much more likely to be swallowed up by him.

⁶ The truth is, Jehu was a wicked, bold, furious, and implacable man; but a man of this complexion, considering the work he was to be set about, was a proper instrument to be employed; and so far is it from tending to the reproach, that it is infinitely to the glory of God, that he can make use of such boisterous and unruly passions of mankind for the accomplishment of his just designs, according to the observation of the royal Psalmist, ⁷ 'Surely the wrath of man shall praise thee, and the remainder of his wrath shalt thou restrain.' This he plainly did in the case of Jehu; for after he had settled him in the possession of a kingdom, and still found that he persisted in his political idolatry, he brought down the king of Syria upon him, ⁸ 'who smote the coasts of Israel,' and quite wasted all that part of his kingdom which lay beyond the river Jordan.

There is this to be said, however, concerning Jehu's cutting off Ahaziah, and ⁹ the other branches of his family, that though his primary intent in doing it was to secure himself in the possession of the kingdom, against all claims that might come from the house of Ahab; yet did he not act entirely contrary to his commission, because ¹⁰ Ahaziah was the son of Athaliah, the daughter of Ahab, and the order of God was, ¹¹ 'that the whole house of Ahab should perish;' but then the question is, where it was that Ahaziah was slain? because in the two accounts that we have of his death, there seems to be some repugnancy. The account which we have in the second book of Kings runs thus:—¹² 'When Ahaziah saw the death of Jehoram king of Israel, he fled by the way of the garden-house, and Jehu followed after him, and said, smite him also in his chariot: and they did so, at the going up to Gur, which is by Ibleam, and he fled to Megiddo, and there died: ¹ but in the book of Chronicles it is said, that ¹ 'when Jehu was executing judgment upon the house of Ahab, and found the princes of Judah, even the sons of the brethren of Ahaziah, that ministered unto Ahaziah, he slew them. And he sought Ahaziah, and they caught him, (for he was hid in Samaria,) and brought him to Jehu, and when they had slain him, they buried him.'

Now, in order to reconcile the different accounts of the same event, we must observe, ² that as one great end of writing the book of Chronicles, was to supply such matters as had been omitted in the book of Kings; so this account of the death of Ahaziah, in the latter, is very short, and included in the story of Jehoram, that the reader, at one and the same view, as it were, might perceive in what manner it was that both these princes fell; but in the former it is told more at large; and therefore, to complete the history, we must take in both accounts, and from thence we may gather,—that upon seeing Jehoram mortally wounded, Ahaziah turned his chariot, and made the best of his way to Samaria, in order to escape into his own kingdom,—but finding the passes too narrowly guarded, he thought proper to conceal himself in the town, in hopes of a better opportunity; that Jehu, in the mean time, coming to Samaria and having intelligence that Ahaziah was lurking there, ordered that diligent search should be made for him, and when he was found, that he should be carried to Gur, the place, in all probability, where his father Joram had slain all his brethren, and there be killed in his chariot, that so his servants might immediately carry off his corpse, and bury it. But as Jehu's order to the officers that were intrusted with the execution, was only, that they should smite him, they thought it enough to give him a mortal wound, so that his servants carried him from thence to Megiddo, the next town in the tribe of Issachar, where he died.

This makes the circumstances consistent: and though we are no ways concerned, especially when the sacred history is silent, to assign any reasons for such furious passions as are frequently observed in great and wicked men; yet it may be no hard matter to imagine something more probable, than what ³ Josephus makes the cause of Jehoram's indignation against Elisha, and his vowing to take off his head; even because he refused to intercede with God for the removal of the famine, that had, at this time, so sorely wasted the city of Samaria. From the many miracles which Elisha did, the king very likely might be convinced, that the same spirit which once resided in Elijah was now descended upon him; and therefore, as Elijah had power, by his prayers, either to shut or open the windows of heaven, either to cause or remove a famine, as he pleased, ⁴ he might possibly imagine, that God had conferred the same privilege upon Elisha, and might therefore be highly incensed against him, because he would not make use of it in the preservation of a city reduced to the utmost distress. But we can hardly imagine, that a wicked and idolatrous prince, as Jehoram certainly was, would ever entertain so high a conception of any of the Lord's prophets: and therefore we must endeavour to find out some other reason for the violence of his rage and indignation against him.

When the prophet Elisha carried the detachment of the Syrian army, which was sent to apprehend him at Dothan, hoodwinked, as it were, into the city of Samaria, Jehoram, we find, would have gladly taken this advantage, and fallen upon them with the sword: ⁵ 'My father, shall I smite, shall I smite them?' So eager was he to have them destroyed, as we may learn from the repetition of his words! But by no means would the prophet permit him; on the contrary, he ordered them to be treated with much civility, and dismissed in peace. A usage this which deserved a better return than what they made the Israelites the year following, when they came and besieged Samaria, and sorely distressed it. The king of Israel, therefore, reflecting on the opportunity which, had he employed it as he desired, would have disabled the army from making any fresh invasions, but was unhappily lost, by listening to an old doated prophet, as he might call him, was grieved beyond measure, and hereupon vowed to make his life pay for the lives of those, who, by his counsel, had escaped, and were now returned to repeat their hostilities. It may be supposed likewise, that upon the return of the Syrian army, the king of Israel, knowing himself in no condition to oppose them, might possibly be for purchasing a peace at any rate; which Elisha might endeavour to dissuade him from, by giving him all along assurance, that the enemy should at length be defeated. Finding however no effect in the prophet's promises, and, on the contrary, seeing his capital closely besieged, and the people reduced to great extremity of want, he began to repent him of following his advice; and being shocked at hearing the horrid story, and that from the mother's own mouth, of her being forced to eat her own child for hunger, he fell into a rage, and vowed to be revenged of Elisha, as one who, by his bad counsel, had occasioned all that misery: ⁶ 'God do so to me, and more also, if the head of Elisha, the son of Shaphat, shall stand on him to-day;' never considering that his own manifold and crying sins, especially his obstinate adhering to the idolatry of the calves, ⁷ and the whoredoms and witchcrafts of his mother Jezebel, were the true and proper causes of all his calamities.

Jehu, as we said before, was a wicked and ambitious man, and it is much to be questioned whether he would have executed the divine will so punctually, had it not fallen in with his own interest and designs. He had now extirpated the house of Ahab, and, as Ahab had been the first introducer of the idolatry of Baal into the kingdom of Israel, he could not but think that the priests and prophets, and such as adhered to the worship of that false God, were of Jezebel's faction, and might, at one time or other, take occasion to revenge her death. Something or other was therefore necessary to be done, in order to get rid of this dangerous set of men, and, that the business might be done effectually, to get rid of them all at once. ⁸ He was a person of a known indifference in matters of religion, who in this regard always conformed to the humours of the court, and, in the reign of king Ahab, had been as strenuous a worshipper of Baal as any; and therefore, how could the people tell, when they read his proclamation for a great feast, and a solemn sacrifice to be offered unto Baal, but that, in good earnest, he had returned to his former love to the religion which he once embraced, and only deserted for a while, in complacency to others? He had gone on a little oddly indeed at his entrance upon the government, had murdered their chief patroness, and made free with some of their priests likewise; but these priests perhaps were ¹ domestics to Jezebel, or too nearly related to Ahab's family, not to go off in the common slaughter. Some instances of this kind could hardly be helped in the heat of execution, when the man was resolved to secure himself, and remove all competitors: but now that he has nothing to fear, why should we think, but that a prince who has no sense of religion at all, should be a worshipper of our god Baal, (that glorious luminary which shines so bright in the firmament of heaven,) as he is of the golden calves?²

Thus, we may suppose, the Baalites reasoned, upon reading the king's proclamation so apparently in favour of their idolatry; and God, in his judgment, suffered their ² 'foolish hearts to be thus darkened, and because they received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved, for this cause he sent upon them a strong delusion, that they might believe a lie.' But whether they deluded themselves into this persuasion or not, this they knew by experience, that Jehu was a man of a fierce and bloody temper, who would not fail to put his threats in execution; and therefore reading in the same proclamation, that ³ 'whosoever shall be wanting, he shall not live,' they found themselves reduced to this sad dilemma, either to go or die; and therefore they thought it the wisest way to run the hazard, and throw themselves upon his mercy, having this at least to plead for themselves, that they were not disobedient to his commands. The only remaining question is, if every one obeyed this summons, how could the temple of Baal be capable of receiving them all?

Now the words of Jehu's summons are these: ⁴ 'Call unto me all the prophets of Baal, all his servants, and all his priests, let none be wanting; for I have a great sacrifice to offer unto Baal. And Jehu did it in subtlety, to the intent that he might destroy the worshippers of Baal;' in which words we may observe, ⁵ that two particular orders of men are distinctly mentioned, the prophets and priests; and therefore we may presume, that the servants and worshippers who are joined with them, were some of an inferior kind, such as Levites in the Jewish, or deacons in the Christian church, who attended upon the other in their sacred ministrations; because in the twenty-second verse, we find Jehu 'ordering him, who was over the vestry, to bring forth vestments for all the worshippers of Baal,' which cannot be meant of the people in general, because they wore no distinct garments in their worship either of God or Baal, but of priests and ministers only. These were the great support of the present idolatry; and therefore Jehu concluded very justly, that, if he did but once destroy them, all the common worshippers would fall away of course.

But, even if we take the words 'servants' and 'worshippers' in their utmost latitude, we need not doubt but that the temple of Baal, ⁶ which was built in the capital city, and near the royal palace, and, being the chief in its kind, was designed for the use of the king and queen, and, particularly perhaps for such great and high solemnities, was large and capacious enough to hold them all. For, besides this principal building, ⁷ there might be several outward courts, as there were in the temple at Jerusalem, where the people stood while they worshipped, as they did in the temple service, and these, together with the temple itself, would afford space sufficient for all the idolaters of that kind, both ministers and people, that were then in the whole kingdom. For, since the days of Ahab, by the ministry of Elijah, Elisha, and the rest of the prophets, as well as by the slaughter which Hazael, in his wars against Israel, had made among many of them, the number of Baal's worshippers had been greatly diminished. Jehoram himself, as we read, ⁸ 'put away the image of Baal that his father had made,' and when the king withdrew his presence and encouragement, his subjects, without doubt, for the generality, followed his example; for it cannot be supposed, that the worship of such senseless idols could ever be kept up, especially among a people that had the oracles of God in their custody, without the influence of some great authority, or the consideration of some wicked and worldly ends.

CHAP. III.—Of Jonah's Mission to Nineveh, and abode in the Whale's Belly.

In the whole compass of the Old Testament, I know of no passage that has been made so popular a topic of banter and ridicule, and which the lovers of infidelity, in all ages, have so much delighted to descant upon, as the story 'of Jonah's continuing three days and three nights in the whale's belly.' The story indeed, at first hearing, sounds surprisingly; and therefore we need not wonder that the wit and sagacity of a Porphyry or a Julian found some plausible exceptions against it, which our modern retailers and malicious improvers of their objections have endeavoured to decry as a wild romance, or at best but a parabolical representation of something else.

'That a man, thrown into the sea with all his clothes on, should, in the very nick of time, meet with a fish, and such a fish as was never heard of before, large enough to swallow him up quick, and, without hurting a hair of his head, to keep him in his stomach for so many days and nights alive; that in this narrow and gloomy prison he should be able to breathe, and live, and be nourished; thence send up his prayers to God, and thence promise himself a deliverance in due time; this is an account of things so very absurd, that there is no possibility of believing it. For admitting that Jonah got safe and sound down the whale's throat, yet how could he subsist there without air, or continue any time without being parboiled? The stomach, we know, would do its office; and, therefore, we cannot but think, that in a few hours, much more in three days, the man

a Baal and Astaroth are commonly joined together; and as it must, of course, have been totally dissolved, and his body converted into the body of the fish; or if its digestion was not so quick, he must, at least, when cast upon the shore, have been sadly sodden, and unfit to be sent upon another expedition.

“What God can do we must not dispute; but then great care should be taken, not to magnify his power to the diminution of his wisdom, or to think, that he is so lavish of his miracles as to save a rebellious prophet, that was disobeying his orders, and fleeing, if possible, from his presence, that deserved indeed to be left to the mercy of the waves, and made food for the fishes of the sea, rather than vouchsafed so stupendous a preservation; and all this, for what? Even to compel him to go, against his will, to a wicked city, with an unwelcome message; as if there had been no prophet in Israel, but this sullen and refractory man, to be sent upon this errand.”

Nineveh, at the time when Jonah was sent thither, was the metropolis of the Assyrian empire, and one of the largest and most ancient cities in the world. According to the best chronologers, it was built not long after the flood, and very soon after the tower of Babel, by Nimrod; but being afterwards greatly enlarged by Ninus, from him it received its name. It was situated upon the banks of the Tigris, and, as Diodorus¹ has given us the description of it, was, in length, 150 stadia; in breadth, 90; and in circumference, 470; which, being reduced to our measure, make it about 21 miles long, 9 broad, and 54 round. How stately its walls, and how lofty its towers were, the same historian has taken care to inform us; and how great the number of its inhabitants was, we may learn from² ‘the 120,000 children, who could not discern between their right hands and their left;’ for, according to a proportionate computation, there must have been in the whole above 600,000 persons.^a

^a Although Nineveh formed the subject of some of the earliest of the prophecies, and was the very first which met its predicted fate, yet a heathen historian, in describing its capture and destruction, repeatedly refers to an ancient prediction respecting it. Diodorus Siculus relates, that the king of Assyria, after the complete discomfiture of his army, confided in an old prophecy, that Nineveh would not be taken unless the river should become the enemy of the city: that after an ineffectual siege of two years, the river, swollen with long-continued and tempestuous torrents, inundated part of the city and threw down the wall for the space of twenty furlongs; and that the king, deeming the prediction accomplished, despaired of his safety, and erected an immense funeral pile, on which he heaped his wealth, and with which himself, his household, and palace were consumed. The book of Nahum was avowedly prophetic of the destruction of Nineveh: and it is therefore told that ‘the gates of the rivers shall be opened, and the palace shall be dissolved.’ ‘Nineveh, of old, like a pool of water—with an overrunning flood he will make an utter end of the place thereof.’ The historian describes the facts by which the other predictions of the prophet were as literally fulfilled. He relates that the king of Assyria, elated with his former victories, and ignorant of the revolt of the Bactrians, had abandoned himself to scandalous inaction; had appointed a time of festivity, and supplied his soldiers with abundance of wine; and that the general of the enemy, apprized, by deserters, of their negligence and drunkenness, attacked the Assyrian army while the whole of them were fearlessly giving way to indulgence, destroyed great part of them, and drove the rest into the city. The words of the prophet were hereby verified: ‘While they be folded together as thorns, and while they are drunken as drunkards, they shall be devoured as stubble fully

Now, we have wrong conceptions of God, if we think that, because he made the children of Israel his peculiar people, he therefore neglected all the world besides. On the contrary,³ ‘Though he showed his word unto dry.’ The prophet promised much spoil to the enemy: ‘Take the spoil of silver, take the spoil of gold; for there is no end of the store and glory out of all the pleasant furniture.’ And the historian affirms, that many talents of gold and silver, preserved from the fire, were carried to Ecbatana. According to Nahum, the city was not only to be destroyed by an overflowing flood, but the fire also was to devour it; and, as Diodorus relates, partly by water, partly by fire, it was destroyed. The utter and perpetual destruction and desolation of Nineveh were foretold: ‘The Lord will make an utter end of the place thereof. Affliction shall not rise up the second time. She is empty, and void, and waste. The Lord will stretch out his hand against the north, and destroy Assyria, and will make Nineveh a desolation, and dry like a wilderness. How is she become a desolation, a place for beasts to lie down in!’ In the second century, Lucian, a native of a city on the banks of the Euphrates, testified that Nineveh was utterly perished,—that there was no vestige of it remaining,—and that none could tell where once it was situated. This testimony of Lucian, and the lapse of many ages during which the place was not known where it stood, render it at least somewhat doubtful whether the remains of an ancient city, opposite to Mosul, which have been described as such by travellers, be indeed those of ancient Nineveh. It is perhaps probable that they are the remains of the city which succeeded Nineveh, or of a Persian city of the same name, which was built on the banks of the Tigris by the Persians, subsequently to the year 230 of the Christian era, and demolished by the Saracens in 632. In contrasting the then existing great and increasing population, and the accumulating wealth of the proud inhabitants of the mighty Nineveh, with the utter ruin that awaited it,—the word of God, (before whom all the inhabitants of the earth are as grasshoppers), by Nahum was—‘Make thyself many as the canker-worm, make thyself many as the locusts. Thou hast multiplied thy merchants above the stars of heaven: the canker-worm spoileth and fleeth away. Thy crowned are as the locusts, and thy captains as the great grasshoppers which camp in the hedges in the cold day; but when the sun riseth they flee away; and their place is not known where they are,’ or were. Whether these words imply that even the site of Nineveh would in future ages be uncertain or unknown, or as they rather seem to intimate, that every vestige of the palaces of its monarchs, of the greatness of its nobles, and of the wealth of its numerous merchants, would wholly disappear; the truth of the prediction cannot be invalidated under either interpretation. The avowed ignorance respecting Nineveh, and the oblivion which passed over it, for many an age, conjoined with the meagreness of evidence to identify it still, prove that the place was long unknown where it stood, and that even now it can scarcely with certainty be determined. And, if the only spot that bears its name, or that can be said to be the place where it was, be indeed the site of one of the most extensive of cities on which the sun ever shone, and which continued for many centuries to be the capital of Assyria,—the ‘principal mounds,’ few in number, which show neither bricks, stones, nor other materials of building, but are in many places overgrown with grass, and resemble the mounds left by intrenchments and fortifications of ancient Roman camps, and the appearances of other mounds and ruins, less marked than even these, extending for ten miles, and widely spread, and seeming to be ‘the wreck of former buildings,’ show that Nineveh is left without one monument of royalty, without any token whatever of its splendour or wealth; that their place is not known where they were; and that it is indeed a desolation—‘empty, void, and waste,’ its very ruins perished, and less than the wreck of what it was. ‘Such an utter ruin,’ in every view, has been made of it; and such is the truth of the divine predictions.—Keith’s Evidence of Prophecy.—Several writers are of opinion that the ruins on the eastern bank of the Tigris, opposite to the town of Mosul, point out the site of the ancient Nineveh. Mr Rich, who was resident at Bagdad, describes on this spot an enclosure of a rectangular form, corresponding with the cardinal points of the compass, but the area of which is too small to have contained a larger town than Mosul. The boundary of this en-

Jacob, and his statutes and ordinances unto Israel,⁷ in a particular manner, yet he did not leave himself without a witness in other nations; but whenever they were drawing destruction upon themselves, took care to acquaint them with their impending doom. To this purpose, we may observe, that not only Isaiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel, but almost all the other prophets, do foretell the destruction of Babylon, and publish the divine threats against Egypt, Edom, and the other kingdoms neighbouring upon Canaan; that ¹ Jeremiah, in particular, was ordered by God to make himself bonds and yokes, and send them to the kings of the Ammonites, of Tyre and Sidon, and other princes, by the hand of their ministers, who were then at the court of Zedekiah king of Judah, with his admonition to their masters, that unless they repented of their evil ways, he would deliver them into the power of Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, whom he calls his servant, even as he does ² Cyrus, his anointed, for being appointed to execute his will, some hundred years before he was born; and, therefore, we need less wonder, that we find God interesting himself in the preservation of the large and populous city of Nineveh, upon which depended the whole fate of the Assyrian empire, since, in all ages, he has given proofs of his protection and absolute dominion over other nations, as well as the Israelites, either in threatening their disobedience, in order to procure their amendment, or if they despised his threatenings, in punishing their obstinacy, as they deserve.

³ 'Is he the God of the Jews only? Is he not also of the Gentiles? Yes, of the Gentiles also,' says an apostle of great authority; and, therefore, we may presume, that as Jonah was the only prophet in the Old Testament that was sent expressly to preach to the Gentiles, God might design hereby to give to his people a premonition of his intention, 'in the fulness of time, ⁴ to raise up a root of Jesse,' as the prophet expresses it, 'which would stand for an ensign of the people, and unto closure, which he supposes to answer to the palace of Nineveh, may be perfectly traced all around, and looks like an embankment of earth or rubbish, of small elevation; and has attached to it, and in its line, at several places, mounds of greater size and solidity. The first of these forms the south-west angle; and on it is built the village of Nebbi Yunus, where they show the tomb of the prophet Jonas. The next, and largest of all, is the one which Mr Rich supposes to be the monument of Nimus, and is situated near the centre of the western face of the enclosure, being joined like the others by the boundary wall; the natives call it Koyunjuk Tepé. Its form is that of a truncated pyramid, with regular steep sides and a flat top; and is composed of stones and earth, the latter predominating sufficiently to admit of the summit being cultivated by the inhabitants of the village of Koyunjuk, which is built on it at the north-east extremity. The measurements of this mound were 178 feet for the greatest height, 1850 feet the length of the summit east and west, and 1147 for its breadth north and south. Out of a mound in the north face of the boundary was dug, some time since, an immense block of stone, on which were sculptured the figures of men and animals. So remarkable was this fragment of antiquity, that even Turkish apathy was roused, and the pacha and most of the principal people of Mosul came out to see it. One of the spectators particularly recollected among the sculptures of this stone, the figure of a man on horseback, with a long lance in his hand, followed by a great many others on foot. These ruins seem to attest the former existence of some extensive buildings on the spot, but whether belonging to the ancient Nineveh will admit of considerable doubt.—Calmet's Dictionary.—E, which the Gentiles should seek: to ⁵ break down the middle wall of partition, even the law of commandments, contained in ordinances; and to unite all nations in one communion, 'under ⁶ one great shepherd and bishop of their souls.'

But whether God might design this call to the Ninevites, as a pledge and assurance of his future admission of the people of all nations into the privileges of the Christian covenant, this certainly he might have under his immediate view, namely, to show the disparity between his people and aliens, and upon the comparison of their several behaviours, shame them for living unreclaimed, under the constant preaching of his prophets for so many years, when a people, whom they despised, as 'being strangers to the covenant of promise,' had, by the mighty power of his word, been converted in the space of three days.

Nothing is more common in Scripture, than to find God complaining of his people for not attending to the messages which he sent them; ⁷ 'since the day that their fathers came forth out of Egypt,' says God to one of his prophets, 'even unto this day, I have sent unto them all my servants, the prophets, daily rising up early, and sending them; yet they hearkened not unto me, nor inclined their ear, but hardened their neck, and did worse than their fathers: therefore shalt thou speak all these words unto them, but they will not hearken, and thou shalt call unto them, but they will not answer thee.' And therefore God, very well foreknowing the success that his prophets would meet with, might send him with commission to preach to the Ninevites, not only in pursuance of his kind purposes to them, but with an intent likewise to render his own people inexcusable, even as our Saviour represents the case of the Jews in his days, who refused to hear him: ⁸ 'The men of Nineveh shall rise in judgment with this generation, and shall condemn it, because they repented at the preaching of Jonah; and behold a greater than Jonah is here.'

And indeed some have imagined, that one great cause of Jonah's declining the order at first, and of his going at last with so much reluctance to Nineveh, might be some suspicion, that in case these Gentiles should listen to his preaching, it might be not only a lasting reproach, but a means of reprobation likewise to his countrymen, who, under the constant ministration of so many prophets, were only become more obdurate in sin; and therefore, jealous of the honour of his nation, and too solicitous for their preservation, he could not prevail with himself to accept of a commission that seemed to interfere with this, lest a ready compliance with the divine command at Nineveh should prove the disparagement at least, if not the utter rejection of ⁹ 'his brethren, his kinsmen after the flesh.'

The prophet himself, however, has suggested another reason for his unwillingness to go to Nineveh, and that is, the superabundant mercy of God, which, he foresaw, would be moved to pity at the prayers and tears of the people; and therefore he remonstrates thus: ¹⁰ 'I pray thee, O Lord, was not this my saying, when I was yet in my country? Therefore I fled before into Tarshish: for I knew that thou art a gracious God, and merciful, slow to anger, of great kindness, and repentest thee of the evil.' But how plausible soever this excuse may be, yet upon the face of the whole affair, it appears that the prophet considered himself a little too much; and therefore we may conclude, that the true reason for his declining this errand, was the hazard and difficulty of the undertaking, and the great uncertainty of its success: the very same thought that deterred Moses from applying to Pharaoh to grant the Israelites their liberty, and Gideon from taking up arms to rescue his country from the slavery of the Midianites: for as each of these made their several excuses; 'I am of uncircumcised lips,' says one, 'and how shall Pharaoh hearken unto me?' and, 'I am the least in my father's house,' says the other, 'and how then shall I save Israel?' So might Jonah say within himself, 'I am less than the least of the prophets,' and how then can I expect that the people of so great and opulent a city will give any attention to my preaching; that they will not rather take the alarm, and fall upon me, and slay me, when I come to tell them that their ruin and destruction is so near approaching? I will get quit of this dangerous affair, therefore, as well as I can; and because I conceive that the spirit of prophecy, which upon this account makes me so uneasy, will not pursue me, after I am gone out of the holy land, I will make the best of my way into Cilicia; for when I have got at some distance from Judea, God perhaps may think no more of sending me, but may find him out some other prophet, that is better qualified for this purpose.' But 'whither shall I go from thy Spirit?' as one better instructed than Jonah seems to be in this article of his omnipresence, addresses himself to God, 'or whither shall I flee from thy presence? If I ascend up into heaven, thou art there; if I go down into hell, thou art there also; if I take the wings of the morning, and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea, even there also shall thy hand lead me, and thy right hand shall hold me;' which no man ever so experimentally found to be true as did this prophet, while he sojourned in the deep, and took up his habitation in the whale's belly.

² Some learned men indeed are of opinion, that the fish which swallowed up Jonah was not a whale, because the largest of these, as they tell us, have but in proportion very narrow gullets, such as are not capable of receiving a man entirely into their stomachs: and therefore they imagine that it was what they call the lamia, or seadog, which, though less in bulk than a whale, has a gullet so vastly large, that frequently in its stomach have been found men, all whole and entire, ³ and sometimes clad in armour.

It must be acknowledged, that the Hebrew dag-gadol, which the text in Jonah makes use of, signifies no more than any great fish; but then it makes something for the common opinion, that the whale is the largest species we know of that swims in the sea. The ancients indeed seem to have enlarged too much in their account of this animal. ⁴ Pliny talks of some that were 600 feet long, and above half as much broad. Solinus ⁵ makes others no less than 800 feet; and Dionysius ⁶ seems to affirm of others, that they had a throat wide enough to swallow up a ship with all its rigging. But though these may pass for extravagant exaggerations, ⁷ an author who has written expressly upon this subject gives us this account:—"That in the northern seas, there are whales of such a prodigious bigness, that when their flesh is taken off, and nothing left but their skeletons, they look like large vessels, or rather like spacious houses, with several chambers and windows in them, wherein a whole family might find room to live." Their mouth, every one allows, is capable of containing several men at once. We are told ⁸ of one cast on the coast of Tuscany, in the year 1624, whose jaws were so wide, that a man on horseback might have ridden into them with ease: and we have not much reason to doubt, but that their throat and belly are answerable ⁹ to so spacious an opening.

It cannot be thought, indeed, but the œsophagus in creatures that are dead, must be contracted to a great degree, in comparison to what it is when they are alive, and especially when they are eating; in which case it is capable of so great dilatation, as is evident from a pike's sometimes swallowing another fish almost of his own magnitude, that we need not much fear, but that the fish, which God had provided for that purpose, was able to gulp Jonah down at once, without ever hurting him. For the whale, as we are told has neither teeth nor tusks, whereas the seadog has four or five rows of teeth in each jaw, and is therefore the much properer of the two to receive into its stomach any thing alive without the danger of contusion.

Thus we have conveyed Jonah safe and sound into the whale's belly; let us, in the next place, see how he is to live there for the space of three days. The Scripture indeed speaks precisely of ¹⁰ 'three days and three nights;' but as Jonah was a type of our Saviour, and his abode in the belly of the whale, a prefiguration of our Lord's continuance ¹¹ 'in the heart of the earth,' there is some reason to think, that the type and the antitype, in this respect, were both alike; and that as our Lord was but one whole day, and part of two more, in the grave, so Jonah might continue no longer in the deep, and yet according to the Hebrew way of computation, both might be truly said to have been 'three days and three nights,' in their respective confinements. But not to insist on this abbreviation of time, what some naturalists tell us of the food of the whale, namely, that it does not live on flesh, but on weeds, on the froth of the sea, on insects, and such small fish as are easy of digestion; and that, consequently, as having a colder stomach, it was a fitter receptacle for the prophet, than any other fish that was carnivorous; this might be of some consideration perhaps, were we not disposed to call in the miraculous power of God, which alone could preserve him in these circumstances. But then, we cannot but allow, that as he suspended the violence of the fire from hurting the three young men that were cast into the furnace: that as he made St Peter's body either so light as to walk upon the waters, or the waters so solid as to support it; so with the same facility, he might control the acid humours in any creature's stomach, and make it, for such a determinate time, lose its faculty of digestion: for in all this there is nothing that surpasses the power of the great Author of nature, who gives or suspends the activity of all bodies, who stops or controls, who changes or modifies, as he thinks fit, all the motions which he communicates to matter, of what kind soever it be. And, in like manner, though it be impossible, according to the ordinary laws of nature, for a man to breathe in the stomach of a fish, or at least to draw in such a quantity of air as is requisite to give a due circulation to his blood; yet since it is neither contrary to the nature nor superior to the power of God, by one means or other to effect the thing, if it be but agreeable to his will, we cannot see any reason why it may not be done.

Bats and swallows, and other birds, which in the cold season of the year, creep into cliffs of rocks, and hollow trees,¹ creatures that live under ground, and several others that abide at the bottom of deep water, subsist in a manner without breathing. They live, as it were in a deliquium of life, and the blood in their veins seems to move very slowly, if at all; and yet we find them revive again, upon the approach of the genial heat of the sun, to give their blood and juices a brisker fermentation; and why might not God then, during these three days and nights, put Jonah into the very same state of repose and tranquillity, that either the element they live in, or the colder season of the year, do naturally bring upon these animals, by correcting the fluidity, and retarding the circulation of his blood, so as to make frequent respiration not so necessary?

The ancient physicians were of opinion, that while the child continued in its mother's womb, it lived without breathing, so that there was no employment for the lungs, until it came into the open air; but later anatomists will persuade us, that, without some circulation of blood in the body, no animal can live; and therefore they pretend to have found out in the fœtus a considerable artery, which conveys the blood from the vena cava, without its passing into the right ventricle of the heart, into the lungs; from whence by another smaller artery, which they call the total, it is carried into the aorta, and so continues in a perpetual circulation, without entering the lobes of the lungs, which are not replete with blood, nor begin to move, until the child is born and sucks in the fresh air. For then, say they, the blood being forced by the motion of the heart into the artery, whose orifice lies in its right ventricle, goes directly into the lungs, and is thence brought back by the pulmonary vein, so that the other vessels which help the circulation of blood in the fœtus, being now become useless, do by degrees stop and are dried up. But it may not always happen so: in some particular persons nature sometimes preserves them open: and this is the reason which some give us why the divers, as they are called, who accustom themselves to go under deep water to discover and bring up the riches of the deep, can abide so long in that element without breathing.²

We pretend not however to advance, that Jonah was one of this sort of men; but still we may affirm, that it was in God's power, during his continuance in the fish's belly, to put him in such a state of acquiescence, and his blood into such a form of circulation, as would require no more respiration than the fœtus has in the womb. In this there is nothing impossible, nothing incompatible with the laws of nature; though it must be acknowledged that strictly speaking the thing is above the ordinary and known laws of nature, and therefore miraculous: but then if we believe not this miracle, why should we believe any other, or why should it be thought a more incredible thing, that Jonah should live three days in the belly of a large fish, than that Lazarus³ should be recalled to life again, after he had been four days buried in the grave; that the prophet should return from this sea-monster's stomach, safe and sound, than that the⁴ three Jews in Babylon should escape from the flaming furnace, without having so much "as the smell of the fire pass upon them?"

"But other miracles, it may be said, were done for some wise ends of providence, and when there appeared an urgent occasion for God's exerting his almighty power; whereas, in the case before us, there seems to be none at all."

That prophets, however, invested with great power, and sometimes intrusted with high commissions from God, were⁵ 'men subject to like passions' and infirmities as we are, is evident, not only from the testimony of the apostle, but from the accounts of their own behaviour likewise. The prophet that was sent to Bethel, to denounce God's judgment against the idolatrous altar, was a sad example of human frailty, in giving credit to the persuasions of another, even when they contradicted a divine command. Jonah, when he was directed to go to Nineveh, discovered the like if not greater tokens of human infirmity, when, instead of pursuing that journey, he bent his course another way, not without some vain hopes of evading, by that means, the divine presence: and therefore as God sent a lion to slay the prophet of Judah, for his too much credulity; so some have imagined, that he not only pursued this prophet of Israel with a dreadful storm, but even had him thrown overboard, and swallowed up by this sea-monster, in punishment for his perverseness and prevarication. God indeed, by his 'varruling power, made the belly of this monster a place of security to him; but what notions the prophet himself had of this strange habitation,⁶ 'where the floods compassed him about, and the billows and waves passed over him,' we may learn from his meditations in the deep,⁷ 'when he cried, by reason of his affliction, to the Lord, and he heard him;' so that, upon the presumption that God intended not to destroy him, the primary reason, we may imagine, for his appointing this fish to swallow him up, was to stop this fugitive prophet, as he was endeavouring to make his escape: but then, 'in the midst of judgment, thinking upon mercy,' after a confinement of three nights and three days in the deep, whereby he both taught him better obedience for the future, and rectified his notions concerning the divine omnipresence, he ordered his jailor, if we may so speak, to give him his liberty, and deliver him safe on shore.

The oriental traditions do vastly differ as to the place where Jonah was cast upon the land. ¹ Josephus must needs be under a gross mistake, when, to throw him upon some coast of the Euxine sea, he makes the whale, which could hardly be any quick mover, run 800 leagues, at least, in three days and nights; neither are others, who from the upper part of the Mediterranean, carry him into the ocean, and thence into the Red Sea, or the Persian Gulf, in the like space of time, any happier in their conjectures. The ship, we know, was bound for Tarsus ² a great trading town in Cilicia, a province in Asia Minor, at the east end of the Mediterranean Sea; and therefore the most probable opinion is, that somewhere on this coast, the fish disembogued itself of Jonah; and if so, the mariners, who by the time that he was set on shore, had arrived at their port, when they heard the strange account of his deliverance, must have become converts to the worship of that God only, who, in this instance, had shown himself able, ³ 'to do whatever he pleased in heaven, and in the earth, in the sea, and in all the deep places.'

In the storm which St Paul, in his voyage from Crete to Rome, underwent, an angel stood by him one night, and said unto him, ⁴ 'Lo, God hath given thee all them that sail with thee:' and if, by the expression, we may understand the salvation of their souls, as well as their bodies, a sufficient reason it was, for God's permitting this distress to fall upon them, since eventually it proved the occasion of their conversion. And, in like manner, if the sudden ceasing of the storm upon 'Jonah's being cast forth into the sea,' ⁵ made so strong an impression upon the mariners that sailed with him, how can we think, but that his miraculous escape out of that merciless element, especially when he came to recount the particulars of it, would make them all proselytes to his religion? And if we may suppose further, that some of the ship's crew accompanied him to Nineveh, as knowing the purpose of his errand thither, to testify to the people that he was the same man who was in this manner delivered from the jaws of the deep, or that the Ninevites came by their intelligence of this miracle by some other means, we have here a good reason why they attended to his message, and repented at his preaching; and consequently why God wrought this wonderful work upon him, in order to give his predictions more weight and authority.

Nay, farther, we may suppose, that when the people of Nineveh heard Jonah preaching about their streets, and threatening their city with so sudden a destruction, their curiosity would naturally lead them to inquire who that person was, and by whose authority it was that he took so much upon him? and being informed that he was of a nation, ⁶ 'which had God more nigh unto them in all things that they called upon him for, and had statutes and judgments more righteous' than any other people upon earth: a nation ⁷ 'to whom,' as the apostle expresses it, 'appertained the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the law, and the service of God, and the promises:' a nation ⁸ 'which the Lord had taken from the midst of another nation,' had brought out of Egypt, and settled in Canaan, 'by temptations, by signs, and by wonders, and by war, and by a mighty hand, and by a stretched out arm, and by great terrors;' and that he, in particular, was a prophet of this great God, who 'had made the heavens and the earth, the sea, and all that in them is,' and who, for his disobedience in refusing to come upon this errand, had confined him in the deep for three days and nights, but now, upon his humiliation, had set him free from his ghastly prison, and given him courage to speak with so much boldness; the people, I say, who were informed of all this, could not well fail of giving God the glory due unto his name, for sending a prophet of his favourite nation, and one of so distinguished a character, to give them notice of their impending doom.

⁹ 'I wrought for my name's sake,' says God, remembering the wondrous things which he had done for the children of Israel, 'I wrought for my name's sake, that it should not be polluted among the heathen, among whom they were, in whose sight I made myself known unto them, in bringing them out of the land of Egypt:' and therefore we may well admit, as another motive to his working this miracle, the desire he had to raise the fame of a nation he had taken so immediately under his care, as well as to have the glory of his own name magnified among the Gentiles. To which we may add that most weighty reason of all, which our blessed Saviour suggests: ¹⁰ 'An evil and adulterous generation seeketh after a sign, and there shall no sign be given it, but the sign of the prophet Jonas: for as Jonas was three days and three nights in the whale's belly, so shall the Son of man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth.' So that the great design of God's exhibiting, at this time, this miracle in the person of Jonah, was to confirm, in future ages, the great and fundamental article of our faith, upon which the whole superstructure of the Christian religion depends, 'the resurrection of our Saviour Christ;' and that whenever the reality of that fact, as it is related in the New Testament, came to be called in question, we might be furnished with a parallel instance of the mighty power of God recorded in the Old.

Nor is it only in the sacred records that we meet with this history of Jonah, but in the fables, related by several heathen authors, both in verse and prose, we find evident footsteps and memorials of it. Hercules was the great champion of the Grecians, and his fame they were wont to adorn with all the remarkable exploits that they could in any nation hear of. It is not improbable therefore, ¹¹ that the adventure of his jumping down the throat of the sea-dog, which Neptune had sent to devour him, and there concealing himself for three days, without any manner of hurt, save the loss of a few hairs, which came off by the heat of the creature's stomach, was founded upon some blind tradition which these people might have of what happened to Jonah. Nor can the known story of Arion, thrown overboard by the seamen, but taken up by a dolphin, and carried safe to Corinth, be justly referred to any other original; since, ¹ besides some resemblance in their names, and no great disparity in the times wherein they lived, which are both circumstances that make for this hypothesis, the supposed difference in their respective callings can be no manner of objection to it, ² because the same word in the Hebrew tongue signifies both a prophet and a musician. And therefore it is remarkable, that as Arion played the tune wherewith he charmed and allured the fish to save him, before he jumped overboard; so Jonah, when he found himself safely landed, uttered, what is called ³ a prayer indeed, but is, in reality, a lofty hymn in commemoration of his great deliverance, as appears by this specimen: ⁴ "The waters compassed me about, even to the soul; the depth closed me round about, and weeds were wrapped about my head. I went down to the bottoms of the mountains; the earth, with her bars, was about me for ever; yet hast thou brought up my life from the pit, O Lord my God."

CHAP. IV.—On Jonah's Mission to Nineveh, and abode in the Whale's belly.

SUPPLEMENTAL BY THE EDITOR.

THE author of the Fragments appended to Calmet's Dictionary, explains this, not of a living animal, but of a floating preserver, by which Jonah was saved from drowning. He remarks that the word which is used in the original, 'Dag,' signifies primarily a fish; yet, that it also signifies a fish boat, and figuratively a preserver, so that the passage will admit of being rendered thus: 'the Lord prepared a large preserver to receive Jonah, and Jonah was in the inner part,' the belly or hold, 'three days and nights, and then was cast up on the shore.'

But this fanciful interpretation cannot be adopted, because it contradicts the express declaration of our Lord.⁵ There are four objections urged to the account which is given us of this miracle: first, that the gullet of a whale is too small to admit the body of a man. Secondly, that though admitted entire into the stomach of this fish, he could not live there. Thirdly, that there are no whales in the Mediterranean sea. And fourthly, that the whole story is rendered improbable by the representation given of the character and religious principles of Jonah.

The first objection is refuted by observations which have been made on the natural history of the whale. Captain Scoresby states, that when the mouth of the great common whale is open, it presents a cavity as large as a room, and capable of containing a merchant ship's jolly boat full of men, being six or eight feet wide, ten or twelve feet high, and fifteen or sixteen feet long.⁶ The objection of infidel writers, therefore, in regard to this point, is vain and unfounded.

But it is further alleged, that though the body of a man might be admitted entire into the stomach of this fish, he could not live there. But Dr Mosely has ascertained by the most decisive experiments, that digestion in fishes is not produced either by trituration or by the heat of the stomach. "I generally found," says he, "after cutting up the stomachs of many cod-fish just as they came alive out of the water,—small oysters, muscles, cockles, and crabs, as well as small fishes of their own and other species. The coldness of the stomach of these fishes, is far greater than the temperature of the water out of which they are taken, or of any other part of the fish, or of any other substance of animated nature I ever felt. On wrapping one of them round my hand, immediately on being taken out of the fish, it caused so much aching and numbness that I could not endure it long." "Animals or parts of animals, possessed of the living principle, when taken into the stomach, are not," says Mr John Hunter,⁷ "in the least affected by the powers of that viscus, so long as the animal principle remains. Thence it is that we find animals of various kinds living in the stomach, or even hatched and bred there; but the moment that any of these lose the living principle, they become subject to the digestive power of the stomach. If it were possible for a man's hand, for example, to be introduced into the stomach of a living animal, and kept there for some considerable time, it would be found that the dissolvent powers of the stomach could have no effect upon it; but if the same hand were separated from the body, and introduced into the same stomach, we should then find, that the stomach would immediately act upon it. Indeed, if this were not the case, we should find that the stomach itself ought to have been made of indigestible materials; for, if the living principle were not capable of preserving animal substances from undergoing that process, the stomach itself would be digested. But we find, on the contrary, that the stomach, which at one instant, that is, while possessed of the living principle, was capable of resisting the digestive power which it contained, the next moment, namely, when deprived of the living principle, is itself capable of being digested, either by the digestive powers of other stomachs, or by the remains of that power which it had of digesting other things."

Still, however, it is stated, by way of objection, that there are no whales in the Mediterranean sea. With the view of obviating this objection, some writers have supposed that the shark may have been the fish which is here intended. But in truth, the objection which this hypothesis is designed to meet, is frivolous: for on any supposition the preservation of Jonah was owing to a miraculous interposition of providence. It is expressly asserted, "that God had prepared a great fish:" and who will say, that God could not by an impulse communicated bring the whale to the side of the ship, and prepare it for the purpose which it was intended to answer?

But the fourth objection to the whole of this narration is, that the story is rendered improbable by the representation given of the character and religious principles of Jonah. Can we imagine that a man would have been selected, to deliver a message from God to the great city of Nineveh, who was himself so ignorant as to suppose that he could flee from the presence of the Creator and Governor of the universe, and whose dispositions were so perverse as to make him unwilling to execute a commission the most honourable that could be intrusted to man?

A candid consideration of the circumstances of the case will show that there is no force whatever even in this objection.—Of Jonah little more is known than that he was of Gath-hepher, a town in the tribe of Zebulun, and connected with the kingdom of Israel. He was not ignorant, as has been imagined, that Jehovah is the God of the whole earth, whose dominion is universal, and from whose presence no swiftness can flee. But by fleeing unto Tarshish from the presence of the Lord, he meant a withdrawal from that prophetic ministry in the immediate and more special presence of God, as it were, which he had been called to discharge. Some think, that he declined going to Nineveh to denounce the judgments of God against it, because he was jealous for the honour of Israel, and was not willing that the Gentiles should partake of the benefits of prophecy; and he afterwards intimates¹ that he apprehended that God would mercifully spare Nineveh, and that he should be despised and punished as a false prophet. But when we consider the perils and hardships to which this journey and message were likely to expose him; when we imagine to ourselves the probable reception of a despised prophet of Israel in this proud idolatrous city, come avowedly to predict its speedy destruction; and that this might draw on him the resentment both of the rulers and the multitude, we shall not wonder that he was extremely reluctant to undertake the service. How often does it happen, that the servant of the Lord wishes for a removal from his post merely to escape the opposition with which he may be assailed,—not remembering that, however painful may be his circumstances, he is safe while in the path of duty, and that in fleeing from that path still greater trials await him!

Strong faith and a habit of unreserved obedience were necessary to overcome the reluctance that Jonah must have felt. He seems to have supposed that the spirit of prophecy would not rest on him, if he left the land of Israel to go some other way than to Nineveh: he desired to be freed from those impulses with which he had not courage and faith to comply, and he therefore proposed 'to flee unto Tarshish from the presence of the Lord.' Accordingly, he went to Joppa, a seaport town, about forty miles from Gath-hepher, where he is supposed to have dwelt. There he met with a vessel about to sail to Tarshish, and, paying the fare, went aboard, not expecting to be pursued by more imminent danger, than any of those from which he fled. A tempest was commissioned to arrest the ship. The affrighted mariners having some sense of a superior power, but no right knowledge of the true God; and being of different countries, cried, every one to the idol that he had been used to worship, for deliverance from death. The extraordinary nature of this tempest, and the general notions of a superior power, and of right and wrong, which these men entertained, induced them to conclude, that some atrocious criminal sailed with them, for whose cause this evil had befallen them. They agreed to decide, by casting lots, who was the criminal. This was an appeal to the heart-searching God, and to his providence; and he was pleased to determine the matter for them, by causing the lot to fall upon Jonah. When he was thus singled out as the culprit, whom divine vengeance pursued, the mariners calmly entreated him to inform them, whether he was not conscious of some great crime, for which this calamity was come upon them.

Without reserve Jonah told them of his people and religion, as a worshipper of Jehovah the God of heaven, the Creator both of the sea and the dry land; and at the same time ingenuously confessed his sin. This exceedingly alarmed them; and perceiving that the tempest continued to increase, and not knowing how to act, inquired of Jonah himself as the prophet of Jehovah, what they ought to do in this emergency. He, convinced of his sin and folly, and perhaps receiving some intimation of the divine will, counselled them to cast him into the sea, and then the tempest would cease, for he knew that it was raised on his account. When they found that their endeavours to preserve his life and their own were in vain; and after they had prayed to Jehovah not to impute to them the guilt of murder when in self-preservation they sacrificed his servant, they cast him overboard. The storm having ceased immediately, they were so impressed with what they had seen and heard, that they feared the mighty power of God, and worshipped his name. "Disclaiming all their idol gods," says Bishop Hall, "they offered a sacrifice to the only true God, and made vows to him, to worship him at Jerusalem."

SECT. I V

CHAP. I.—From the Death of Uzziah, to the Death of Josiah king of Judah.

THE HISTORY.

THE interregnum,^a or vacancy in the throne of Israel, which lasted for two and twenty years and upwards, occasioned so general a confusion, that the people at length came to a resolution to place Zechariah, the son of Jeroboam, and the fourth^b and last of Jehu's line,

^a This interregnum some chronologers make longer, and some shorter, according as they suppose that Zechariah reigned more or less in conjunction with his father: but that there was manifestly a vacancy in the throne of Israel for the time assigned, is evident from hence: that Jeroboam II., who began to reign in the fifteenth year of Amaziah king of Judah, died in the fifteenth year of Uzziah; and that his son Zechariah began not to reign till the eight and thirtieth year of the said Uzziah: so that there was plainly all this interregnum; but whence it was occasioned, whether by foreign wars, or rather by domestic confusions, as appears by the unfortunate end of the successors, we are nowhere told.—Patrick's Commentary.

^b God had promised Jehu, that, for executing his will upon the house of Ahab, he would continue the crown of Israel in his family for four generations; and accordingly Jehoahaz, Joash, Joram, and Zechariah succeeded him; but because he did it not so much in obedience to the divine command, as to satisfy his private and ambitious views, and in a method of cruelty quite abhorrent to the divine nature, God cut his family short, as soon as he had fulfilled his promise to him, and thereby accomplished the prophecy of Hosea: 'I will avenge the blood of Jezreel upon the house of Jehu, and will cause to cease the

upon the throne. This happened in the eight and thirtieth year of Uzziah king of Judah; but as he proved a wicked prince, and followed the steps of his ancestors, he did not live long to enjoy the government; for at the end of six months he was murdered by Shallum, who usurped the throne, but enjoyed it no longer than one month. For Menahem, general of the king's forces, which were then besieging Tirzah, hearing of what Shallum had done, immediately raised the siege, and marching directly to Samaria, defeated and slew Shallum; and by the power and authority of the army, placed himself upon the throne. Not long after this, he returned with his army to Tirzah; ^a but the inhabitants refusing to open the gates, he took the place by storm, and so having spoiled it, and laid all the country waste as far as Tiphzah, he came and sat down before it: but when the people of Tiphzah, in like manner, refused to open their gates, and submit to him, without distinction of age or sex, he put them all to the sword, and, in short, was so barbarously cruel, as to ^b rip up the very women that were with child.

kingdom of the house of Israel (chap. i. 4.), and perhaps it was in remembrance of this prophecy, as well as of the promise which confined the kingdom in Jehu's family to four generations only (2 Kings xv. 10.), that Shallum was encouraged to attempt the life of Zechariah.—Patrick's Commentary and Poole's Annotations.

^a This is a place we find frequent mention of in the sacred records, because it was a long time the regal city of the kingdom of Israel, after that the ten tribes had revolted from the house of David. Jeroboam, who was the first king of Israel, though he dwelt for some time in Shechem, in his latter days at least, resided here, as did all the other kings of Israel, until Omri, having reigned six years in Tirzah, built Samaria, and removed the royal seat thither, where it continued until a final period was put to that kingdom. Now the reason which induced the first kings of Israel to make Tirzah the place of residence, may be gathered from that expression in Canticles, 'Thou art beautiful, O my love, as Tirzah,' (vi. 4.) which certainly implies that Tirzah was a beautiful and pleasant city to dwell in. But how famous and beautiful a place soever this city was, we have no certain account of its situation: only it is supposed by most, that as Jeroboam was of the tribe of Ephraim, he would naturally be inclined to make choice of a place within the compass of his tribe for his royal city: and this opinion is thought to receive confirmation from the word Ephraim's being frequently used to denote the whole kingdom of Israel, even because its capital city was situated in that tribe. However this be, it is pretty plain, from the circumstances of the story, that the Tiphzah where Menahem exercised so much cruelty, was not the town of that name which lay upon the Euphrates, mentioned in 1 Kings iv. 21, as one of the boundaries of Solomon's dominion, but some place not far from Tirzah, and consequently, very probably in the tribe of Ephraim.—Hells' Geography of the Old Testament, vol. 3.

^b Josephus does not indeed make mention of this particular instance of his unrelenting cruelty; but this he tells us, that "when he had taken the town, he put all to the sword, without sparing a man, woman, or child; and that he exercised such merciless rigour and inhumanity towards his own countrymen, as would have been unpardonable even to the worst of barbarians;" but by these methods he thought, no doubt, to terrify the whole kingdom, so that none might dare to withstand him.—Jewish Antiq. b. 9. c. 11. and Patrick's Commentary.

^c This is the first time that we find any mention made of the kingdom of Assyria, since the days of Nimrod, who erected a small principality there (Gen. x. 11.), and Pul, or Phul, is the first monarch of that nation who invaded Israel, and began their transportations out of their country. Some are of opinion that he was the same with Belesis, the governor of Babylon, who, together with Arbaces the Mede, slew Sardanapalus, the last of the Assyrian monarchs, and translated the empire to the Chaldeans. Our excellent Patrick seems to be confident in this. But according to our learned Prideaux, Belesis was one generation later: and therefore it is supposed that this Pul was the father of Sardanapalus, who was called Sardon with the annexation of his father's name Pul, in the same manner as Merodach king of Babylon was called Merodach-baladan, because he was the son of Baladan. This Pul, therefore, was the same king of Assyria who, when Jonah preached against Nineveh, gave great tokens of his humiliation and repentance. [Dr Hales thinks he was son of that king]—Ed. The only difficulty is, that he seems to have marched his army from Babylon, and not from Nineveh, and yet his son and successor, we find, lived at Nineveh; but then it is suggested that, as the kings of Assyria resided sometimes at Babylon, and sometimes at Nineveh, it is not improbable Pul, to avoid the judgments which Jonah threatened against the latter, might remove to Babylon, where he resided the remaining part of his reign; and this made it so convenient for him to attack the Israelites on the other side of Jordan.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 747, and Bedford's Scripture Chronology, b. 6.

^d This shows that Menahem was a man of great weight and consideration; since, notwithstanding all his violence and cruelty, he left the kingdom in his own family, which his two predecessors could not do. It is manifest, however, that there was a small interregnum of about a year's continuance, between his death and his son's accession: for his son did not begin to reign till the fiftieth year of Uzziah, and yet he must have been dead the year before, because it is said of him, (2 Kings xv.) that he began to reign in the thirty-ninth year of Uzziah, and reigned but ten years. There was therefore apparently an interregnum; but what the occasion of it was, it is not so well known; though there is room to suppose, that it proceeded from the interest of his successor, who might raise a party to keep him out of the throne, as he did afterwards to deprive him both of that and life. For, according to Josephus, "he was cut to pieces, with several of his friends about him, at a public feast, by the treasonable practices of Pekah, one of his principal officers, who, seizing upon the government, reigned about twenty years, and left it at last a difficult question to determine, 'Whether he was more remarkable for his impiety towards God, or for his injustice towards men?'" —Josephus's Antiquities, b. 9. c. 11., and Bedford's Scripture Chronology, b. 6.

^e He is supposed by some to have been the son and successor of Sardanapalus, who restored the kingdom of Assyria, and possessed it, after it had been dismembered by Belesis and Arbaces; but our learned Prideaux (who begins his excellent Connection of the History of the Old and New Testament at this period) makes him to be the same with Arbaces, by Elion called Thilgamus, and by Castor, Ninus Junior; who, together with Belesis, headed the conspiracy against Sardanapalus, and fixed his royal seat at Nineveh, the ancient residence of the Assyrian kings, as Belesis, who in Scripture is likewise called Baladan, (Is. xxxix. 1.) did his at Babylon, and there governed his new erected empire for nineteen years.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 747.

^f After he had murdered his predecessor Pekah, the eunuchs of

done his predecessor, and after an interregnum of nine years, ^a thrust himself into the throne; but it was not long before he found that his usurpation was attended with many incumbrances.

Salmaneser, who, in the fourteenth year of Ahaz, king of Judah, succeeded his father Tiglath-Pileser, in the kingdom of Assyria, invaded his country, and having subdued Samaria, made him promise to become his vassal, and to pay him an annual tribute. For some time Hoshea sent his presents, and his tribute money, very punctually; but having entered into a confederacy with So ^b king of Egypt, by his assistance he hoped to be able to shake off the Assyrian yoke; and therefore withdrew his subjection, and would pay no more tribute; whereupon Salmaneser ^c marched with an army against him, and having subdued all the country round, and amassed a ^d great quantity of rich prey, he came, and sat down before Samaria. The town held out for three years; but being at length compelled to surrender, Salmaneser quite demolished it. He took Hoshea, and put him in chains, and shut him up in prison all his days; and having ^e carried the people into captivity, and placed them in the north parts of Assyria, and in the cities of the Medes, he sent several colonies of his own subjects from Babylon, and other provinces, to replenish the land: but being too few for this purpose, and withal a very wicked and idolatrous people, the divine providence the land seem to have taken the government into their own hands; for he had not the possession of the kingdom till the latter end of the twelfth year of Ahaz, that is, about nine years after he had committed the fact. He came to the crown, it must be owned, in a very wicked manner, and yet his character in Scripture is not so vile as many of his predecessors, (2 Kings xvii. 2.) For whereas the kings of Israel had hitherto maintained guards upon the frontiers, to hinder their subjects from going to Jerusalem to worship, Hoshea took away these guards, and gave free liberty to all to go and pay their adorations where the law had directed. And therefore, when Hezekiah invited all Israel to come to his passover, this prince permitted all that would to go: and when, upon their return from that festival, they destroyed all the monuments of idolatry that were found in the kingdom of Samaria, instead of forbidding them, in all probability he gave his consent to it; because without some tacit encouragement at least, they durst not have ventured to do it.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 729.

^a Ten years, according to Hales.—Ed.

^b This So, with whom Hoshea entered into confederacy, is, in profane authors, called Sabacon, that famous Ethiopian, mentioned by Herodotus and Diodorus Siculus, who, in the beginning of Hezekiah's reign, invaded Egypt, and having taken Boccharris, the king thereof, prisoner, had him, in great cruelty, burnt alive, and then seized on his kingdom.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 726.

^c Salmaneser, who in Tobit i. 2, is called Enemessar, and in Hosea x. 14, Shalman, was the son and successor of Arbaces, or Tiglath-Pileser, and according to Josephus, who has quoted a passage from Menander, there is mention made of him, and of his conquest of the land of Israel, in the history of the Tyrians.—Jewish Antiq. b. 9. c. 14.

^d In this expedition, among other rich things which he took and carried away, was the golden calf which Jeroboam had set up at Bethel, which, ever since his time, had been worshipped by the ten tribes that had revolted with him from the house of David, as the other golden calf, which he, at the same time set up at Dan, had been taken thence, about ten years before, by his father Tiglath-Pileser, when he invaded Galilee, the province wherein that city stood.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 729.

permitted lions, ^f and other wild beasts, to multiply upon them to such a degree, that they were forced to make a representation thereof at the Assyrian court, namely, "that being ignorant of the manner wherein they were to worship the god of the country, they supposed that this affliction was sent upon them; and therefore they humbly prayed, that some priest of the Jewish nation might be sent to instruct them in that particular."^g This accordingly was done: but as these colonies consisted of a mixture of different nations and provinces, they joined the worship of the true God with that of the several idols of the countries from whence they came; so that one might have seen the people who came from Babylon worshipping Succoth-Benoth; ^h the inhabitants of Cuthath, ⁱ praying to Nergal; ^k those of ^f Josephus, in this part of the history, takes the liberty to alter the sense of the sacred text: for instead of the increase of lions, which destroyed the people, he tells us, "that they were visited with a dreadful plague, so that the place was in a manner quite depopulated by it." But allowing it to be lions, why should these new inhabitants be afflicted with these creatures 'for not fearing the Lord,' (2 Kings xvii. 25.) when the Israelites, who feared the Lord as little as they, were never infested with any such thing? The Israelites were addicted to idolatry; but then they did not deny the divine power and providence, only they imagined, that their idols were the intermediate causes whereby the blessedness of the supreme God might be conveyed to them; whereas these new comers believed the idols that they worshipped to be true gods, and had no conceptions higher. They had no notion of one eternal, almighty, and independent being. The God of Israel they took to be such an one as their own, a topical god, whose power and care extended no farther than to one particular nation or people; and therefore, to rectify their sentiments in this particular, he took this method to let them know, that 'all the beasts of the forest were his,' and that whenever he is incensed with a people, he wants not instruments to execute his wrath; the air, the earth, the elements, and creatures of any kind, can avenge him, and punish them.—Jewish Antiq. b. 9. c. 14. and Calmel's Commentary.

^g Imperfect as this teaching was, it is in the end overthrew the idolatry of these people, so that soon after the Babylonish captivity they were found to be as free from idolatry as the Jews themselves, and continue so to the present day. But they are now nearly annihilated: the small remains of them is found at Naples and Jaffa; they are about thirty families; and men, women, and children, amount to about two hundred persons; they have a synagogue, which they regularly attend every sabbath; and they go thither clothed in white robes.—Dr A. Clarke.—Ed.

^h Among the great variety of conjectures, it is difficult to tell what we are properly to understand by these abstruse words. The Jewish doctors will have them to signify 'an hen and chickens;' but for what reason it is hardly conceivable. Others rather think them that celestial constellation called pleiades, which the Babylonians, who were greatly addicted to astronomy, might possibly worship. Some think them the name of a city which the Babylonians built in Samaria; and others a particular deity whom they adored; but since the words plainly import the 'tabernacle of daughters,' or 'young maidens,' they may be most properly referred to those infamous places where all the young women were obliged, once in their lives, to prostitute themselves to any that asked the favour, in honour of the goddess Mylitta, who, in other nations, is called Venus. Herodotus, in Clio, b. 1, gives us an account of this abominable custom at large, and it is not improbable, that these Babylonians might bring it along with them into the country of Samaria.—Calmel's Dictionary, under the word: *Selden on the Syrian gods. Hamath, ^a setting up Ashmah; ^b the Avites, ^c adoring Nibhaz ^d and Tartak; and those of Sepharvaim, ^e prostrate before Adramalech ^f and Ananalech; and all this, preters, think that this deity is worshipped under the shape of a woodcock; but, as the word ner signifies a lamp, others, with better reason, have imagined that the Cushites, who were afterwards called Persians, adored fire, and, in honour of the sun, in the same manner as the Persians did, kept a perpetual fire burning upon their altars.—Cabnet's Dictionary under the word, and Patrick's Commentary.

^a There are several cities and countries which go under this name; but what we take here to be meant, is that province of Syria that lies upon the Orontes, wherein there was a city of the same name, which when Salmaneser had taken he removed the inhabitants from thence into Samaria, at distance enough, as he thought, to prevent their raising any fresh commotion.—Cabnet's Commentary.

^b Some of the Jewish doctors say, that this Syrian god was worshipped under the shape of an ape; others of a lamb; others of a goat; others of a satyr; and others in the figure wherein the poets represent the god Pan. They who made an ape of this idol god, seem to have some regard to the sound of the word Sima, which has an analogy to the Greek word simia; but the Hebrews, it is very well known, have another word to denote an ape, which together with the goat, was properly an Egyptian deity. The Syrians, however, adored the sun, under the appellation of Elah-Gabalah, from whence the emperor Heliogabalus, who instituted that worship with so much magnificence in Rome, took his name; and therefore, as Asuman or Suman, in the Persian language, signifies heaven, the Syrians might from thence derive the name of their god, who was represented by a large stone pillar, terminating in a conic or pyramidal figure, whereby they denoted fire.—Patrick's Commentary and Dictionary under the word, and Tennison's Idolatry.

^c In Deut. ii. 23, we read of the Avims; but then, in the same text we are told, that the Caphtorim, which is generally understood of the Philistines, 'destroyed them, and lived in their stead, long before these times;' nor does it appear, that the king of Assyria ever had under his jurisdiction the places where these people are said to have lived. The most probable opinion seems, therefore, to be that which the learned Grotius has suggested, by observing that there are a people in Bactriana, mentioned by Ptolemy under the name of Avadie, who might possibly be those whom Salmaneser at this time transported into Palestine.—Hells' Geography of the Old Testament, vol. 3.

^d What these idols were, it is almost impossible to tell. Our learned Selden, though he thinks they were the same idol under different appellations, acknowledges himself unable to give any account of them; for he quite overlooks the fancy of the Rabbinical writers, who dress up the former in the shape of a dog, and the latter in that of an ass.—Patrick's Commentary. Jurieu, in his history of Doctrines, &c. part 4. c. 10, has observed, that as the word Nibhas or Nibchas, both in the Hebrew and Chaldee, with a small variation, denotes quick, swift, rapid, &c. and Tartak in the same language signifies a chariot, these two idols may both together denominate the sun mounted on his car, as the fictions of the poets, and the notions of the heathen theologians were wont to represent that bright luminary.

^e Ptolemy makes mention of a city called Zipphara, on the banks of the river Euphrates, which the generality of interpreters take to be this; but as the sacred history tells us that the Israelites were translated into the cities of the Medes, and these Medes, in all likelihood, were brought to supply their places: between Colchis and Media there are a people, whom Herodotus calls the Saspines, which may be the same with these that the text calls the 'Sepharvaites.'—Cabnet's Commentary.

^f The former of these, according to the Jewish doctors, was represented in the form of a mule, some say a peacock; and the latter in the form of a horse, some say a pheasant: but the definition of the words, as well as the sacrifices that were made to them, quite destroys these idle fancies. Moloch, Milcom, and Meloch, in the languages of different nations, do all signify a king, and are put for the sun, which is called the king, as the moon is the queen of heaven; and therefore the addition of Addir to the one, which denotes powerful; and of Anna to the other, which signifies to answer, means no more than the mighty, or the oracular Moloch; as the children which were offered to him in sacrifice show, that he was the same with the Moloch of the going on with the service of the God of Israel, made a strange and unaccountable medley of religion.

This was the end of the Israelitish kingdom, ^g after it had subsisted above two hundred and fifty-six years, and the beginning of that mongrel people which went afterwards under the name of Samaritan. Among the captive Israelites that were carried away by Salmaneser, ^h we have an account of Tobit, of the tribe of Naphtali, Ammonites, or the Saturn of the Phœnicians.—Cabnet's and Patrick's Commentaries.

^g In the kingdom of Israel there was from the first the greatest disregard of the divine laws; it was consequently destroyed one hundred and thirty-four years earlier than that of Judah. Jeroboam trusted little to the divine promise made him by the prophet; but fearing that if the people went to Jerusalem to attend the feasts, they would return to their alliance to the house of David, he set up two golden or gilded calves, as images of Jehovah; an imitation of the Apis and Mnevis of the Egyptians, among whom he had long dwelt in exile. One of these was placed at Bethel, not far from Shechem, for the southern tribes, and the other at Dan, for the tribes of the north. Temples were built, and altars erected, for these images; priests were appointed from all the tribes without distinction, and the priestly functions performed even by the monarch himself. He appointed the festivals a month later than they had hitherto been, and commanded that they should be celebrated before these images of Mnevis and Apis, which the people took for gods, and worshipped as such; although this kind of idolatry had already been very severely punished at mount Horeb. (1 Kings xii. 25—33. Exod. xxxii.) These arbitrary changes became after this so interwoven with the constitution, that even the more pious successors of Jeroboam did not venture to abolish them, and re-establish the authority of the fundamental law. These rebellious backslidings from God, though so impressively inculcated on the whole people at the first introduction of monarchy, and afterwards on Jeroboam himself, (1 Sam. xi. 14. xii. 1 Kings xi. 38.) did not prevent Jehovah from governing the kingdom of Israel according to his law. We see how he exterminated, one after another, those royal families, who not only retained the arbitrary institutions of Jeroboam, tolerated and patronized idolatry with its concomitant vices, but even introduced and protected it by their royal authority. The extermination of the reigning family he announced beforehand by a prophet, and appointed his successor. We see that the higher their corruptions rose, so much the more decisive and striking were the declarations and signs made to show the Israelites, that the Lord of the universe was their Lord and King, and that all idols were as nothing when opposed to him. Even Naaman the Syrian acknowledged, and the Syrians generally found, to their sorrow, that the God of the Hebrews was not a mere national god, but that his power extended over all nations. History represents a contest, as Hess expresses it, between Jehovah, who ought to be acknowledged as God, and the idolatrous Israelites; and everything is ordered to preserve the authority of Jehovah in their minds. At last, after all milder punishments had proved fruitless, these rebellions were followed by the destruction of the kingdom, and the captivity of the people, which had been predicted by Moses, and afterwards by Ahijah, Hosea, Amos, and other prophets. (Deut. xxviii. 36. 1 Kings xiv. 15. Hosea ix. Amos v.) We also find that divine providence was favourable or adverse to the kingdom of Judah, according as the people obeyed or transgressed the law; only here the royal family remained unchanged, in accordance with the promise given to David. We here meet indeed with many idolatrous and rebellious kings, but they are always succeeded by those of purer mind, who put a stop to idolatry, re-established theocracy in the hearts of their subjects, and by the aid of prophets, priests, and Levites, and the services of the temple, restored the knowledge and worship of God. Judah, therefore, though much smaller than Israel, continued her national existence one hundred and thirty-four years longer; but at last, as no durable reformation was produced, she experienced the same fate as her sister kingdom, in fulfilment of the predictions of Moses, and several other prophets. (Deut. xxviii. 36.)—Jahn's Hebrew Commonwealth.—Ed.

^h This account we have here inserted in the sacred history, not that we look upon the book of Tobit as canonical, for that the Jews and ancient Christians never held it to be, though the who married one Anna, a woman of the same tribe,¹ and by her had but one son, whose name was Tobias: that, during his captivity, he was advanced to be purveyor to king Salmaneser; and, in that capacity, had liberty to go where he pleased; which gave him an opportunity of visiting his brethren, and doing them all good offices, of supplying their wants, and lending them money upon any occasion, as he did to one Gabriel, a kinsman of his, who lived at Rages in Media, to the sum of ten talents, for which he took his note: that, by a revolution church of Rome, by a decree of the council of Trent, thought fit to receive it as such, but purely because it has been allowed by the generality of the christian fathers, to be a true history of this particular family, a good exemplar of charity and beneficence, and an excellent pattern of paternal care and filial obedience. The book itself is supposed to have been wrote, the former part of it by Tobit, and the latter by his son; at least it is thought that they left behind them memoirs of their family, and such materials as a later author, who lived, very likely, in or after the captivity, because the words Raphael, Gabriel, and Michael are allowed to be Babylonish, might compile and digest into proper order. It is not doubted but that the original of this book was either in Hebrew or Chaldee. St Jerome having met with a Chaldee copy of it, did not question but that he had got the original, and accordingly employed a man that was perfectly well skilled in that language to render it into Hebrew, whilst himself translated it into Latin; and this is the version that the church of Rome chiefly esteems. Before this version there was another, which is reckoned the most ancient, done into Greek; but who the author of it was, or from what language he translated it, we have but small foundation for conjecture; though some have been apt to think that it came from the same fountain from whence St Jerome had his, but that the translator had taken such freedoms with the text, as obliged him to retranslate it. The Latin translation, which was in use before St Jerome's appeared, seems to have been taken from the Greek, though in many places it varies from it, by abridging sometimes, and sometimes amplifying the narration. The Hebrew copies, published by Fagius and Munster, are nothing but translations (and those very modern ones, from the Greek or Latin versions, though, in many places of the book, they take the freedom to vary from them. That of Munster is supposed to have been done by himself, and that of Fagius by the Jews of Constantinople in the year 1517, and has so near a conformity to the Greek, that no manner of doubt is to be made of its being descended from thence. These are the several versions that we have of this book of Tobit, which, as it was not received into the canon of the Jews, was not therefore admitted into that of the ancient Christian authors, who confined themselves to those books which the Jews acknowledged to be canonical. It is certain that neither Josephus nor Philo, nor any of the ancient Jewish writers, make any mention of that copy which St Jerome took so much pains about, nor do they register it among their sacred books. Fagius pretends that this book of Tobit does not contain a true history, but a pious fiction only, wherein, under borrowed names, the characters of a father and a son truly pious are set forth; and our learned Prideaux seems to go farther when he tells us, "That there are some matters in it, which are not so reconcilable to a rational credibility, which look indeed more like the fictions of Homer than the writings of a sacred historian, and gives such an objection against the book as does not lie against any other." But, notwithstanding these allegations, we may be assured that the Jews had all along a great regard for this book. Origen, in his epistle to Africanus, tells us that the ancient Christians read it, though they placed it among their apocryphal writings. St Jerome acknowledges that, though they did not receive it into their canon, yet they admitted it among their hagiographa. Grotius owns that they read this book, and looked upon it as a true history; and our own Prideaux confesses that "it is of great use to represent to us the duties of charity and patience, in the example of Tobit's ready helping his brethren in their distress, to the utmost of his power; and his bearing with a pious submission, the calamities of his captivity, poverty and blindness, as long as they were inflicted on him."—Calnet's Preface on the Life of Tobit, and Prideaux's Connect., anno 612.

of fortune, himself being reduced to a low condition, deprived of his eyesight, and now advanced in years, he ordered his son to go to Rages, to fetch the money he had left in his kinsman's hand; and because it was proper to have a companion in so long a journey, he hired a young man, as he thought, to be his guide, but who afterwards proved to be the angel Raphael: that coming to their inn one night upon the banks of the Tigris, Tobias went into the river to wash his feet, when a large fish made at him, as though it would devour him; but the angel encouraged him to lay hold on it, and draw it to the shore, and then bade him open it, and take out the heart, the gall, and the liver; for that the heart and liver when burned, would drive away evil spirits, and the gall was an excellent remedy for all impediments in the sight; that when they came to Ecbatana, they went to one Raguel, a near relation of Tobit's, who had an only daughter, named Sara, but her misfortune was to be haunted by a demon, who had slain her seven husbands successively, the very first night they went to bed to her: that notwithstanding this, by the persuasion of the angel, Tobias was induced to marry her, and by following his advice how he and his wife were to conduct themselves after marriage, and in what manner they were to fumigate the room by burning the liver of the fish, come off safe, to the great joy of the whole family: that having received the money at Rages, he returned with his wife to his parents at Nineveh; and upon his return cured his father of his blindness, by rubbing his eyes with the fish's gall, which brought away a kind of white film that obstructed his sight: that after this recovery of his sight, Tobit lived about forty years; but having all along charged his son, as soon as he and his wife were dead, to leave Nineveh, because the wickedness of the people, he was sure, would bring upon it the judgment which Jonah had denounced, Tobias, as soon as he had done his last duty to his parents, left the place, and with his wife and family, returned to Ecbatana, where he found his father and mother-in-law healthy, though now grown old. Upon their death he succeeded to their estate; and after he had lived to the age of fourscore and nineteen, died in peace, and was buried by his children. But it is time now to look back upon the affairs of the kingdom of Judah.

Jotham, the son of Uzziah king of Judah, was five and twenty years old when he began to reign; "though, as

α Jotham is said (2 Kings xv. 33.) to have reigned sixteen years, yet in the preceding verse (30.) mention is made of his twentieth year. This repugnance is reconcilable in the following manner: Jotham reigned alone sixteen years only, but with his father Uzziah, who, being a leper, was therefore unfit for the whole government four years before, which makes twenty in whole. In like manner we read (2 Kings xiii. 1.) that 'in the three and twentieth year of Joash, the son of Ahaziah king of Judah, Jehoahaz the son of Jehu, began to reign over Israel in Samaria,' and reigned seventeen years: but in verse 10. of the same chapter, it is related that 'in the thirty-seventh year of the same Joash, began Jehoash, the son of Jehoahaz, to reign over Israel in Samaria.' Now, if to the three and twenty years of Joash, mentioned in the first passage, we add the seventeen years of Jehoahaz, we come down to the thirty-ninth or fortieth year of Joash: when on the death of Jehoahaz, the reign of Jehoash may be supposed to have begun. Yet it is easy to assign the reason why the commencement of this reign is fixed two or three years earlier, in the thirty-seventh year of Joash, when his father must have been alive, by supposing that his father had admitted him, as an associate in the government, two or three years before his viceroys to his father, he had the whole administration in his hands for some years before. He ¹ was a prince ^a famous for all excellent qualities and virtues; a man exemplary for his reverence to God, his justice to men, and his care for the commonwealth. He made it his business to set and keep things in order; to rectify whatever he found amiss; and in matters of religion would have made a thorough reformation, but that his people were extremely wicked, and obstructed his designs. He took care, notwithstanding, to repair the temple; to rebuild the high gate which led from his palace; and, to secure himself against hostile invasions, raised several structures, both in the mountains and forests, for the service and strength of the kingdom.

The Moabites, however, though they had been formerly conquered by David, and made tributary to the crown of Judah, were now become so powerful, that they invaded Jotham; but he, with a good body of men, soon drove them out of his country, and imposed on them a tribute of 100 talents of silver, 10,000 measures of wheat, and as many of barley, to be paid him yearly. For three years they continued to pay it; but when Rezin king of Syria, and Pekah king of Israel, entered into a confederacy against Judah, they took this opportunity of revolting; and Jotham indeed had his hands too full ever to attempt to reduce them. He, however, died in peace, before the preparations for war that were making against him took effect: and being buried in the royal sepulchre of his ancestors, left his son Ahaz, who was then about twenty years of age, but much degenerated from his father's piety, under a fearful apprehension of the approaching war.

The design of the two confederate kings, upon the taking of Jerusalem, was to have extirpated the whole house of David, and set up a new king over Judah, the son of Tabeal; ^b but as God's design was only to punish Ahaz, and not to cut off the whole family of David his servant, death. This solution is the more probable, as we find from the case of Jeheshaphat and his son (2 Kings viii. 16.), that in those days such a practice was not uncommon.—Dick on the Inspiration of the Scriptures, p. 299. The application of the rule above stated will also remove the apparent contradiction between 2 Kings xxiv. 8, and 2 Chron. xxxvi. 9, Jehoiachim being eight years old when he was associated with his father, and eighteen years old when he began to reign alone. The application of this rule will reconcile many other seeming contradictions in the books of Kings and Chronicles.—Horne's Introduction.—Ep.

^a Solomon Jarchi here observes, that all the kings of Judah had some crime or other laid to their charge, except this Jotham: that David himself sinned grievously in the matter of Uriah; that Solomon by his wives was drawn into idolatry; that Rehoboam forsook the law of the Lord, and Abijah walked in his steps; that Asa sent the treasures of the temple to the king of Syria, and put the prophet in the stocks; that Jehoshaphat entered into society with the idolatrous; and so he goes on with all the rest: but in Jotham, says he, there is no fault found, which, in an age of general corruption, is pretty wonderful, unless we may suppose, 'that the people's sacrificing and burning incense still on high places, (2 Kings xv. 35.) which he by his authority might have removed, be imputable to him as a fault.—Patrick's Commentary.

^b Who this person was, it is nowhere said in Scripture; but he seems to have been some potent and factious Jew, who having revolted from his master the king of Judah, excited and stirred up this war against him, out of an ambitious aim of plucking him down from his throne, and reigning in his stead.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 747.

he sent the prophet Isaiah to encourage him in the defence of the city, and, to assure him that they should not succeed in their attempt, he gave him two signs, the one to be accomplished speedily, and the other at some distance of time. The former was, ² that the son which the prophet then had by his wife, should not be of age to discern between good and evil, before both these kings should be cut off from the land. The other was, that a virgin ³ should conceive and bear a son, ^c who should be called Emanuel, so that he might rest himself satisfied because the destruction of the house of David could in no case happen until the Messiah should be born, in this miraculous manner, of a virgin descended from that family: and accordingly the two kings, finding themselves not able to carry the town so soon as they expected, raised the siege and returned home.

This deliverance, however, made no other impression upon Ahaz, than that, instead of being reformed, he grew more wicked and obdurate in his sins. For he not only set up the worship of the golden calves, for which he had not the same politic reason that the kings of Israel had, but made molten images likewise for all the inferior gods of the heathens. To these he sacrificed ^d and burned incense in the high places, and on the hills, and under every green tree. Nay, and to add to all his other impieties, made his sons 'pass through the fire to Moloch,' ^e in the valley of the sons of Hinnom; ^f for which provo-

^c In the primary but lower sense of this prophecy, the sign was given to assure Ahaz that the land of Judea would be speedily delivered from the kings of Samaria and Damascus, by whom it was invaded. But the introduction of the prophecy the singular stress laid upon it, and the exact sense of the terms in which it is expressed, made it in a high degree probable that it had another and more important purpose; and the event has clearly proved that the sign given, had secondarily and mystically a respect to the miraculous birth of Christ, and to a deliverance much more momentous than that of Ahaz from his then present distressful situation.—Horne's Introduction.—Ep.

^d 2 Chron. xxviii. 23. 'For he sacrificed unto the gods of Damascus, which smote him.' However stupid it was to imagine that they had any power over him, who could not defend themselves from Tiglath-Pileser, yet, being of opinion that they were gods, he endeavoured by sacrifices to appease them, that they might do him no farther hurt. Thus the ancient Romans, by sacrifices, intreated the gods of their enemies to come over to them, and to be their friends.—See Jackson's Original of Unbelief, c. 17.—Ep.

^e Interpreters are agreed that 'this passing through the fire' was performed either by causing the child to pass between two fires made near one another, by way of its consecration to the service of Moloch, or by putting it in the body of the idol made of brass, and heated extremely hot, so that it was immediately burned to death. But then, to abate the horror of the crime, some are of opinion that Ahaz made his sons pass through the fire in the former sense only, and that because we find Hezekiah survive and succeed him in the throne, and another of his sons, namely, Maaseiah, slain by Zichri, at his taking of Jerusalem; but this does not hinder Ahaz from having other sons, not mentioned in the history, whom he might make sacrifices to Moloch. The Scripture says expressly, that 'he made his sons to pass through the fire according to the abominations of the heathen, whom the Lord cast out before the children of Israel,' (2 Kings xvi. 3.) Now it is incontestably true that the ancient inhabitants of the land of Israel did frequently imitate the heathens in these barbarities: 'They offered their sons and their daughters unto devils, and defiled the land with innocent blood, which they offered unto the idols of Canaan,' (Ps. cvi. 36. See Ezek. xvi. 20, 21, and xxiii. 37—39.) And therefore it is reasonable to think that he did the same, and that this is recorded against him as an aggravation of his other crimes.—Patrick's and Calnel's Commentaries, f Hinnom, in all probability, was some eminent person in cations the Lord brought upon him the same confederate army the year following. This, dividing itself into three bodies, the first under Rezin king of Syria, the second under Pekah king of Israel, and the third under Zichri, a mighty man of Ephraim, invaded his kingdom in three different parts at the same time.

Rezin took Elah, ^a out of which he drove the Jews, and settled the Edomites in it; and having loaded his army with spoils, and taken a vast number of captives, returned to Damascus. Pekah, with his army, marched directly against Ahaz, and gave him a terrible overthrow, wherein he destroyed no less than 120,000 of his men: and Zichri, taking advantage of this victory, marched to Jerusalem; and having taken the royal city, slew Maa-seiah the king's son, and all the great men of the kingdom whom he found there. After this, both these armies of Israel, in their return, carried with them vast spoils, and above 200,000 captives, whom they intended to have sold for slaves: but as they approached Samaria, the prophet Oded, with the principal inhabitants of the city, came out to meet them, and, after proper remonstrances of their cruelty to their brethren, prevailed with them not only to release the prisoners, but to let them likewise be clothed and relieved out of the spoils they had taken, and so sent back to their own houses.

The kingdom of Judah was no sooner delivered from these enemies, but it was invaded by others, who treated it with the same cruelty; for the Edomites to the south, and the Philistines to the west, seized on those parts which lay contiguous to them, and, by ravages and inroads, did all the mischief they could to the rest.

Being reduced to this low condition, and seeing no other remedy left to his affairs, Ahaz sent an embassy to Tiglath-Pileser king of Assyria, with a large present of all the gold and silver that he could find in the trea-ancient times, to whom this valley belonged, and to whose posterity it descended, and is therefore sometimes called the 'valley of the children of Hinmou.' It was a famous plot of ground on the east side of Jerusalem, and so delightfully shaded, that it invited the people to make it a place of idolatrous worship, whereby it became infamous, and was at last turned into a public dunghill, or receptacle, where all the filth and excrements of the city were brought and burned; for which purpose there was a perpetual fire kept, which made it a kind of image or representation of hell.—Patrick's Commentary on Josh. xv. 8. The place now shown as the valley of Hinmou is a deep ravine, closed on the right by the steep declivity of mount Zion, and on the left by a line of cliffs, more or less elevated. From some points in these cliffs tradition relates that the apostate betrayer of our Lord sought his desperate end: and the position of the trees, which in various parts overhang the brow of the cliff, accord with the manner of his death.—Jovett's Christian Researches.—ED.

^a Elah, or Elam, as we took notice before, was a famous port on the Red Sea, which David in his conquest of the kingdom of Edom took, and there established a great trade to divers parts of the world. In the reign of Jehoram, the son of Jehoshaphat, the Edomites recovered their liberty, and became sole masters of this city, until the time that Uzziah recovered it to the dominion of Judah, (2 Kings xiv. 22.) but, in the reign of Ahaz, the Syrians retook it, and restored it to the Edomites: and why they chose to do this, rather than keep so advantageous a place in their own possession, we may learn from what we read of the Edomites, (2 Chron. xxviii. 17.) namely, that they invaded Judah, as auxiliaries to the king of Syria, much about the time that he was engaged in war with that kingdom; and therefore it is no wonder that he should give up a place which lay at too great a distance for him to keep, to the Edomites, whose originally it was, and who made perhaps the restitution of it one article of their confederacy with him.—Patrick's and Le Clerc's Commentaries.

sury of the temple, and as large promises to become his vassal and tributary for ever, if he would but send forces to his assistance against his enemies.

The king of Assyria readily laid hold on this invitation; and, marching with a great army against Rezin king of Syria, he slew him in battle, besieged and took his capital of Damascus; and, having reduced the whole country under his dominion, transplanted the people to Kir, a place in the Upper Media, and so put an end to the kingdom of Syria in Damascus, ^b after it had continued for nine or ten generations.

After this he marched against Pekah, seized all that belonged to Israel beyond Jordan; and, having plundered the land of Galilee, proceeded towards Jerusalem with an intent to squeeze more money out of Ahaz, which when he had done, by making him cut the vessels of the temple to pieces, and melt them down to satisfy his avarice, he marched back to Damascus, and there wintered, ^c without doing him any further service. These indignities, which another man might have resented,

^b In the time of Abraham, Damascus was in being; and some of the ancients inform us that this patriarch reigned there immediately after Damascus, its founder. This much is certain, that one whom he had made free, and appointed steward in his house, was of Damascus, (Gen. xv. 2.) at the time that he pursued Chedorlaomer, and the five confederated kings, as far as Hobah, which lies northward of Damascus, (Gen. xiv. 15.) The Scripture says nothing more of this city until the time of David, when Hadad, who, according to Josephus, (Jewish Antiq. b. vii. c. 6.) was the first who took upon him the title of king of Damascus, sending troops to the assistance of Hadadezer king of Zabab, was himself defeated by David, and his country subdued. Towards the end of Solomon's reign, Rezin recovered the kingdom of Damascus, and shook off the Jewish yoke, (1 Kings xi. 23, &c.) Some time after this, Asa king of Judah, implored the help of Benhadad king of Damascus, against Baasha king of Israel, (1 Kings xv. 18.) And from his time the kings of Damascus were generally called Benhadad, till, in this last controversy with them, Ahaz called in the assistance of the king of Assyria, who killed their king, and carried his subjects into captivity, according to the predictions of Isaiah vii. 9, and Amos vii.—Calmet's Dict. under the word. [The present city of Damascus is of a long straight figure, extending about two miles, and lying nearly in the direction of north-east and south-west. It is surrounded with gardens, stretching no less, according to common estimation, than thirty miles around; which gives it the appearance of a city in the midst of a vast wood. The gardens are thickly planted with fruit trees of all kinds, that are kept fresh and verdant by the waters of the Banady. Numerous towers and gilded steeples, glittering in the blazing sunbeam among the green boughs, diversify and heighten the beauty of the prospect. On the north side of this vast wood, is a place called Solkas, crowded with beautiful summer-houses and gardens. This delightful scene, and even the city itself, may be considered as the creation of the Banady, which supplies both the gardens and the city, diffusing beauty and fertility wherever it flows.]—Parson's Illustrations.—ED.

^c In 2 Chron. xxviii. 20 we read, 'that Tiglath-Pileser came unto Ahaz, and distressed, but strengthened him not.' And yet, in 2 Kings xvi. 9, it is said, that 'he did help him;' and how then can he be said to have distressed him? Very well; for as he came to his assistance against the king of Syria, so he took Damascus, carried the people captive, and delivered Ahaz from the power of the Syrians; but this did Ahaz little good, for he helped him not to recover the cities which the Philistines had taken from him. He lent him no forces, nor enabled him to recruit his own; on the contrary, he rather weakened him by exhausting his treasures, and destroying Samaria, which opened a way for the invasion of his country with more facility, as it happened in the next reign. For it is no uncommon thing, even in later ages, to hear of kingdoms that have called in the help of some foreign prince against their enemies, overrun and conquered by those who came to their assistance.—Patrick's Commentary.

Ahaz, in his circumstances, thought proper to overlook; and not only so, but when he heard that Tiglath-Pileser was returned to Damascus, he went thither to pay him homage and obeisance, as his vassal and tributary. While he continued at Damascus, he happened to see an idolatrous altar, of so curious a make and figure in his opinion, that he ordered a model of it to be taken, and sent to Urijah, the high priest at Jerusalem, ^a with injunctions to have another made as like it as possible; and when he returned, he removed the altar of the Lord out of its place in the temple, and ordered this new one to be set up in its stead, and that sacrifices for the future should be offered on it alone.

The truth is, the more his misfortunes came upon him, the greater his contempt of Almighty God grew: inasmuch that, having defaced ^b several of the most stately vessels of the temple, he caused it at last to be wholly shut up; and, suppressing all divine worship throughout the kingdom, in the room thereof he set up the worship of the gods of the Syrians, ^c and of other nations, alleg-

^a It must not be denied, indeed, but that the high priest carried his complaisance much too far, in obeying the king's injunction, which he ought, with all his power and interest, to have opposed. God prescribed to Moses in what form, and with what materials, he was to make the altar, (Exod. xxvii. 1, &c.) The altar which Solomon made, was indeed four times as large, (2 Chron. iv. 1.) but then God had given such solemn testimony of his approbation of it, that there was no touching it without impiety; for the high priest could not but know that this innovation of the king's did not proceed from any principle of religion, but from a design to degrade the altar of the Lord, as well as the other sacred vessels of the temple. But what shall we say for this? There will, in all ages, be some men found, who will be ready to execute the most impious commands that can possibly come from the throne.—Patrick's and Calnet's Commentaries.

^b The words in the text, according to our translation, are, 'Ahaz cut off the borders of the bases, and removed the laver from off them, and took down the sea from off the brazen oxen that were under it, and put it upon a pavement of stones, and the covert for the sabbath, that they had built in the house, and the king's entry without, turned he from the house of the Lord, for the king of Assyria.' (2 Kings xvi. 17, 18.) His removing the bases, the laver, and the brazen sea, was palpably with a design to deface the service of God in the temple, and thence to bring it to public contempt; but then commentators are much at a loss to know what we are to understand by 'the covert for the sabbath within, and the king's entry without the temple.' Now the prophet Ezekiel tells us expressly, 'that the gate of the inner court which looked towards the east, was opened only on the sabbath, and on the day of the new moon;' and that in these days the king was to enter into the temple at this gate, and continue at the entrance of the priests' court, where was the brazen scaffold which Solomon erected, (2 Chron. vi. 13.) a place for the king to pay his devotions on, until his sacrifices were offered; and if so, the musack, which we translate covert, might be a kind of canopy, or other covered place, under which the king sat when he came to the service of the temple on the sabbath, or other great solemnities, which was therefore called the covert of the sabbath; and the reason why the king ordered this to be taken away was because he intended to trouble himself no more with coming to the temple, and by this action to express his hatred likewise, and contempt of the sabbath.—Calnet's and Patrick's Commentaries, and Spencer on the Laws of the Hebrews, b. i. c. 1.

^c This was a monstrous stupidity, to think that these gods had any power over him, who could not defend themselves from the arms of Tiglath-Pileser! Thinking, however, that they had distressed him, he sacrificed to them, in order to appease their wrath, that they might do him no farther hurt; in the same manner as the ancient Romans were wont to bribe the gods of their enemies with larger sacrifices than ordinary, in hopes of bringing them over to their party, and making them their friends.—Patrick's Commentary.

ing that they had helped their respective people; whereas his God, forsooth, had forsaken him, and therefore deserved no farther homage. But in the height of all his impiety and profaneness, he was cut off by a sudden stroke, in the very prime of his age, after he had lived six and thirty, and reigned sixteen years; and, being buried in the city of David, though not in the royal sepulchres, ^d for that honour he was denied because of his iniquities, he was succeeded by his son Hezekiah, who was a worthy and religious prince.

^e In the five and twentieth year of his age Hezekiah

^d 2 Chron. xxviii. 27. The Israelites were accustomed to honour in a peculiar manner the memory of those kings who had reigned over them uprightly. On the contrary, some marks of posthumous disgrace followed those monarchs who left the world under the disapprobation of their people. The proper place of interment was in Jerusalem. There, in some appointed receptacle, the remains of their princes were deposited: and, from the circumstance of this being the cemetery for successive rulers, it was said, when one died and was so buried, that he was gathered to his fathers. Several instances occur in the history of the kings of Israel, wherein, on certain accounts, they were not thus interred with their predecessors, but in some other place in Jerusalem. So it was with Ahaz, who, though brought into the city, was not buried in the sepulchres of the kings of Israel. In some other cases, perhaps to mark out a greater degree of censure, they were taken to a small distance from Jerusalem. It is said that 'Uzziah was buried with his fathers in the field of the burial which belonged to the kings; for they said, he is a leper.' (2 Chron. xxvi. 23.) It was doubtless with a design to make a suitable impression on the minds of their kings while living, that such distinctions were made after their decease. They might thus restrain them from evil or excite them to good, according as they were fearful of being execrated, or desirous of being honoured, when they were dead. The Egyptians had a custom in some measure similar to this: it was, however, general as to all persons, though it received very particular attention, as far as it concerned their kings. It is thus described in Frankliu's History of Ancient and Modern Egypt, (vol. i. p. 374.) 'As soon as a man was dead, he was brought to his trial. The public accuser was heard. If he proved the deceased had led a bad life, his memory was condemned, and he was deprived of the honours of sepulture. Thus, that sage people were affected with laws which extended even beyond the grave, and every one, struck with the disgrace inflicted on the dead person, was afraid to reflect dishonour on his own memory, and that of his family. But what was singular, the sovereign himself was not exempt from this public inquest upon his death. The public peace was interested in the lives of their sovereigns in their administration, and as death terminated all their actions, it was then deemed for the public welfare that they should suffer an impartial scrutiny by a public trial, as well as the most common subject. Even some of them were not ranked among the honoured dead; and consequently were deprived of public burial. The Israelites would not suffer the bodies of some of their flagitious princes to be carried into the sepulchres appropriated to their virtuous sovereigns. The custom was singular: the effect must have been powerful and influential. The most haughty despot saw, by the solemn investigation of human conduct, that at death he also would be doomed to infamy and execution.' What degree of conformity there was between the practice of the Israelites and the Egyptians, and with whom the custom first originated, may be difficult to ascertain and decide, but the conduct of the latter appears to be founded on the same principle as that of the former, and as it is more circumstantially detailed, affords us an agreeable explanation of a rite but slightly mentioned in the Scriptures.—Ed.

^e Of Ahaz it is recorded that he was but 'twenty years old when he began to reign,' and that he reigned sixteen before he died; so that in the whole he lived six and thirty years, (2 Kings xvi. 2.) Now his son Hezekiah is said to have been 'five and twenty years old when he began to reign,' (2 Kings xviii. 2.) and consequently his father must have begot him when he was eleven years old, which seems a little incredible; and, to solve this difficulty, commentators have taken several ways. Some have imagined that Hezekiah was not the real, but adopted son only began to reign; and, after he had got the full possession of the kingdom, (for, during his father's illness, he acted only as viceroy under him,) he began in good earnest to ^a set about a thorough reformation of religion. To this purpose he caused the doors of the temple, which his father had ordered to be shut up, to be opened; his father's new altar to be removed; the altar of the Lord to be restored to its place again; and whatever other pollutions it had contracted during his father's administration, he ordered them all to be purged and done away. Then calling the priests and Levites together, he required them to sanctify themselves according to the directions of the law; and, after that, the former he appointed to offer sacrifices, ^b in order to atone for the king's, their own, and the people's sins; and the latter, ^c with of Ahaz, and might therefore succeed his foster-father at this or any other age; but this hypothesis, as Bochart observes, spoils the descent of our Saviour from David. Others suppose that there was an interregnum for some years, occasioned by a sedition that happened in Jerusalem; but there is no foundation for this hypothesis in history; on the contrary it is much more likely that, as Hezekiah was a man grown, and greatly beloved by the people, he should immediately succeed upon his father's demise. Others imagine that, in detestation of Ahaz's wickedness, his reign is omitted in this account, and that therefore the passage should be thus rendered: 'Ahaz was twenty years old when his father began to reign.' But this is reversing the order of words in the text, and turning them into a sense that is far from being natural. Others, not satisfied with any of these solutions, will needs have it that there is an error crept into the text itself by the negligence of some transcriber, who, instead of twenty, made Hezekiah five and twenty years old when his reign commenced, merely by mistaking the numerical letters; but it is not so well, even in numerical matters, which are most liable to variation, to find any fault with the text except where there is no other tolerable solution, which is not the case here. In these days, and long before, it was no unusual thing, upon several considerations, for kings to take the son who was to succeed them into partnership with them before they died. Now Ahaz, by his mismanagement, had brought himself into so many intanglements (2 Chron. xxviii. 16, &c. and xxix. 7, &c.) as to want an assistant in the government, and accordingly, it appears that he admitted his son in that capacity. For, whereas it is said of Hezekiah that he began to reign in the third year of Hoshea son of Elah, (2 Kings xviii. 1.) and of Hoshea that he began to reign in the fourteenth year of Ahaz, (2 Kings xvii. 1.) it is evident that Hezekiah began to reign in the fourteenth year of Ahaz his father, and so reigned two or three years before his father's death. So that at the first date of his reign, which was in conjunction with his father, he might be but two or three and twenty, and his father, consequently, when he begot him, two or three years older than the common computation. But there is another way of solving this difficulty. It is a common thing, both in sacred and profane authors, in the computation of time, to take no notice whether the year they mention be perfect or imperfect, whether finished or but newly begun. Upon this account Ahaz might be near one and twenty years old when he began to reign, and near seventeen years older when he died; and, on the other hand, Hezekiah when he began to reign, might be but just entering into his five and twentieth year, and by this means Ahaz might be near fourteen years old when he begot Hezekiah, which is no extraordinary thing at all. Nay, even upon the lowest supposition, that he was but eleven or twelve years old, yet instances are innumerable, such as Bochart and others have given, of persons that have procreated children at that age; for it is not so much the number of years, as the nature of the climate, the constitution of the body, the stature of the person, the quality of the diet, &c., that ought to be considered in this affair.—Bochart's Phaleg, p. 920; Millar's History of the Church, p. 201; Boiford's Scripture Chronology, Patrick's and Calmet's Commentaries. [According to Dr Boothroyd, Ahaz was twenty-five years of age when he began to reign, and if this emendation be correct, the difficulty in question vanishes; for Ahaz would then have been only sixteen years of age when he begot Hezekiah.—See Boothroyd on 2 Kings xvi. 2.—Ed.]

^a A great demonstration this of his sincere piety and zeal towards God, that he began so soon to reform the corruption of religion, and did not stay till he had established himself in his throne! He might think, however, that the surest way to establish himself in the throne, was to establish the true worship of God; though he could not but foresee that he ran a great hazard in attempting the abolition of idolatry, which had been confirmed by some years' prescription.—Patrick's Commentary.

^b The words in the text are,—'For a sin-offering for the kingdom,' that is, for the king's sins and those of his predecessors; 'for the sanctuary,' for the priests' sins, and the profanations of the temple; 'and for Judah,' that is, for all the people who had followed the bad examples of their impious kings. Now, the offering which the law prescribed for the transgression of the people, was a young bullock; and for the offences of the prince, was a goat, (Lev. iv. 23, &c.) but good Hezekiah, we find, was willing to do more than the law commanded. He was sensible that both prince and people had been guilty, not only of sins of ignorance, for which these sacrifices were instituted, but of wilful and presumptuous crimes of gross idolatry, a profanation of the temple, and an utter extinction of the worship of God; and therefore he appointed seven bullocks for a burnt-offering, and as many goats for a sin-offering, upon presumption that these numerous sacrifices were, if not necessary, at least highly fit and becoming, upon the account of the great and long neglect of divine service, and the multitude and long continuance of their other offences against God, for which they were now to beg forgiveness.—Calmet's and Patrick's Commentaries.

^c Moses, in the service of the tabernacle, did not appoint the use of many musical instruments; only he caused some trumpets to be made, which, upon solemn occasions, were to be sounded at the time when the burnt-offering and peace-offering were upon the altar, (Num. x. 10.) But David, by the advice of the prophets Gad and Nathan, introduced several kinds of music into the service of the temple, as a thing highly conducive to inspire people with respect, with joy, and with affection for the solemnities and assemblies of religion, (1 Chron. xxiii. 5, and xxv. 1.) and it is farther observable, that the institution of music, in religious assemblies, is not a matter of human invention, but what was ordained by God, and has the sanction and authority of his prophets to confirm it; 'for so was the commandment of the Lord by his prophets,' (2 Chron. xxix. 25.) [The musical instruments of the Hebrews are, perhaps, what has been hitherto least understood of anything in Scripture. Calmet considers them under three classes; 1st, stringed instruments; 2nd, hand instruments, or divers kinds of flutes; 3d, different kinds of drums. (1) Of stringed instruments, are the nabel, and the psaltery, or psalterium. (Dan. iii. 5.) These three names apparently signify nearly, or altogether, the same thing. They considerably resembled the harp; the ancient cythara or the ashur, or the ten-stringed instrument; both were nearly of the figure Δ : but the nablum or psaltery, was hollow toward the top, and played on toward the bottom, whereas the cythara or ten-stringed instrument was played on the upper part, and was hollow below; both were touched by a small bow or fret, or by the fingers. The kinnoor, or ancient lyre, had sometimes six, sometimes nine strings, strung from top to bottom, and sounded by means of a hollow belly, over which they passed; they were touched by a small bow, or fret, or by the finger. The ancient symphony was nearly the same as our viol. The sambuc was a stringed instrument, which was nearly the same, it is thought, as the modern psaltery. (2) We discover in Scripture various sorts of trumpets and flutes, of which it is difficult to ascertain the forms. The most remarkable of this kind is the ancient organ, in Hebrew haggab, the ancient pipe of Pan, now common among us. (3.) Drums were of many kinds: the Hebrew trpt, whence comes tympanum, is taken for all kinds of drums or timbrels. The zabzelim is commonly translated by the LXX and the Vulgate, cymbala; instruments of brass of a very clattering sound, made in the form of a cap or hat, and struck one against the other, while held one in each hand. Later interpreters by zabzelim, understand the sistrum; an instrument anciently very common in Egypt. It was nearly of an oval figure, and crossed by brass wires, which jingled upon being shaken, while their ends were secured from falling out of the frame, by their heads being larger than the orifice which contained the wire. The Hebrews mention an instrument called sha-

musical instruments, to sing praises to God in the words of David, ^a and of Asaph the seer.

Having thus restored the service of the temple, he proposed with himself to revive the passover, which, by reason of the division of the kingdom, and the frequent commotions that had happened thereupon, had not been regularly observed for a long while. To this purpose, he advised with the princes, and chief men of the kingdom; and because it was thought, that neither the temple, the priests, nor the people, could be sufficiently sanctified, against the usual time of observing it, which was in the first month of the year, it was resolved, that ^b it should be celebrated in the second: and accordingly a proclamation was issued out, requiring not only the people of Judah, ^c but all other Israelites of whatever tribe they were, to come to this solemnity.

It could hardly be expected but that, after so long a disuse of this holy festival, an attempt to revive it should meet with some scorn and opposition; and therefore we need not wonder that many of the tribes of Ephraim, leshim, which the LXX translate cymbala; but Jerome sistra. It is found only in 1 Sam. xviii. 6. The term shaleshim suggests that it was of three sides, (triangular) and it might be that ancient triangular instrument, which carried on each side several rings, that were jingled by a stick, and gave a sharp rattling sound. The original also mentions mezilothaim, which were of brass, and of a sharp sound. This word is usually translated cymbala; some however render it tintinnabula, little bells, which is countenanced by Zechariah xiv. 20, which says, the time shall come when on the bracelets of the horses shall be written 'Holiness to the Lord!' We know that bells were anciently worn by horses trained for war to accustom them to noise.—Calnet abridged.—Ep.

^a David was both a great poet and master of music, and might therefore modulate and compose his own hymns; but whether the music of them might not be altered and improved in after ages, because the words only are here taken notice of, is a matter of some uncertainty. The Asaph here mentioned was the person who lived in David's days, so famous for his skill in music, and the several devout pieces, which he composed, are those which we meet with in the collection of the Psalms; but others will needs have it, but for what reason I cannot tell, that the author of the Psalms ascribed to Asaph, was another person who lived in after times, though perhaps of the same family, as well as name, with this famous Asaph who lived in David's.—Patrick's Commentary.

^b The direction which the law gives, is,—That the passover should be celebrated on the fourteenth day of the first month, which the Jews call Nisan; but because it was found impossible to get all things in readiness against that time, it was judged more advisable to adjourn it to the fourteenth of the next month, which the Jews call Jair, rather than stay to the next year; and for this they had some encouragement; because the law allows, that, 'in case any man shall be unclean, by reason of a dead body, or be on a journey afar off, he may eat the passover on the fourteenth day of the second month,' (Num. ix. 10, 11.) and what was an indulgence to particular persons, they thought might well be allowed to the whole congregation of Israel.—Patrick's Commentary.

^c Hezekiah, it is certain, had no right to invite Hoshea's subjects to repair to Jerusalem to the celebration of his passover; yet for the doing of this, we may well presume, that he had encouragement from Hoshea himself, who, as to the matter of religion, as we said before, has a better character in Scripture than any of his predecessors from the division of the two kingdoms. But the truth of the matter was, that both the golden calves, which had made this political separation, were now taken away, that of Dan by Tiglath-Pileser, and the other of Bethel, by his son Salmaneser; and therefore the apostate Jews, being thus deprived of their idols, began to return to the Lord, and to go up to Jerusalem to worship, for some time before Hezekiah made them this invitation to his passover.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 729.

Manasseh, and Zebulun, should laugh at Hezekiah's messengers, when they invited them to this feast. Great multitudes, however, even from those parts, came to Jerusalem upon this occasion; and the concourse indeed was so numerous, that this might be justly reckoned one of the greatest passovers that had been solemnized from the days of king Solomon. The time which the law directs for the continuance of this feast, is seven days; but forasmuch as it had been long neglected, they now doubled the time, and kept it for fourteen, with great joy and gladness of heart: and as soon as the solemnity was ended, those that belonged to the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, ^d went and brake the images in pieces, cut down the groves, threw down the high places, and altars belonging to strange gods, and absolutely destroyed all the monuments of idolatry which were any where to be found, either in Jerusalem, Judea, or any of the coasts belonging to them; as those of the other tribes, in their return home, did the same in all the rest of Israel; so that idolatry was quite abolished, and the true worship of God again universally restored.

Nay there was one thing, namely, the brazen serpent, ^e which might have been of innocent use, and served in ^d This, as the text tells us, was done not only in the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, but in those of Ephraim also and Manasseh, (2 Chron. xxxi. 1.) which though they were part of Hoshea's dominion, yet Hezekiah might direct this abolition of idolatry in them, in virtue of a law which bound Israel, as well as Judah, and required the extirpation of these things in the whole land of Canaan; by the special impulse and direction of God's Spirit, which puts men upon heroic actions, though not to be drawn into imitation; or out of a firm persuasion that his neighbour Hoshea, who had permitted his subjects to repair to the passover, would approve and consent to what he did in this respect.—Poole's Annotations.

^e The reason which the Scripture assigns for Hezekiah's destroying this brazen serpent is,—'because unto this day the children of Israel had burnt incense to it,' (2 Kings xviii. 4.) We are not however to suppose, that, all along from the days of Moses, this brazen serpent was made an object of religious worship: this is what neither David nor Solomon, in the beginning of his reign, would have allowed of; nor can we think, but that either Asa or Jehoshaphat, when they rooted out idolatry, would have made an end of this, had they perceived that the people, at that time, either paid worship or burnt incense to it. The commencement of this superstition therefore must be of a later date, and since the time that Ahab's family, by being allied to the crown of Judah by marriage, introduced all kinds of idolatry. Now, one false inducement to the worship of this image might be a mistake of the words of Moses. For whereas it is said, 'that whosoever looketh upon it shall live,' (Num. xxi. 1.) some might thence fancy, that, by its mediation, they might obtain a blessing, and so make it the object of their superstition at first. However, we may imagine that their burning incense, or any other perfumes before it, was designed only in honour to the true God, by whose direction Moses made it; but then, in process of their superstition, they either worshipped the God of Israel under that image, or what is worse, substituted a heathen God in his room, and worshipped the brazen serpent as his image; which they might more easily be induced to do, because the practice of some neighbouring nations was to worship their gods under the form of a serpent. Upon this account Hezekiah wisely chose rather to lose this memorial of God's wonderful mercy to his people in the wilderness, than to suffer it any longer to be abused to idolatry, and therefore 'he brake it in pieces,' that is, as the Talmudists explain it, he ground it to powder, and then scattered it in the air, that there might not be the least remains of it. And yet, notwithstanding all the care which he took to destroy it, Sigonius in his history of Italy, tells us, that in the church of St Ambrose, in Milan, they show a brazen serpent entire, which they pretend to be the very same which Moses erected in the wilderness; though it must be owned, that among their learned men, there the same manner as did the pot of manna, and Aaron's rod, for a monument of God's miraculous mercy to the Israelites in their passage through the wilderness; but, because the preceding times of iniquity had made it an object of idolatrous worship, Hezekiah thought proper to destroy it, in order to take away all occasion of the like abuse for the future. Having thus removed all the objects of idolatry, he took care in the next place to restore the temple worship to its ancient splendour and purity. To this purpose he put the priests and Levites in their courses, and appointed every one his proper ministration. The tithes and first fruits, which idolatrous princes had detained, on purpose to bring the priesthood into poverty, and thence into contempt, he returned to the church; and ^a out of his own privy purse, as we say, ordered the expenses of the daily oblations, as well as of the larger offerings on the great festivals of the year to be defrayed.

Upon these, and several other accounts, Hezekiah deserved the title of one of the best of kings ^b that ever reigned in Judah; nor was God in the least wanting to reward his piety in a most signal manner. For, while Salmaneser was engaged in the siege of Samaria, he warred against the Philistines, and not only regained all the cities of Judah, which they had seized during the time that Pekah and Rezin jointly distressed the land, but also dispossessed them of almost all their own territories, except Gaza and Gath.

As soon as the siege of Samaria was over, Salmaneser sent to Hezekiah to demand the tribute which his father Ahaz had agreed to pay to the kings of Assyria; but Hezekiah refused to pay it; which would doubtless have brought the Assyrian upon him, with all his power, had he not been diverted by the war ^c he entered into against Tyre, and died before he had put an end to it.

are some who acknowledge the cheat, and disclaim it.—Le Clerc's Commentary and Prideaux's Connection, anno 726.

^a After that David had brought the ark of the Lord into the tent which he had pitched for it, near his own palace, the Scripture seems to intimate, (1 Chron. xvi. 1.) that he divided the priests and Levites into two bodies; one of which he left at Gibeon, to attend in the tabernacle which Moses made; and the other he took with him to Jerusalem. And from this time, it is highly probable, that out of his own estate he supplied whatever was necessary for the sacred ministry of this his domestic tabernacle on Mount Zion. When Solomon had built the temple, he obliged himself to defray all the expenses, both ordinary and extraordinary, of the altar, (2 Chron. viii. 13.) And, in like manner, upon the rebuilding of the temple, at the return from the captivity, Ezekiel assigns a proper revenue to the king, to answer the expense of all sacrifices, both stated and occasional, (chap. xlv.) so that Hezekiah in this did properly no more than what was incumbent on him; though several of his idolatrous predecessors had doubtless withdrawn the fund appropriated to that purpose, which made it so commendable in him to restore it to its proper channel.—Calmet's and Patrick's Commentaries.

^b The words in the text are,—‘So that, after him, was none like him amongst all the kings of Judah, nor any that were before him, (2 Kings xviii. 5.) Now it is plain that the same commendation is given of Josiah, namely, that ‘like unto him was there no king before him, which turned to the Lord, with all his heart, &c., neither after him arose there any like him,’ (2 Kings xxiii. 25.) So that this character of Hezekiah must relate to some particular virtue wherein he stood distinguished from the rest of the kings of Judah, and that was, ‘his trusting in the Lord God of Israel,’ as it is in the beginning of the verse, and not in the help of any foreign forces, as all the other kings, even the most renowned for their piety, in some measure, are known to have done.—Calmet's Commentary.

^c The king of Tyre finding the Philistines brought low by the

He was succeeded by his son Sennacherib, who, as soon as he was settled on the throne, renewed the demand for the tribute, and upon Hezekiah's refusing to comply, marched a great army into Judea, in order to fall upon him.

^d Not long before this, Hezekiah was taken with a sore illness, and had a message from God, by the prophet Isaiah, to settle his affairs and prepare for death; but, upon his great concern, and hearty prayer to God, he obtained another message from him by the same prophet, promising him a reprieve for fifteen years longer, and a deliverance from the Assyrians, who were then coming against him. Both these were events beyond his expectation; and therefore, to give him a full assurance of faith, God, at his request, made the sun go backward ten degrees upon the sun-dial that Ahaz had erected; and when, by the prophet's directions, a plaster of figs was applied to his ulcer, he recovered in the space of three days, and went up to the temple to return God thanks for so wonderful a deliverance.

Upon Hezekiah's recovery, Merodach-Baladan king of Babylon sent ambassadors ^e to congratulate him, and at the same time to enter into an alliance with him against Sennacherib, whose growing power the Babylonians, as well as the Jews, had reason to fear: and Hezekiah was so taken with the honour done him upon this occasion, that, out of the vanity and pride of his heart, he showed the ambassadors all the wealth ^f and strength war which Hezekiah had lately made upon them, laid hold on the opportunity to reduce Gath, which had some time before revolted from under his obedience. Hereupon the people of Gath, applying themselves to Salmaneser, engaged him in their cause against the Tyrians. He soon took several of their cities, and at length closely besieged their capital: but before he could carry the place, which held out for five years, he died, and by that means gave some respite to Hezekiah.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 720.

^d In the course of the sacred history, this sickness of Hezekiah's is placed immediately after the defeat and death of Sennacherib; whereas it plainly happened before that time, because in the message which God sent him upon his bed of sickness by the prophet Isaiah, he promises to ‘deliver Jerusalem out of the hands of the king of Assyria,’ (2 Kings xx. 6.) The truth of the matter is—Hezekiah reigned in all nine and twenty years, (2 Kings xviii. 2.) He had already reigned fourteen years, when Sennacherib invaded him (2 Kings xviii. 13.), and after his sickness he continued to reign fifteen years (2 Kings xx. 6.), so that his sickness must have happened in the very same year that the king of Assyria invaded his kingdom; but the sacred penman deferred the account he was to give of that, until he had finished the history of Sennacherib, which he was willing to give the reader at one view; and this is the true reason of the mislocation.—Calmet's Commentary.

^e The requests which the Assyrians were everywhere making could not fail of giving umbrage to the neighbouring powers to confederate against them; and therefore we may well suppose that, besides the business of congratulating Hezekiah's recovery, the purpose of this embassy was to enter into an alliance with him against Sennacherib, whose growing power the Babylonians had reason to fear, as well as the Jews; and, as the author of the Chronicles expresses it, ‘to inquire into the wonder that was done in the land,’ (2 Chron. xxxii. 31.) that is, to inquire about the miracle of the sun's retrogradation, which could not fail of being a matter of great curiosity to the Chaldeans, who, above all other nations, were at that time given to the study of astronomy.—Calmet's Commentary and Prideaux's Connection, anno 713.

^f The things which Hezekiah showed to the Babylonian ambassadors, were the riches of his house, his treasures, his armoury, and all his stores and strength for war; and the reason for his doing this, was doubtless, to make the Babylonians put the greater value upon his friendship; but herein he offended God, that he not only laid a bait before these foreigners, to encourage them of his kingdom, for which the prophet Isaiah was sent to reprove him, and to let him know that a day would come when all the stores he made such ostentation of should be carried into Babylon; which adoration ^a he received in a very decent and humble manner.

Sennacherib, in the mean time, advanced with a mighty army against the fenced cities of Judah; and, having taken several of them, he came at length and sat down before Lachish, and threatened, after he had taken that, to besiege even Jerusalem itself. Hereupon Hezekiah, taking advice of his princes and chief counsellors, made all manner of preparations for a vigorous defence. He repaired the walls, and fortified them with towers. He provided darts and shields in great abundance, and all other arms and artillery that might be useful, either to defend the place or annoy the enemy. He had the people enrolled that were fit for war, and placed over them good officers, both to instruct them in all military exercise, and to head and conduct them when they were to make their sallies. He stopped up the fountains ^b for a good compass round, and the brook ^c that passed by the wall of the city, in order to distress the enemy for want of water: and, to strengthen himself the more against them, he entered into an alliance offensive and defensive with the king of Egypt. But this alliance the prophet Isaiah highly blamed, as it implied a diffidence of the Almighty's power to help him, and would redound to his own shame, and reproach, and confusion at last; which accordingly came to pass. For, while Sennacherib was besieging Lachish, Hezekiah, observing that this new ally of his made no haste to come to his assistance, and being sadly sensible that of himself he was not sufficient to resist so powerful an adversary as the king of Assyria, sent ambassadors to him, desiring him to retire out of his dominions, and promising to submit to such conditions as he should be pleased to impose upon him.

The demand which Sennacherib made, was the payment of three hundred talents ^d of silver, and thirty talents of gold; which Hezekiah was not able to raise, without exhausting all his treasures, and stripping the very doors of the temple of the gold plates wherewith they were overlaid. This diverted the king of Assyria for some time; so that, leaving Judea, he turned his arms against Egypt; ^e but after a series of different suc-

to invade his country, but seemed to place more confidence in this new alliance with them, than in the power of the Almighty, whose favour and protection he had so long experienced. The author of the Chronicles tells us, that, 'in the business of the ambassadors of the princes of Babylon, who sent unto him to inquire of the wonder that was done in the land, God left him, to try him, that he might know all that was in his heart,' (2 Chron. xxxii. 31.) And, from hence some have inferred, that Hezekiah's great offence lay, not so much in the ostentation of his military stores and treasures, as in his not giving sufficient glory to God for so signal a miracle, and his recovery ensuing thereupon, and in his not representing this matter to these idolatrous ambassadors, in such powerful and convincing terms as might have drawn them over to the knowledge of the true God, which was the proper improvement he should have made of this divine vouchsafement to him.—Le Clerc's Commentary. [However we may endeavour to excuse Hezekiah, it is certain that he made an exhibition of his riches and power in a spirit of great vanity; and that this did displease the Lord. It was also ruinous to Judea; when those foreigners had seen such a profusion of wealth, such princely establishments, and such a fruitful land, it was natural for them to conceive the wish that they had such treasures, and from that to covet the very treasures they saw. They made their report to their king and countrymen, and the desire to possess the Jewish wealth became general; and in consequence of this there is little doubt that the conquest of Jerusalem was projected.]—Dr A. Clarke.—Ed.

^a The words in the text are: 'Then said Hezekiah unto Isaiah, good is the word of the Lord, which thou hast spoken. And he said, is it not good if peace and truth be in my days? (2 Kings xx. 19.) The prophet hath told him, that the very people whom he had been so lightly complimenting would carry his posterity into captivity; and to return him such an answer as this, shows not all the concern which a good prince ought to have for his people and posterity. It shows, indeed, as if he cared not what became of them, so long as he was permitted to live easy and happy. The words in the original are to this effect, 'that which thou hast told me from God, is good: I willingly submit to it: but shall peace and truth,' that is, solid and lasting peace, 'continue for my time?' 'May I flatter myself with so much happiness? And will God be so gracious as not to revoke the grant which he hath made me of a longer continuance here? He is just, no doubt, in every thing he sends upon us; but do these threats relate to me or my posterity only? Well were it for me, if he would suspend the execution of his wrath for the little time that I have to live.' This is the natural sense of Hezekiah's answer; and accordingly Josephus makes him say, 'That though I am much afflicted at the thoughts of the misery that will befall my family, yet, since it is God's pleasure that it should be so, I have no more to beg of Heaven, than that I may enjoy the small remainder of my miserable life in peace.—Jewish Antiq. b. x. c. 3. and Calnet's Commentary.

want of water; but this is what the besiegers do generally practise against the besieged. In this manner it was Holofernes intended to distress Bethulia, (Judith vii.); and of Semiramis, Cyrus, and Alexander, it is reported, that they all took Babylon by diverting the current of the Euphrates. But Hezekiah here takes another method; he is for preventing the Assyrians from carrying on the siege of Jerusalem by intercepting the water, that is, by filling up the fountain-heads with earth, that the enemy might not perceive where any water was; and so carrying their streams through pipes and subterraneous channels into the city, there to be received in basins and large pools for the benefit of the besieged: and this he might do with more facility to himself, and prejudice to the enemy, because (except the springs and brooks that were just contiguous to the city) the whole country, (according to Strabo, b. xvi.) for the space of sixty furlongs round about, was all barren and waterless.—Le Clerc's Commentary.

^c This must be the brook Kidron, which ran in a valley of that name, between the city and the mount of Olives, when it had any water in it; for, except in the case of great rains, or the snow's dissolving from the mountains, it was generally dry. However, if it had any fountain-head, by stopping up that, and diverting its current by conveyances under ground, Hezekiah might, in like manner, make it of no use to the besiegers.—Patrick's and Calnet's Commentaries.

^d The Hebrew talent, according to Scripture, (Exod. xxv. 39.) contains three hundred shekels, and every shekel answering to the value of three shillings, these three hundred talents of silver must contain, of our money, thirteen thousand five hundred pounds; and the thirty talents of gold, one hundred and sixty-four thousand two hundred and fifty; so that the whole sum here paid by Hezekiah amounted to one hundred and seventy-seven thousand seven hundred and fifty pounds of our money.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 713.

^e What might possibly be the occasion of a war between two kingdoms so widely distant as Assyria and Egypt were, it is difficult to know. We have nowhere any information from history, and are left therefore to conjecture—that, after Salmaneser had taken away the ten tribes, and sent colonies in their room, the tribe of Simeon, which lay nearest to Egypt, becoming part of his dominions, as well as the rest, the Egyptians might take the advantage of the Assyrians' great distance, and make some encroachments upon it. That Sennacherib, when he was come as far as Judea, might take that opportunity to proceed with his arms into Egypt, in order to be revenged on Severchus, the son of Sabacon or So, whom Herodotus calls Sethon, who was at this time king of Egypt, and the chief pontiff likewise of the god Vulcan. And as he was a weak prince, the king of Assyria gained many advantages over him; but, sitting down at length cesses, he returned again, and invested Lachish, and thence, contrary to all faith, and the agreement subsisting between him and the kings of Judah, sent three of his principal officers, with a good detachment of forces to demand the surrender of Jerusalem.

^a Rabshakeh, for that was the name of the person who before Pelusium, when he had brought his platforms, as Josephus tells us, within a little of the top of the walls, and was upon the very point of giving the assault, news was brought him, that Tirhakah king of Ethiopia was upon his march, with a great reinforcement to assist the Egyptians; whereupon he immediately raised the siege, and drew off his army, which gave occasion to the fabulous account in Herodotus, namely, 'That upon the king's prayer to his god Vulcan, there came in one night such troops of rats, into the camp of the Assyrians, that they gnawed all their bowstrings to pieces, and so, in effect, disarmed the whole camp of the besiegers, and made them draw off from the town with so much precipitation.'—Le Clerc's Commentary on 2 Kings xxiii. 29, and Jewish Antiquities, b. x. c. 1. The overthrow of Sennacherib, whose expedition was designed particularly against Egypt, is described by Herodotus, (ii. 141,) but evidently corrupted by the Egyptian priests from whom Herodotus received the narration. His words are: "After this a priest of Vulcan, by name Setho, ascended the throne. He very imprudently treated the soldiers with great severity, as though he should never stand in need of their services. He insulted them in many ways, and took from them the lands which had been granted to them by former kings, at the rate of twelve arure (ἀρῦρες) to a man. (Compare Is. xix. 1—4.) But afterwards when Sennacherib king of the Arabs and Assyrians was advancing against Egypt with a great army, the Egyptian soldiers refused to lend their aid against him. The priest was now in great perplexity; and, going into the temple, complained to his idol, with tears, of the peril he was in. In the midst of his complaints he was overtaken by sleep, and there appeared to him in a vision, the god standing by him, and bidding him to be of good courage, for no misfortune should befall him in encountering the Arabian army; for he himself would send him helpers. Confiding in this dream, he took such Egyptians as were willing to follow him, and encamped at Pelusium: for through this place the invaders must necessarily make their attack. None of the soldiers followed him, but only the merchants, artificers, and populace. When they had arrived there, field mice in great numbers spread themselves about among their enemies, and gnawed in pieces the quivers and bows, and thongs of the shields, so that on the following morning they were obliged to flee, destitute of arms, and many fell. Even to this day there stands in the temple of Vulcan a stone statue of this king, having a mouse in his hand, and speaking by an inscription to the following effect, 'Let him who looks on me reverence the gods.'" From this narrative, though considerably distorted, it is plain that the Egyptians attributed their deliverance from Sennacherib to a deity, and to that deity whom the Greeks call Ἡρμῆς, Vulcan. Among the Egyptians he is named Phtha or Kneph; and because he is said to have made the world, he is also called Δαμουργός, the artificer. Now, as the God of the Hebrews was the Creator of the world, the Egyptians might easily confound him with their Phtha, and attribute this deliverance to the latter. The circumstance of Setho's going into the temple and complaining of his danger to Phtha, is manifestly borrowed from what is related of Hezekiah, (Is. xxxvii. 14, 15.) Eusebius makes Setho the first king of the nineteenth Diospotic dynasty, and assigns to his reign fifty-five years. But if Tirhakah, whom Manetho places as the third of the twenty-fifth Ethiopic dynasty, with a reign of twenty years, was master of Egypt, then Setho could be only a tributary king and a vassal of this universal conqueror, or, at most could only reign over the Delta and Upper Egypt.—John's Hebrew Commonwealth.—E.

^a Tartan, Rab-aris, and Rabshakeh, are not the proper names of these men, but rather denote their employments and offices. Tartan signifies the president of the customs, Rab-saris, the chief eunuch, and Rabshakeh, the principal cup-bearer; and because he spake Hebrew with some fluency, the rabbins are generally of opinion, that he was either an apostate Jew, or one of the captivity of Israel. It is certain that he was a very eloquent man, and his speech very well calculated to raise sedition, or detection among the besieged; but that a person of his edu-

delivered the demand from the king of Assyria, spake in the Hebrew tongue, and in a very insolent and impetuous manner, to the three ministers of state whom Hezekiah sent to parley with him, telling them, "That it was in vain for them to trust in their God for help, because his master's arms had been all along so victorious, that the gods of other nations could not resist their course, and much more vain would it be, to depend on the king of Egypt for assistance, who was hardly able to support his own dominions, and would certainly ^b fail them when they looked for his aid. Their wisest way, therefore, would be to surrender the town to his master, the great king of Assyria, at discretion; for if they pretended to stand a siege, (and this he spake with a louder voice than ordinary, in the audience of the people that were upon the wall, and in hopes of creating a revolt among them,) his master would distress them to such a degree, that they should be compelled to eat their own excrements, and drink their own piss."

When Hezekiah heard the blasphemous message, which Rabshakeh had delivered to his ministers, he rent his clothes, put on sackcloth, went to the temple to address himself to God, and sent an account thereof to his prophet Isaiah. But Isaiah's answer was, not to fear the menaces of the proud Assyrian; for that God would soon find out a method to make him depart his country; ^c which accordingly came to pass. For news cation should be versed in the Phœnician, which is in a manner the same with the Hebrew language, is no wonder at all. Moreover, had he been a Jew, though an apostate, he should have known better, one would think, than to have upbraided Hezekiah, with acting according to the law under which he lived, in destroying the groves and altars of idols, and in requiring his subjects to worship God in Jerusalem only, (2 Kings xviii. 22).—Le Clerc's Commentary.

^b The words in the text are, 'Now behold thou trustest upon the staff of this bruised reed, even upon Egypt, (2 Kings xviii. 21.)' The comparison is excellent, to denote an ally that is not only weak and unable to help, but dangerous likewise to those that rely upon him for succour; and his representing the power of Egypt to be as brittle as the canes or reeds that grow on the banks of the Nile, for it is to this, no doubt, that the Assyrian orator alludes, is a great beauty in the similitude. This, however, must be allowed, that what he here speaks in contempt of the Egyptian strength, has more of ostentation in it than truth; because the Assyrian army, having lately made an attempt to subdue that kingdom, was now returned into Judea with disgrace. Patrick's, Le Clerc's, and Calnet's Commentaries.

^c 2 Kings xix. 7. 'Behold I will send a blast upon him.' The destruction of Sennacherib and his army appears to have been effected by that pestiferous wind called the simoom. Mr Bruce thus speaks of it:—"We had no sooner got into the plains than we felt great symptoms of the simoom; and about a quarter before twelve, our prisoner first, and then Idris called out, 'The simoom! the simoom!' My curiosity would not suffer me to fall down without looking behind me; about due south, a little to the east, I saw the coloured haze as before. It seemed now to be rather less compressed, and to have with it a shade of blue: the edges of it were not defined as those of the former, but like a very thin smoke, with about a yard in the middle tinged with those colours. We all fell upon our faces, and the simoom passed with a gentle shuffling wind." It continued to blow in this manner till near three o'clock, so that we were all taken ill that night, and scarcely strength was left us to load the camels, and arrange the baggage." (Travels, vol. iv. p. 581.) In another place Mr Bruce describes it as producing a desperate kind of indolence about life; that it brought upon him a degree of cowardice and languor, which he struggled with in vain; and that it completely exhausted his strength. From the accounts of various travellers, it appears to have been almost instantaneously fatal and petrifying. It was consequently a fit agent to be employed in desolatbeing brought him that Tirhakah king of Ethiopia, or of the Cushites rather in Arabia, had invaded some part of his dominions, he immediately raised the siege of Libnah, ^a where he then was, and marched against the enemy: however, before he raised the siege, he sent a second summons to Hezekiah, as insolent and blasphemous as the former. This was delivered in a letter; and Hezekiah had no sooner read it, but he went into the temple, spread it before the Lord, and implored of him a deliverance from this outrageous enemy; which Isaiah assured him he should have, because that the Lord had taken the city of Jerusalem under his protection, and would not therefore suffer the king of Assyria, ^b notwithstanding all his vain boastings, to come near it.

In the mean time, the king of Assyria having engaged the Ethiopian army, and given them a great overthrow, was in full march to Jerusalem, flushed with this fresh victory, and resolved to destroy the place, and every soul in it; when the very night after that the prophet had given the king of Judah this assurance, an angel ^c

ing the army of Sennacherib. It sometimes happens, that during an excessive heat, there comes a breath of air still more burning, and that both men and beasts being already overpowered and faint, this small increase of heat entirely deprives them of respiration.—Niebuhr's Description of Arabia, p. 81.—Ed.

^a Libnah was not far from Lachish, both situated on the mountains of Judea; and it is probable that Sennacherib, not finding himself able to carry the latter, had removed the siege to Libnah, which was a place not so well fortified in his opinion, and yet so situated, that by keeping a good guard in the chops of the mountains, he might carry on the siege, without any fear of Tirhakah's coming upon him.—Le Clerc's Commentary.

^b The prophet, in his answer to Hezekiah, has given us an admirable description of the ridiculous vanity and ostentation of a king puffed up with great success: "By thy messengers thou hast reproached the Lord, and hast said, With the multitude of my chariots I am come up to the height of the mountains, and the sides of Lebanon; and I will enter into the lodgings of his borders, and enter into the forest of his Carmel. I have digged, and drunk strange waters, and with the soles of my feet have I dried up all the rivers of besieged places," (2 Kings: xix. 23, &c.) as if he had said, "What can resist the force of my victorious arms? Or where is the place that is inaccessible to the strength and activity of these troops? I have scaled the top of the highest mountains, with my heavy chariots of war. I have ascended even Lebanon itself, and through the most difficult passages have opened and plained myself a way. Who then shall hinder me from taking up my quarters in what part of Judea I please, from either climbing up to the top of Carmel, or from coming down into the fruitful vales, by making an entire conquest of the country? At my call fountains, even in the driest places, arise; at my beck the hills subside, the rocks divide, and make me a way; and at my approach, the deepest rivers and ditches run dry; so that resistance is unavailable, and victory must attend my standard wherever I go, or whatever enterprise I take in hand."

^c The ancient Jews, as well as the Persians and Arabians, were of opinion, that there is an angel of death, or an exterminating angel, to whom God has given the commission to take away the lives, either of single persons, or of multitudes of people at once, wherein the Almighty gives the order, but leaves the method of doing it to the discretion of the angel; so that in which way soever the infliction is made, it is always said to be done by the angel of God. The modern Jews are much of the same opinion: for they maintain that this angel of death stands at every dying man's bed's head, with a naked sword in his hand, at the extremity of which there hang three drops of gall, and that the sick person, seeing this angel, in a great fright opens his mouth, whereupon he immediately drops into it these three fatal drops; the first of which occasions his death; the second makes him pale and livid; and the third reduces him to the dust in the grave, with some other notions of the like nature. Now since the Scripture has nowhere said expressly, in what manner this Assyrian army was destroyed, some have thought that it was by a plague; others by thunder and of the Lord came down into the camp of the Assyrians, and smote no less than a hundred fourscore and five thousand men: ^d so that, terrified by this slaughter, Sennacherib made haste into his own country, and took up his residence at Nineveh; where he had not been long, before ^e his two eldest sons, Adrammelech and Sharezer conspired against him, and, as he was worship-lightning; others by fire from heaven; others by a scorching wind; and others by their falling foul of one another in the obscurity of the night; but which way soever it was effected, according to the Hebrew idiom, there is no impropriety in saying, that it was done by a destroying angel, which is a comprehensive phrase, that reconciles all the Scripture passages wherein this terrible defeat is mentioned, and all the sentiments of commentators concerning it.—Calmet's Dissert. on the Defeat of the Army of Sennacherib.

^d The reign of the good king Hezekiah was signalized by the extraordinary and memorable deliverance, which the Lord granted to him and his people out of the hands of the Assyrians under Sennacherib. The destruction of the vast multitude whom that invader commanded, and who became all dead corpses in a single night, is in one passage attributed to an angel of the Lord; but, in another part of the same history, and also by Isaiah, it is said to have been occasioned by a blast, which is generally, and on good grounds, supposed to mean the simoom, or hot pestilential wind which is so prevalent in the sultry regions of the east. It is a south wind, which, blowing over an immense tract of heated ground or sand, becomes itself so hot and stifling, as to occasion the greatest danger, and even immediate death to the traveller. Its approach is indicated by a haze in the atmosphere, in colours like the purple part of the rainbow, and passes along with silent and incredible velocity. The moment it is perceived by the natives and the camels, who are well acquainted with its fatal power, they instantly fall to the ground, and bury their mouth and nostrils in the sand. Della Valle mentions the melancholy fate of two gentlemen, who were travelling with him, and who having gone, during the middle of the day, into a khan to rest, fell asleep at the open window, and were found dead, and their bodies very black and disfigured, in consequence of a blast of the simoom having passed over them while they lay, unconscious of their danger, in that exposed situation. Another traveller mentions, that the water in their skins was dried up in a moment, and that his companion, who had been bathing in the Tigris, having on a pair of Turkish drawers, showed them, on his return, perfectly dried in an instant by this hot wind having come across the river. The most circumstantial, however, as well as the most recent account of a dreadful destruction, occasioned by this hot wind in the year 1813, is given in the newspapers of that day. The caravan from Mecca to Aleppo consisted of 2000 souls, merchants and travellers, pilgrims returning from performing their devotions at Mecca, and a numerous train of attendants, the whole escorted by 400 military. The march was in three columns. On the 15th of August, they entered the great Arabian desert, in which they travelled seven days, and were nearly approaching its boundary. A few hours more would have placed them beyond the reach of danger, when, on the morning of the 23d, just as they had struck their tents, and begun their march, a wind rose and blew with tremendous rapidity. They pushed on as fast as their beasts of burden could carry them, to escape the threatened danger, when the fatal simoom set in suddenly, the sky was overcast, dense clouds appeared, whose extremity darkened the horizon, and shot with the rapidity of lightning across the desert. They approached the columns of the caravan. Both men and beasts, overcome by a sense of common danger, uttered piercing cries, and the next moment fell beneath its pestilential influence. Of 2000 souls composing the caravan, not more than twenty escaped the calamity, and these owed their preservation to the swiftness of their dromedaries. Such, in all probability, was the terrible agent which heaven employed for the destruction of the prodigious army led on by the king of Assyria.—Jamieson's Eastern Manners.—Ed.

^e When Sennacherib was got home, after the loss of so great an army, he demanded of some about him, what the reason might be, that the irresistible God of heaven so favoured the Jewish nation? To which he was answered, that Abraham, from whom they were descended, by sacrificing his only son to him, had ping at the temple of Nisroch, ^a his god, fell upon him, and slew him; and afterwards making their escape into Armenia, gave room for Esarhaddon, their younger brother, to succeed in the throne.

After this signal defeat of the Assyrian army, Hezekiah lived the remainder of his days in peace and tranquillity, being both honoured and revered by all neighbouring nations, who by this, and several more instances, perceived that he was under the immediate protection of God, and were therefore afraid to give him any molestation. So that, being at rest from wars, he applied his thoughts to the good government of his people, and the improvement of the city of Jerusalem, by erecting magazines, and filling them with arms, and by making a new aqueduct, which was of great convenience to the inhabitants for the supplying them with water. At length, after a course of great and worthy actions, he died in the twenty-ninth year of his reign, and was buried, with great solemnity, ^b in the most honourable place of the sepulchres of the sons of David. Happy in every thing else, except in being succeeded by a son, whose name was Manasseh, and who, in the beginning of his reign more especially, proved the very worst of all his race.

Manasseh was but a minor of twelve years old when he succeeded to the crown; and as he had the misfortune to fall into the hands of such guardians and chief ministers, as were ill affected to his father's reformation, they took all the care imaginable to breed him up in the strongest aversion to it, and to corrupt his mind with the worst of principles, both as to religion and government. For he not only worshipped idols, restored high places, and erected altars unto Baal, but in the room of the ark of the covenant set up an idol, even in the sanctuary itself, made his children pass through the fire to Moloch, practised witchcrafts and enchantments, and consulted soothsayers, and such persons as dealt with familiar spirits.

Nor was he content to practise these abominations himself, but being naturally of a cruel temper, he raised bitter persecutions against those who would not conform.

purchased his protection to his progeny; whereupon the king replied, 'If that will win him, I will spare him two of mine to gain him to my side;' which when his two sons, Sharezer and Adrammelech heard, they resolved to prevent their own death by sacrificing him. But for all this fiction, there is no other foundation but that scarce any thing else can be thought of, that can afford any excuse for so wicked a parricide.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 709.

^a Some take this god to be the figure of Noah's ark; others of a dove, which was worshipped among the Assyrians; and others of an eagle. The Hebrew of Tobit, published by Munster, calls it Dagon; but Selden acknowledges, that in all his reading he never met with any thing that could help him to explain it. Jurien, however, seems to be more lucky in his inquiries; for, by several arguments, he has made it appear, that this idol was Jupiter Belus, the founder of the Babylonish empire, who was worshipped under the form of an eagle; and therefore, he observes farther, that as this Belus in profane history was the same with the Nimrod of Moses, between Nimrod and Nisroch the dissimilitude is not great, nor is it improbable that to perpetuate his honour, his votaries might change the name of Nimrod, which signifies a rebel, into that of Nisroch, which denotes a young eagle.—Patrick's Commentary, and Jurien's History of Doctrines, &c. part 1. c. 11.

^b In the innermost and chiefest of the rooms of the royal sepulchres of the house of David, was the body of Hezekiah placed in a niche, which in the upper end of the room was very likely at that time cut out purpose for it, to do him the greater honour.—Prideaux's Connection, anno C99.

The prophets ^c who were sent to reprove him, he treated with the utmost contempt and outrage, and filled, in short, all the land with innocent blood, which he shed in carrying on his detestable purposes; but it was not long before the divine vengeance overtook him.

Esarhaddon being settled in the kingdom of Babylon, began to set his thoughts on the recovery of what his father Sennacherib had lost in Syria and Palestine; and having raised a great army, marched into the territories of the ten tribes, from whence he carried away a great multitude of Israelites, who were remains of the former captivity, and so sending some of his generals with a part of his army to Judea to reduce that country likewise, they vanquished Manasseh in battle, and having taken him hid in a thicket of briars and brambles, brought him prisoner to Esarhaddon, ^d who put him in irons, and carried him prisoner to Babylon.

^e His prison and chains brought him to himself, and made him so sensible of his heinous provocations against God, that with deep sorrow and humiliation, ^f he implored the divine pity and forgiveness, and thereupon prevailed with God, to mollify the king of Babylon's heart, who restored him to his liberty, and reinstated him in his kingdom.

Upon his return to Jerusalem, he redressed, as much as he could, the mischiefs which his former impiety had

^c The prophets who were supposed to have been living in this king's reign, were Hoshea, Joel, Nahum, Habakkuk, some say Obadiah; and who was the greatest prophet of them all, Isaiah. In the late reign he was in great esteem at court, and being himself of the blood royal, and as some say, the king's father-in-law, he thought it more incumbent upon him to endeavour to reclaim him from his degenerate wicked courses. But this so exasperated him against Isaiah, that, instead of hearkening to his remonstrances, he caused him to be apprehended, and to make his torture both more lingering, and more exquisite, had him sawn asunder with a wooden saw, to which the author of the epistle to the Hebrews, c. xi. 37.; may be thought to allude.—Calnet's Commentary, and Hovell's History, in the notes.

^d From Isaiah xx. 1, we may learn, that Esarhaddon, whom the sacred writer in that place calls Sargon, king of Assyria, sent Tartan, his general into Palestine; and it was he, very probably, who took Manasseh and carried him prisoner to Babylon. Esarhaddon was some time before, no more than king of Assyria, but upon his accession to the throne, he made himself master of Babylon and Chaldaea, and so united the two empires together.—Calnet's Commentary and Prideaux's Connection, anno 677.

^e The Jewish doctors have a tradition, that while Manasseh was at Babylon, by the direction of his conqueror, he was put in a large brazen vessel full of holes, and set near to a great fire; that in this extremity, he had recourse to all his false deities, to whom he had offered so many sacrifices, but received no relief from them; that remembering what he had heard his good father Hezekiah say, namely, when thou art in tribulation, if thou turn to the Lord thy God, he will not forsake thee, neither destroy thee, (Deut. iv. 30, 31.) he was thereupon immediately delivered, and in a moment translated to his kingdom; but this is no less a fiction, than that miraculous flame which the author of the imperfect comment upon St. Matthew speaks of, that encompassed him on a sudden, as he was praying to God, and having melted his chains asunder, set him at liberty. See Tradit. Hebr. in Paralip. et Targum, in 2 Chron. xxiii. 11. In all probability it was Saos Duchin, the successor of Esarhaddon, who, some years after his captivity, released Manasseh out of prison.

^f We have a prayer, which it is pretended he made in prison. The church does not receive it as canonical, but it has a place among the apocryphal pieces, and in our collections, stands before the books of the Maccabees. The Greek church, however, has received it into their Euchologium, or book of prayers, and they use it sometimes as a kind of devout form, and what contains nothing in it deserving censure.—Calnet's Dictionary under the word Manasseh.

done. He abolished the idolatrous profanations of the temple; restored, in all things, the reformation which his father had made, and obliged all his subjects to worship and serve the Lord only; so that, after this, God blessed him with a long and prosperous reign, longer indeed than any of the kings of Judah, either before or after him, had reigned. He possessed the throne full five and fifty years: and yet, notwithstanding his signal repentance, because his former wickedness was so great, he was not allowed the honour of being buried in any of the royal sepulchres, but was laid in a grave made in the garden belonging to his own house, called the garden of Uzzah, ^a and was succeeded by his son Amon.

This prince, imitating the first part of his father's reign, and not the repentance of his latter, gave himself up to all manner of wickedness and impiety; so that God shortened his government, by permitting some of his own domestics, ^b after a reign of two years, to conspire against him, and slay him: but as wicked as he was, the people of the land took care to revenge his murder, by putting all to death who had any hand in it, though they would not, at his burial, honour him, any more than his father, with a place among the sepulchres of the sons of David.

His son Josiah, who was then a child no more than eight years old, succeeded in the throne; but, having the happiness to fall under the conduct of better guardians in his minority, than did Manasseh his grandfather, he proved, when grown up, a prince of very extraordinary worth, equal, if not superior, in piety, virtue, and goodness, to the best of his predecessors. In the sixteenth year of his age, he took upon him the administration of the kingdom; and beginning with the reformation of religion, endeavoured to purge it from all those corruptions, which had been introduced in the preceding reigns. To this purpose, he took a progress through the whole kingdom, and wherever he came, brake down the altars, cut down the groves, ^c and brake in pieces all the carved and molten images that were dedicated to idolatry. The graves of idolatrous priests he dug up, and burned their bones upon some of these altars, thereby to defile and pollute them for ever; and ^d whatever priests of the Levitical order had at any time sacrificed on the high places, though it were to the true God, these he took care to depose from their sacerdotal office. ^e The houses of the Sodomites he broke down: Tophet, ^f which was in the valley of Hinnom, he defiled. The horses ^g dedicated to the sun he re-derivatives are used. Here follow proofs. In chap. xxiii. 6, it is said, that 'Josiah brought out the groves from the house of the Lord.' This translation seems very absurd; for what grove could there be in the temple? there was none planted there, nor was there room for any. The plain meaning of vaiyotse eth haasherah nibbepeth Yehovah is, 'And he brought out the (goddess) Asherah from the house of the Lord, and burnt it.' That this is the true meaning of the place appears further from verse 7, where it is said, 'he broke down the houses of the Sodomites,' (hakkedeshim, of the whoremongers,) 'where the women wove hangings for the grove,' (hattin laasherah, houses or shrines for Asherah.) Similar perhaps to those which the silversmiths made for Diana, (Acts xix. 24.) It is rather absurd to suppose that the women were employed in making curtains to encompass a grove. The Syriac and Arabic versions countenance the interpretation I have given above. In verse 6, the former says, 'he cast out the idol, dechlotho, from the house of the Lord,' and in verse 7, 'he threw down the houses, dazone, of the prostitutes; and the women who wove garments, tedechlotho, for the idols which were there. The Arabic is exactly the same. From the whole it is evident that Asherah was no other than Venus; the nature of whose worship is plain enough from the mention of whoremongers and prostitutes. I deny not that there were groves consecrated to idolatrous worship among the Gentiles, but I am sure that such are not intended in the above cited passages, and the text in most places reads better when understood in this way.—Dr A. Clarke, 2 Kings xxi. end of chap.—Ed.

^d Several of these priests, seeing the worship of the temple abandoned, and, after that the tenths, and offerings, and sacrifices were taken away, having nothing to subsist themselves, had the weakness to repair to the high places, and there offer unto God such oblations and sacrifices as the people brought them; for it does not appear that any of them entered into the service of false gods; but because this was giving countenance by their presence and ministry to a worship that was forbidden, (Deut. xii. 11.) he would not receive them any more into the service of the temple, though he suffered them to be maintained by it. He puts them, in short, into the conditions of those priests that had any blemish, who might 'not offer the bread of their God,' and yet might 'eat the bread of their God, both of the holy and most holy,' Lev. xxi. 21, 22.—Cabnet's and Patrick's Commentaries.

^e This was the name which is sometimes given to the most infamous of all prostitutes, who expose their bodies to be abused contrary to nature, in honour of those filthy deities whom they worshipped. Their houses were near the temple, and therefore these were persons consecrated to impurity; and that they might commit their abominations with a greater licentiousness, they had women appointed to make them tents, wherein they were wont to retire upon these detestable occasions.—Cabnet's Commentary.

^f It is the general opinion of the Jews, that the word tophet comes from toph, which, in their language, signifies a drum; because drums, in this place, were used to be beat, in order to deaden the cries of those children which were burned alive to the idol Molech; but there is one objection to this etymology, namely, that it does not appear that the larger kind of drums, such as are in use now, were at all known to the ancients. There was a lesser sort, indeed, or what we call a tabor, wherewith they made music in their dancing; but these were not loud enough for the present purpose, and the larger kind we owe to the Arabians, who first brought them into Spain, from whence they were dispersed all Europe over.—Le Clerc's Commentary.

^g It is certain that all the people of the east worshipped the sun, and consecrated horses to it, because they were nimble and swift in their course, even as they supposed it to be: "The Persian appeases the ray-encircled Apollo with a horse, lest a slow-footed victim should be given to the fleet God." (Ovid. Fast. b.

^a This garden, as some think, was made in that very spot of ground where Uzzah was struck dead, for 'touching the ark of the Lord,' (2 Sam. vi. 7.) but others imagine, that this was the place where Uzziah, who died a leper, was buried, (2 Chron. xxvi. 23.) and that Manasseh chose to be buried here, as unworthy, because of his manifold sins, whereof he nevertheless repented, to be laid in any of the royal sepulchres of the kings of Judah.—Patrick's and Cabnet's Commentaries.

^b This, as some Jewish authors observe, is the usual number of years to which the sons of those kings did arrive, who, by their abominations, provoked God to anger; as they instance in the son of Jeroboam, (1 Kings xv. 25.) the son of Baasha, (chap. xvi. 8.) the son of Ahab, (chap. xxii. 51.)—Patrick's Commentary.

^c In 2 Kings xxi. 3 and 7, it is said, that 'Manasseh made a grove, and he set a graven image of the grove,' &c., vaiyasem eth pesel haasherah, asher asah: 'And he put the graven image of Asherah, which he had made,' into the house. Asherah, and which we translate grove, is undoubtedly the name of an idol; and probably of one which was carved out of wood. R. S. Jareh, on Gen. xii. 3, says, 'that Asherah means a tree, which was worshipped by the Gentiles;' like as the oak was worshipped by the ancient Druids in Britain. Castel in Lex. Hept. sub voce אשרה, defines Asherah thus: 'a wooden image dedicated to Astarte or Venus. The LXX. render the words by ασοις; and Flaminius Nobilis, on 2 Kings xxiii. 4, says, "Again Theoderet observes, ασοις is Astarte and Venus; and by other interpreters called Ashtaroth." The Targum of Ben Uzziel, on Deut. vii. 5, 'Their groves shall ye cut down,' translates the place thus:—veilaney sigedeghon tekatsetsim, 'and the oaks of their adoration shall ye cut down.' From the above it is pretty evident that idols, not groves, are generally intended where asherah and its moved; burned its chariots with fire; and being not satisfied with destroying all the monuments of idolatry in his own dominions, he visited in person the cities of Ephraim and Manasseh, and all the rest of the land which had formerly been possessed by the ten tribes, and there did the same. But while he was at Bethel, ^a discovering by the inscription the monument of the prophet who was sent from Judah to declare against the altar which Jeroboam had there set up, and (above three hundred years before) to name the very name of Josiah who was to destroy it; he would not suffer it to be touched, nor his bones to be molested.

Having thus carried on the work of reformation in the distant parts of his kingdom, he took care in the next place, to have the temple repaired. To this purpose, he ordered Hilkiah the high priest to take a general view of it, and see what was necessary to be done; who, while he was surveying and examining every place, chanced to find 'a book of the law of the Lord given by Moses.' The book was carried to the king, who, having ^b heard some part of it read, rent his robes in dread of the curses denounced against a wicked people, and immediately sent the high priest, and some other of his chief officers, to Huldah ^c the prophetess to inquire of the Lord; who returned them in answer, 'that the judgments threatened in the book of the law would not be long before they fell upon the kingdom of Judah; but that, because the king had expressed so deep a concern upon hearing the denunciation of them, their execution should be delayed till after his death.'

The good king, however, in order to appease the wrath of God, called together a solemn assembly of all the elders and people of Judah and Jerusalem; and going with them to the temple, he caused the law of God there to be distinctly read; and when that was done, both he and all the people entered into a covenant to observe all that was contained in it. After this he made another progress round the kingdom of Judah and Samaria, to destroy every the least remainder of idolatry that he could meet with; and when the season of the next passover was come, had it ^d kept with such exactness and solemnity, as had never been observed from the days of Samuel the prophet to that time.

In a word, this excellent prince did all that in him lay to atone for the sins of the people, and appease the wrath of God; but his decree, ^e for the removal of Judah into a

i.) But then the question is, whether the people of Judah sacrificed these horses to the sun, as it is certain that the Armenians, Persians, and other nations did, or only led them out in state every morning, to meet and salute the sun at its rising. The ancients had a notion likewise, that the sun itself was carried about in a chariot; and therefore chariots, as well as horses, were dedicated to it. Since then we find these horses and chariots standing so near together, the horses, we may suppose, were designed to draw the chariots, and the chariots to carry the king and his other great officers, who were idolaters of this kind, out at the east gate of the city every morning, to salute and adore the sun at its coming above the horizon.—Bochart's Hieroz. part. 1. b. xi. c. 10.

^a The Jews will tell us, that, on one side of the grave, where the prophet of Judah and the prophet of Bethel lay together, there grew nettles and thistles, on the other, myrtles, and other odoriferous plants, signifying that a true and false prophet lay there; and that this raised the king's curiosity to inquire whose that sepulchre was; but there is no ground for this fabulous fancy. The king, we may suppose, espied a stone or a pillar more eminent than the rest, with the names of the persons that were buried under it, and this made him ask the question of the men of the city, that is, some of the old inhabitants that had escaped the captivity, and not any of those new-comers whom the king of Assyria had sent thither; for these could give no account of the ancient histories of the Israelites; neither can we suppose that the sepulchre itself, after so many years' standing, could have been distinguishable, had not some pious person or other, with an intent to perpetuate the memory of the thing, in each successive age, taken care to preserve and repair it (Mat. xxiii. 29).—Le Clerc's and Patrick's Commentaries.

^b Whether it was the whole Pentateuch, or the book of Deuteronomy only, which the high priest found in the temple, it is generally agreed, that the part which Shaphan read to the king was taken out of Deuteronomy, and not without some probability, that the xxviiith, xxixth, and xxxth chapters were that portion of Scripture which the secretary, who, as we are told 2 Kings xxii. 8, had read the book before he brought it to the king, thought proper upon this occasion to turn to; for therein is contained a renewal of the covenant, which Moses, as mediator, had made between God and the people of Israel at mount Horeb; and therein are those threats and terrible comminations to the transgressors of the law, whether prince or people, which affected Josiah so much; and 'which Moses had given the Levites to put on the side of the covenant, that it might be there for a witness' against the transgressors of it, (Deut. xxxi. 25, 26).—Cabnet's Commentary.

^c This is the only mention we have of this prophetess, and certainly it makes much to her renown, that she was consulted upon this weighty occasion, when both Jeremiah and Zephaniah were at that time prophets in Judah. But Zephaniah, perhaps, at that time, might not have commenced a prophet; because, though we are told that he 'prophesied in the days of Josiah,' (Zeph. i. 1.) yet we are nowhere informed in what part of his reign he entered upon the prophetic office. Jeremiah, too, might at that time be absent from Jerusalem, at his house at Anathoth, or some more remote part of the kingdom; so that, considering Josiah's haste and impatience, there might be no other remedy at hand to apply to but this woman: 'great is the wrath of the Lord that is kindled against us,' says the king to his ministers, (2 Kings xxii. 13.) and therefore his intent, in sending them, might be to inquire whether there were any hopes of appeasing his wrath, and in what manner it was to be done. Being therefore well assured of this woman's fidelity in delivering the mind and counsel of God, the ministers who went to inquire, concluded rightly, that it was much more considerable what message God sent, than by whose hand it was that he conveyed it.—Poole's Annotations.

^d The words of the text are, 'Surely there was not held such a passover, from the days of the judges, nor in all the days of the kings of Israel, and of the kings of Judah,' (2 Kings xxiii. 22.) which, taken in a literal sense, must denote, that this passover, which was celebrated by two tribes only, was more numerous, and more magnificent, than all those that were observed in the days of David and Solomon, in the most happy and flourishing state of the Jewish monarchy, and when the whole twelve tribes were met together, to solemnize that feast. It may not be amiss therefore to allow, that, in these expressions, there is a kind of auæsis or exaggeration, not unusual in sacred, as well as in profane authors. For nothing is more common than to say, "never was so much splendour and magnificence seen," when we mean no more, than that the thing we speak of was very splendid and magnificent; unless we suppose with some, that a preference is given to this passover above all the rest, in respect of the exact observation of the rites and ceremonies belonging to it, which, at other times, were performed according to custom, and several things either altered or omitted; whereas at this, every thing was performed according to the prescribed form of the law, from which, since the finding of this authentic copy of it, Josiah enjoined them not to vary one tittle.—Cabnet's and Le Clerc's Commentaries. [What distinguished this passover from all others before it, was doubtless the regularity with which it was observed, together with the zeal and devotion of those who were engaged in it. The words of the text do not therefore apply to the number present, but to the manner in which the solemnity was kept, and the spirit which animated the worshippers.]—Ed.

^e Though Josiah was doubtless sincere in what he did, and omitted nothing to restore the purity of God's worship, wherever his power extended; yet the people had still a hankering after land of their captivity, was passed, irrevocably passed; and therefore when Pharaoh Necho a king of Egypt desired to pass through Judea, in order to go and attack Charchemish,^b a city belonging to the king of Babylon, and situate upon the Euphrates, Josiah would by no means consent to it; but getting together his forces, posted himself in the valley of Megiddo,^c on purpose the corruption of the former part of Manasseh's reign. They complied, indeed, with the present reformation; but this was only out of fear of incurring the king's displeasure, or of feeling the severity of his justice. Their hearts were not right towards God, as appears from the writings of the prophets that lived in those times; and therefore, seeing no sign of their repentance, God had no reason to reverse his decree.—Cabnet's and Le Clerc's Commentaries.

a Pharaoh signifies no more, in the Egyptian language, than king; and was therefore given to any one that sat upon that throne: but Necho, according to Herodotus, was his proper name, though some will have it to be an appellative, which signifies lame, because this Pharaoh, as they suppose, had a lameness which proceeded from some wound he had received in the wars. The same historian tells us, that he was the son and successor of Psammetichus king of Egypt, and a man of a bold enterprising spirit; that he made an attempt to join the Nile and the Red Sea, by drawing a canal from one to the other: that though he failed in this design, yet, by sending a fleet from the Red Sea through the straits of Babel-Mandeb, he discovered the coasts of Africa, and, in this his expedition to the Euphrates, resolved to bid fair, by destroying the united force of the Babylonians and Medes, for the whole monarchy of Asia.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 610, and Marshall's Canon. æg. secul. 18. [This Pharaoh Necho, king of Egypt, whom Herodotus calls the son of Psammetichus, and represents as an enterprising hero, with which representation the Bible perfectly accords, is enumerated by Manetho as the sixth (Nechas II.) of the twenty-sixth Saitic dynasty. (Jahn's Heb. Commonwealth.) The account of the war carried on by Pharaoh Necho against the Jews and Babylonians, is confirmed by the recent discoveries of the late enterprising traveller Belzoni among the tombs of the Egyptian sovereigns. In one of the numerous apartments of the tomb of Psammetichus or Psammis, the son of Pharaoh Necho, he found a sculptured group describing the march of a military and triumphal procession, with three different sets of prisoners, who are evidently Jews, Ethiopians, and Persians. The procession begins with four red men with white kirtles, followed by a hawk-headed divinity; these are Egyptians apparently released from captivity, and returning home under the protection of the national deity. Then follow four white men in striped and fringed kirtles, with black beards, and with a simple white fillet round their black hair; these are obviously Jews, and might be taken for the portraits of those who, at this day, walk the streets of London. After them come three white men with smaller beards and curled whiskers, with double-spreading plumes on their heads, tattooed, and wearing robes or mantles spotted like the skins of wild beasts; these are Persians, or Chaldeans. Lastly, come four negroes with large circular ear-rings and white petticoats, supported by a bell over the shoulders: these are Ethiopians.]—Belzoni's Narrative, &c. and Atlas of Plates, Nos. 4, 5, and 6.—Ed.

b Geographers make no mention of this city under this name; but it is very probably the same with what the Greeks and Latins call Cercusium or Ceresium, which was situated on the angle formed by the conjunction of the Chaboras or Chebar, and the Euphrates. Isaiah x. 9, speaks of this place as if Tiglath-Pileser had made a conquest of it, and Necho, perhaps, now was going to retake it, as we find he did; but Jeremiah informs us, (ch. xlv. 1, 2.) that in the fourth year of Jehoiachin king of Judah, it was taken and quite destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon.—Cabnet's Comment., and Wells' Geog. of the Old Test. vol. iii.

c Megiddo was a city in the half tribe of Manasseh, not far from the Mediterranean Sea, which way Necho was to pass with his army, in order to go into Syria, and thence to the Euphrates. In the valley adjoining to this place Josiah was slain, 'while he was at the head of his army,' as Josephus tells us, 'and riding up and down to give orders from one wing to the other.' This action Herodotus makes mention of when he tells us, 'that Nechos king of Egypt having fallen upon the Syrians, near the city Magdol, obtained a great victory, and made himself master of Cadytis,' where the author plainly mistakes the Syrians for the Jews; Magdolum, a city in the Lower Egypt, for Megiddo; and Cadytis, for Kadesh, (in the Upper Galilee, by which he was to pass in his way to Charchemish;) or rather for the city of Jerusalem, which, in Herodotus's time might be called by the neighbouring nations Cadyta or Cadytscha, that is, the holy city; since, even to this day, it is called by the eastern people Al-huds, which is plainly both of the same signification and original.—Cabnet's Dictionary under the word Kadesh, and Prideaux's Connection, anno 610.

e The death of so excellent a prince was deservedly lamented by all his people; but by none more sincerely than by Jeremiah the prophet; who having a thorough sense of the greatness of the loss, as well as full foresight of the sore calamities which were afterwards to follow upon the whole kingdom of Judah, while his heart was full with a view of both these, wrote a song of lamentation f upon this mournful occasion; but that is

d It was the custom of war in former times for great officers to have their led horses, that if one failed they might mount another. The kings of Persia, as Quintus Curtius informs us, had horses attending their chariots, which, in case of any accident, they might make to; and, in like manner, we may presume, that when it became a mighty fashion to fight in chariots, all great captains had an empty one following them, into which they might betake themselves if any mischance befell the other.—Bochart's Hieroz. part I. c. 2 and 9.

e The author of the book of Ecclesiasticus has given us his encomium in these words:—"All, except David, and Hezekias, and Josias, were defective. They forsook the law of the Most High; even the kings of Judah failed. But the remembrance of Josias, is like the composition of the perfume, that is made by the art of the apothecary: it is as sweet as honey in all mouths, and as music at a banquet of wine. He behaved himself uprightly in the conversion of the people, and took away the abomination of iniquity. He directed his heart unto the Lord, and in the time of the ungodly, he established the worship of God."—Eccles. xlix. 1, &c.

f The Jews were wont to make lamentations, or mournful songs, upon the death of great men, princes, and heroes, who had distinguished themselves in arms, or by any civil arts had merited well of their country. By an expression in 2 Chron. xxxv. 25, 'behold they are written in the Lamentations,' one may infer, that they had certain collections of this kind of composition. The author of the book of Samuel has preserved those which David made upon the death of Saul and Jonathan, of Abner and Absalom; but this mournful poem, which the disconsolate prophet made upon the immature death of good Josiah, we nowhere have; which is a loss the more to be deplored because, in all probability, it was a master-piece in its kind: since never was there an author more deeply affected with his subject, or more capable of carrying it through all the tender sentiments of sorrow and compassion.—Cabnet's Commentary, and Preface on the Lamentations of Jeremiah.

lost; and the other, which goes under his name, and is still remaining, was composed upon the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar.

CHAP. II.—Difficulties Obviated, and Objections Answered.

THAT the dung of swallows is of a very hot and caustic quality, and when dropt into the eye, must needs be injurious to the sight, as being apt to cause an inflammation, and thereby a concretion of humours, which in process of time may produce a white film that will obstruct the light from the optic nerves; and that the gall of a fish, especially of the fish called Callionymus, is of excellent use to remove all such specks and obstructions to the sight, we have the testimony of some of the greatest men,¹ physicians and naturalists, to produce in confirmation of this part of Tobit's history. That good angels are appointed by God to be the guardians of particular men, and in execution of this their office, do frequently assume human shapes, to guide them in their journeys, and to deliver them from all dangers, is a doctrine² as ancient as the patriarch Jacob's time, embraced by Christians, and believed by the wisest heathens; and that every man, in like manner, has an evil angel, or genius, whereof some preside over one vice, and some over another; insomuch that there are demons of avarice, demons of pride, and demons of impurity, &c., each endeavouring to ensnare the person he attends with a complexional temptation, is another position that has been almost generally received,³ not only in the Jewish and Christian, but in the Pagan theology likewise; and therefore thus far the history of Tobit can be no novel or romance.

That good angels have a superior power and control over the bad, and by the divine authority can curb and restrain their malice, which is all that we need understand by 'their binding them up,' is evident from a passage in the Revelations very similar to what we read here concerning Raphael and Asmodeus: 'I saw an angel come down from heaven, having the key of the bottomless pit, and a great chain in his hand, and he laid hold on the dragon, the old serpent, which is the devil and Satan, and bound him a thousand years, and cast him into the bottomless pit, and shut him up, and set a seal upon him, that he should deceive the nations no more;' and that this good angel, personating an Israelite, and 'calling himself Azarias, the son of Ananias,' was not guilty of any lie or prevarication, is plain from cases of the like nature. For as the picture is usually called by the person it represents, and he who in tragedy acts the part of Cato, does, for that time, go under his name; so Raphael, being sent by God in the form and appearance of a young man, was in that capacity to act and speak as if he had been such. Nor was there any fallacy in his assuming the name of Azarias, which signifies God's help or assistance, since he was manifestly sent for this very purpose, that he might be a guide and assistance to Tobias in his journey; and therefore very prudently concealed his quality of an angel, that he might more conveniently execute his commission. So that hitherto there is no incongruity in the whole narration, if we can but have a farther account, why⁶ the smoke of the fish's liver and heart should be of an efficacy to put the evil spirit to flight.

Those who are of opinion,⁷ that demons, or evil angels, were invested with certain material forms, wherein they snuffed up the perfumes, and feasted themselves upon the odours of the incense and sacrifices that were offered to them, have an easy way of solving this difficulty, by supposing that the smell of the burned heart and liver of the fish was offensive to Asmodeus, even as they pretend,⁸ that in some herbs, plants, stones, and other natural things, there is a certain virtue to drive away demons, and to hinder them from coming into such a determinate place. The Chaldeans, among whom the book of Tobit was wrote, and the Israelites, for whose use and instruction it was wrote, might both be of this opinion:—That demons, as not absolutely divested of all matter, were capable of the same sensations and impressions that belonged to corporeal substances; and therefore in accommodation to the vulgar idea and prejudice of the people, the author of this history might express himself, as though the expulsion of this evil spirit was effected by a natural cause, the smoke of the fish, even though, at the same time, he sufficiently intimates, that it was by a divine power that it came to pass, because we find the angel thus enjoining Tobias,⁹ 'when thou shalt come to thy wife Sara, rise up both of you, and pray to God, who is merciful, who will pity you, and save you.'

Upon the contrary supposition, namely, that this demon was a being incorporeal, and this is the supposition concerning the angelical nature which generally prevails, we may safely conclude, that the smoke of the fish's entrails could have no direct and physical effect upon him; that his fleeing away therefore was occasioned by a supernatural power, in the exercise of which, the angel appointed to attend Tobias, was the principal instrument; ¹⁰ that he ordered the burning of the fish's entrails as a sign when the evil spirit, by his superior power, should be chased away; or in the same sense that our blessed Saviour spread clay upon the eyes of the man that was born blind, and ordered him to wash in the pool of Siloah, namely, not as the cause, but the proof of his cure; and that he sent him away ¹¹ 'into the uttermost parts of Egypt,' that is, into the deserts of the Upper Egypt, because our Saviour intimates that such is the usual habitation of evil spirits, when he represents them, ¹² 'as walking through dry places, seeking rest, and finding none.'

However this be, we cannot hold ourselves concerned for the vindication of every expression in a book, which our church has not thought fit to receive into her canon of Scripture. It is sufficient for our present purpose, that the historical ground-plot of it be true, whatever may be said as to some particular passage in it; and though its figurative and poetical style, as well as near conformity to the theology then in vogue, may give some umbrage to a reader, that will not be so candid as to think with St Jerome, ¹ 'Many things are spoken in the sacred writings according to the opinion of that time, and not according to what was the real truth of the matter.'²

^a By much the greater part of this disquisition on the book of Tobit might have been well omitted. That book was never admitted into the canon of the Hebrew Scriptures by the Jews; nor is it to be found in the earliest and most authentic canons of the Christian church. That there was such a man as Tobit, carried captive with the rest of the tribe of Naphtali by Salmaneser; that he was eminent for his piety and charity; that his wife, though a good woman, was not always obedient to her husband; that he became blind in the manner which is recorded, and had his sight restored by the means which are said to have been used for that purpose; and that his son married the daughter of Raguel of Ecbatana, after she had been betrothed to seven husbands, there is no reason to doubt; for not one of these events is contrary to the common course of nature. It is indeed very singular that seven young men should have successively perished on their attempting each to consummate his marriage; but such events were not, in themselves, impossible, and perhaps we may even conceive the cause by which they were effected. The whole story of Asmodeus and Raphael is certainly a piece of poetical machinery, invented for a similar purpose with that for which Homer introduces his gods and goddesses as taking opposite sides in the Trojan war, or for which the Persian poets introduce the agency of good and evil genii, in their beautiful moral allegories. It was to adapt the story to the taste of those for whose amusement and instruction it was written, who delighted in the marvellous, and on whose memory and imagination a philosophical account of a singular event would have made no deep or lasting impression. To understand the story of Raphael and Asmodeus literally, as Calmet seems to have done, would be to prefer the authority of this beautiful oriental tale to that of the whole Hebrew Scriptures, in which I heartily agree with Bishop Horsley, that no countenance whatever is given to the popular doctrine of guardian angels. "This interpretation" says the bishop, "introduces a system, which is in truth nothing better than the pagan polytheism, somewhat disguised and qualified; for in the pagan system every nation had its tutelary deity, all subordinate to Jupiter, the sire of gods and men. Some of those prodigies of ignorance and folly, the rabbins of the Jews, who lived since the dispersion of the nation, thought all would be well if for tutelary deities, they substituted tutelary angels. From this substitution, the system of guardian angels, which I have described, arose; and from the Jews the Christians adopted it with other fooleries."² But though the story of Raphael and Asmodeus must be considered as mere machinery, it does not by any means follow that the history itself—the detail of facts, is not entitled to great credit. No man of real learning, Mr Bryant alone excepted, has ever called in question, I believe, the great outlines of the Trojan war as drawn by Homer; though surely no man in this age hath believed that the pestilence was sent among the Grecian troops by Apollo, for Agamemnon's cruelty to his injured priest, or that Diomedes literally wounded the god of war, and sent him bellowing with pain to heaven! That there were such men, however, as Agamemnon and Diomedes; that the former was the commander of the confederate Greeks, and the latter one of their most accomplished heroes; and that, in the tenth year of the war, great numbers of the army were cut off by some pestilential disease, which the medical knowledge of Machaon did not enable him to cure, it would be unreasonable to doubt. And would it not be equally unreasonable to doubt the historical facts related in the book of Tobit, though we do not interpret literally his oriental machinery? or on account of that machinery, to neglect the

Whether the book of the law, which Hilkiah the high priest found in the house of the Lord, in the time of Josiah king of Judah, consisted of the whole Pentateuch, or only of that part of it which is called Deuteronomy; and whether it was the authentic copy which Moses committed to the priest's custody, or only some ancient manuscript kept in the temple for the public use, namely, for the king to read to the people once every seven years, or for the priests to consult upon any emergent difficulty, is a matter of some debate among the learned. The testimony of the author of the book of Chronicles seems however to determine the matter, when he assures us, that the book of the law which Hilkiah found, was that ² 'which was given by the hand of Moses,' and consequently the whole Pentateuch, which, by his command, was repositied ³ 'in the side of the ark of the covenant.'

It is presumed, indeed, that Josiah's three predecessors, Ahaz, Manasseh, and Amon, as not content to be impious themselves, and to instigate their subjects to idolatry, had made it their business to burn and destroy all the copies of the law that they could anywhere meet with, ^b so that there was not so much as one left for the king's use; and that this was the reason of his discovering so great a surprise at his hearing the comminations read, because he had never perhaps seen any such volume before. It must be acknowledged, indeed, that disuse often cancels the most excellent laws; and from Josiah's surprise, we have room to suspect, that he had not as yet transcribed a copy of the law with his own hand, and had probably for some time neglected the moral lessons with which it abounds, and affect to despise the beautiful simplicity of the tale? As a moral tale founded in fact, it ought undoubtedly to be received: as such, it appears to have been alluded to by Polycarp early in the second century; and there is not the smallest reason to believe that its author ever expected it to be received as a work of a higher order.—Bishop Gleig.—Ed.

^b The rabbins say that Ahaz, Manasseh, and Amon endeavoured to destroy all the copies of the law, and this only was sacred by having been buried under a paving-stone. It is scarcely reasonable to suppose that this was the only copy of the law that was found in Judea; for even if we grant that Ahaz, Manasseh, and Amon had endeavoured to destroy all the books of the law, yet they could not have succeeded so as to destroy the whole. Besides, Manasseh endeavoured, after his conversion, to restore every part of the divine worship, and in this he could have done nothing without the Pentateuch; and the succeeding reign of Amon was too short to give him opportunity to undo every thing that his penitent father had reformed. Add to all the considerations, that in the time of Jehoshaphat, teaching from the law was universal in the land, for he set on foot an itinerant ministry, in order to instruct the people fully; for he sent his princes to teach in the cities of Judah; and with them he sent Levites and priests; and they went about through all the cities of Judah, and taught the people, having the book of the Lord with them.' (2 Chron. xvii. 7—9.) And if there be any thing wanting to show the improbability of the thing, it must be this, that the transactions mentioned here took place in the eighteenth year of the reign of Josiah, who had, from the time he came to the throne, employed himself in the restoration of the pure worship of God; and it is not likely that, during these eighteen years, he was without a copy of the Pentateuch. The simple fact seems to be this, that this was the original covenant renewed by Moses with the people in the plains of Moab, and which he ordered to be laid up beside the ark; (Deut. xxxi. 26.) and being now unexpectedly found, its antiquity, the occasion of its being made, the present circumstances of the people, the imperfect state in which the reformation was as yet, after all that had been done, would all concur to produce the effect here mentioned on the mind of the pious Josiah.—Dr A. Clarke.—Ed.

reading it publicly, ¹ every seventh year, according to the command. But that he had never seen such a transcript of it before this time, we can hardly believe, because it is not conceivable how he could so early apply himself to the service of God, even in opposition to the corruptions of the times; how he could begin the reformation of religion, the abolishment of idolatry and superstition, and the establishment of so many wholesome ordinances for the divine worship, without the assistance and direction of this book.

In this very year, we are told, that such a passover was solemnized ² as had not been kept from the days of Samuel the prophet, nor among all the kings of Israel; but how the priests could have observed all the rites and ceremonies belonging to it, (which are not a few) if every prescribed form of it had been lost, we cannot conceive; since copies of the book, which was now found in the temple, could not be made and transcribed time enough for their instruction in these particulars.

In the reigns of Jehoshaphat and Hezekiah, copies of the law ³ were common enough, and in the reigns of their wicked successors, the sacred history makes no mention of their being burned or destroyed. The Jewish doctors indeed tell us, that Manasseh blotted the sacred name of Jehovah out of all the books that he could find; but they nowhere report, that he utterly abolished them: and therefore we may conclude, that the people, at this time, had several copies of the law among them, though some of them perhaps were imperfect and corrupt; and the high priest might rejoice, when he had found the original, because by it all the other copies might be corrected; and rejoice the more, that he had found it at a time when the king was going to make a reformation in religion, which he could not but look upon as a very remarkable providence.

The four Evangelists, who have recorded the substance of the christian religion, we have by us, and may read therein every day; and yet who can say, but that some remarkable passage may perchance escape his observation? ⁴ But now, if, by some lucky accident, we should happen to find the original of St Matthew or St John, who can doubt, but that we should both read and listen to it with more seriousness and attention than we now do to the same books that are every day in our hands? And in like manner we may say, that it was the great reverence which Josiah bore to the original book of Moses, as well as the seasonable and remarkable finding it at this time, that awakened and quickened him to a more attentive consideration of all the passages contained in it, than ever he had known before, either in his reading, or hearing the ordinary copies of the law.

Manasseh was certainly, in the former part of his reign, a very impious prince. The Scripture seems to imply, that, till his miseries had rectified his notions, ⁵ he did not believe at all in the God of Israel, nor in the history of his forefathers; but he is not the only son that has degenerated from the good example of a pious father; neither were his subjects the only people that, even in the grossest irreligion and profaneness, have imitated the example of their prince. The wonder is, how both prince and people became, upon every occasion, so prone to fall from the religion of their ancestors into idolatry, notwithstanding the frequent remonstrances on God's part to the contrary? Now, to this purpose it may be observed, ⁶ that in the whole compass of the law, there is no express revelation made of a future life; that the hints which are given of it, are too obscure for every common reader rightly to interpret; and that this obscurity might be a means of throwing the ancient Israelites into idolatrous practices. For as they had no certain hopes of another life to rely on, they could not see neighbouring nations in a more flourishing condition, without some uneasiness and perturbation of mind; and from hence, by degrees, they might fall into this opinion, — That the gods of these nations must needs be more mighty and powerful than the God of Israel, since their worshippers were manifestly more prosperous; and from hence they were induced to forsake the God of their ancestors, and to worship the gods of the heathen.

It may be observed farther, that the difficulty of keeping the Mosaic law, especially in what related to its rites and ceremonies, was very great, and the profit which resulted from thence no ways comparable to the trouble which it occasioned; and from thence they might be tempted to shake off ⁷ a yoke which neither they nor their forefathers were able to bear, and betake themselves to the observance of other laws, more easy and commodious in themselves, and such as were productive of much more benefit and prosperity to the observers of them. Nor should it be forgotten, that as a great part of the revenues of Palestine, according to the custom of the Mosaic law, fell to the lot of the priests and Levites, the laity, upon every occasion, might grow weary of paying so much; and thereupon be inclined to any innovation in religion that should offer itself, if it could but be supported at an easier expence. And accordingly we may observe, that in the wicked reigns of Ahaz and Manasseh, when the temple was either quite shut up, or converted to idolatrous purposes, the payment of tithes and oblations was suspended, which might be a great gratification to the people, until, in the reigns of Hezekiah and Josiah, they were again restored to the ministers of God. These, and such reasons as these, might make the ancient Hebrews so unsettled in their obedience to the law of Moses, ⁸ until the time that a clearer and

⁸ The manner in which the author here endeavours to account for the proneness of the Israelites to fall into idolatry, and to apostatize from the worship and service of Jehovah, is very unsatisfactory. He even seems to frame excuses for their conduct in this respect, or at least to diminish the magnitude of the guilt with which Scripture itself plainly charges them for their idolatrous practices. If, as the apostle Paul represents, the Gentiles were without excuse because they did not worship the true God in accordance with the natural dictates of their own consciences, and the knowledge of his character and attributes, manifested to them in the works of creation and providence; how much more guilty must the Israelites have been, in worshipping and serving the creature more than the Creator; when to them pertained the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the law, and the service of God, and the promises? In vain shall we endeavour to account for the idolatrous propensities of the chosen people of God, if we leave out of view the natural depravity and corruption of the human heart. This principle, as the word of God declares in language too plain to be misunderstood, is the more perfect revelation of a future life extended their views and hopes above the things of this world, and made them more constant and immovable, as the author to the Hebrews¹ bears them testimony, in the worship of the true God.

main source and spring of idolatry and apostasy from the worship and service of God; and it has, in all ages, tended powerfully to cause men to forsake the Fountain of living waters, and to hew out to themselves broken cisterns that can hold no water. We do not deny that, in the case of the Jews, there were other subordinate causes which operated in drawing them away from their allegiance to their God and King; but we maintain that the primary cause was an evil and bitter heart, and that this is the plain and often repeated declaration of Scripture. The author seems to take for granted, that the Israelites had no certain hope of a future life, and assigns this as one cause why they were so ready to fall into idolatrous practices; but if we examine carefully the Old Testament Scriptures, along with several passages in the New, we shall find, that, even on the subject of a future state, the Israelites had communicated to them a degree of knowledge sufficient to render unavailing the plea which the author urges in their behalf. The patriarchs cherished a hope of the pardoning mercy of God towards penitent sinners, (Gen. iv. 7.) and confided in him, as the judge of all the earth, (xviii. 25.) and the great rewarder of them that diligently seek him; which reward they expected, not merely in the present evil world, but in a future state: for we are told that 'they sought a better country, that is, an heavenly,' (Gen. v. 22, 24, compared with Heb. xi. 5, Gen. xxviii. 13; compared with Mat. xxii. 31, 32, and Gen. xxv. 8; compared with Heb. xi. 10, 14—16.) To this we may add, that a hope was cherished from the beginning, originally founded on a divine promise of a great Saviour, who was to deliver mankind from the miseries and ruin to which they were exposed, and through whom God was to make the fullest discoveries of his grace and mercy towards the human race, and to raise them to a high degree of glory and felicity. (Gen. iii. 15, xii. 3; xvii. 19; xxii. 18; xxvi. 4; xlix. 10.) These were the chief principles of the religion of the patriarchs who were animated by a strong sense of their obligation to the practice of piety, virtue, and universal righteousness. The belief of a future state, which we thus see was held by the patriarchs, (though not expressly taught by Moses, whose writings presuppose it as a generally adopted article of religion,) was transmitted from them to the Israelites, and appears in various parts of the Old Testament. From the circumstance of the promise of temporal blessings being principally, if not entirely, annexed to the laws of Moses, Bishop Warburton attempted to deduce an argument in support of his divine mission. It is impossible here to enter into an examination of this argument: but we may observe, in the first place, "that the omission of a future state as a sanction to the laws of Moses, can be satisfactorily accounted for; and, secondly, that the Old Testament shows that he himself believed a future state, and contains a gradual development of it. These two propositions, the former of which is in unison with the opinion of Warburton, the latter at variance with him, appear to be very satisfactorily established by the luminous reasoning of Dr Graves. Instead of employing the omission of the doctrine as a medium, by which to prove that a divine interposition was necessary for the erection and maintenance of Judaism, he first shows the reality of a divine interposition, and then that the omission in question, so far from being inconsistent with the divine origin of the system, does, in fact, necessarily result from the peculiar nature of the dispensation, and from the character of the people to whom it was given.—The polytheistic principle of tutelary deities maintained that their worship was attended with a national prosperity. The utility of this it was the intention of God to display by open and unequivocal demonstrations of his own omnipotence. The moral government of Jehovah was to be exhibited on the earth by the theocracy which he established. Its very nature required temporal sanctions, and their immediate enforcement; its object could not be attained by waiting till the invisible realities of a future state should be in the kingdom of Israel, where he had neither any regal or judicial authority; but it should be remembered, that his authority in this regard was founded upon an ancient prediction,² where he is particularly named, and appointed to this work of reformation by God himself, and that consequently, he could not be guilty of an infringement upon another's right, even though he had

unveiled. The previous exhibition of such a moral government was the best preparation for the full revelation of man's future destiny, and of the means provided for his welfare in it, by a merciful and redeeming God. 'Life and immortality were thus to be fully brought to light by the gospel.' As yet the bulk of mankind were unprepared for it, and were better fitted to comprehend, and be influenced by sensible manifestations of the divine judgments, than by the remoter doctrine of a future state of retribution. The Old Testament, however, and even the writings of Moses, contained intelligible intimations of immortality. The four last books of the Pentateuch, indeed, were principally occupied in the detail of the legal regulations, and the sanctions necessary to enforce them: yet even from them Jesus Christ deduced an argument to the confusion of the Sadducees. And in the book of Genesis are several occurrences, which must have led the pious Jews to the doctrine of a future existence, even had they possessed no remains of patriarchal tradition. The account of the state of man before the fall, of the penalty first annexed to his transgression, and of the sentence pronounced upon our first parents, considered in connexion with the promise of a deliverance, would necessarily suggest such a doctrine. Could the believing Jews conclude that death would have followed the acceptance of Abel's sacrifice, unless he was translated to some better state of existence and felicity? How also did God show his approbation of Enoch's piety, unless he took him to himself, and to immortality and bliss? Doubtless the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews was not the first who discovered that 'the fathers did not look for transitory promises; that 'they sought a better country, even a heavenly; and that 'God hath prepared for them a city; and that Moses himself rejected the 'enjoyment of the pleasures of sin for a season,' because 'he had respect to the recompence of the reward.' This important and consolatory truth of a future state of being, was, in process of time, displayed to the Jews more and more clearly. The book of Job is very explicit upon the subject. The royal psalmist has spoken of it with great confidence: and Solomon, besides several passages in his proverbs, which seem to allude to it, is supposed to have written the book of Ecclesiastes, which concludes with a clear declaration of it, for the express purpose of proving and enforcing it. The translation of Elijah, and the restoration to life of three several persons by him and his successors, must have given demonstration of the probability of the same doctrine; which also Isaiah, Ezekiel, Hosea, Amos, and especially Daniel, very frequently inculcate, and even presuppose as a matter of notoriety and popular belief." To these considerations we may add the fact, that in the books of Leviticus (xix. 26, 31; xx. 27.) and Deuteronomy (xviii. 10, 11.) there are various enactments against diviners, enchanters, and those who profess to know the future, by consulting either familiar spirits, or the spirits of the departed. All these superstitions suppose the belief of spirits, and the doctrine of the existence of souls after death: and Moses would not have prohibited the consulting of them by express laws, if he had not been apprehensive that the Hebrews, after the example of the neighbouring heathen nations, would have abused the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, which was universally received among them. Severe, however, as these laws were, they did not entirely repress this abuse: for the Psalmist (cvi. 28.) reproaches the Israelites with having eaten 'the sacrifices of the dead,' that is, sacrifices offered to the manes of the dead. We have also, in Saul, a signal instance of this superstition. After he had 'cut off those that had familiar spirits, and the wizards, out of the land,' (1 Sam. xxviii. 3, 9.) having in vain consulted the Lord respecting the issue of his approaching conflict with the Philistines, he went in quest of a woman that had a familiar spirit, and commanded her to evoke the soul of the prophet Samuel. (ver. 7—12.) This circumstance evidently proves that Saul and the Israelites believed in the immortality of the soul.—Horn's Introduction.—Ez.

no farther commission. But the ten tribes, we are to consider, being now gone into captivity, the ancient right which David and his posterity had to the whole kingdom of Israel, before it was dismembered by Jeroboam and his successors, devolved upon Josiah. The people who escaped the captivity were united with his subjects, and put themselves under his protection. They came to the worship of God at Jerusalem, and did doubtless gladly comply with his extirpation of idolatry; at which the Cushites, the new inhabitants of the country, who worshipped their gods in another manner, were not at all offended.

The kings of Assyria, it is true, were the lords and conquerors of the country; but from the time of Manasseh's restoration, they seem to have conferred upon the kings of Judah, who might thereupon become their homagers, a sovereignty in all the land of Canaan, to the same extent, wherein it was held by David and Solomon, before it was divided into two kingdoms. So that Josiah, upon sundry pretensions, had sufficient power and authority to visit the kingdom of Israel, and to purge it from idolatry, as well as his own.

And this, by the bye, suggests the reason why that good king was so very strenuous in opposing the king of Egypt, when he demanded a passage through his country. ¹ He was now, as we said, an homager, and ally to the king of Babylon, and under a strict oath to adhere to him against all his enemies, especially against the Egyptians, and to defend the land of Canaan, which was one barrier of the empire, against their invasions; and, being under such an obligation to his sovereign paramount, he could not permit his enemy to pass through his country, in order to make war upon him, and not oppose him, without incurring a breach of his oath, and a violation of that fidelity, which, in the name of his God, he had sworn to the king of Babylon; and this was a thing which so good and just a man as Josiah was, could not but detest.

It was the sense of his duty, therefore, and not any rashness of temper, or opposition to the divine will, that engaged Josiah in this war with the king of Egypt. The king of Egypt indeed sent to him to acquaint him, that ² God was with him, and that therefore opposing him, would be fighting against God: but Josiah knew very well that he was an heathen prince, who had no knowledge of the Lord Jehovah, nor had ever consulted his oracles or prophets, and had therefore sufficient reason to believe, that by the god who, as he pretended, had sent him upon this expedition, he intended no other than the false Egyptian god, whom he served, but whom the king of Judah had no reason to regard.

The truth is, whenever the word God occurs in this message from Necho to Josiah, it is not expressed in the Hebrew original by the word Jehovah, which is the proper name of the true God, but by the word Elohim, which, being the plural number, is equally applicable to the false gods of the heathens, (and is the word that is used to denote them, whenever they are spoken of,) as well as the true God. But even suppose that Necho, in his embassy to Josiah, had made use of the proper name of the true God: yet was not Josiah therefore bound to believe him, because we find Sennacherib, when he came up against Judah, sending Hezekiah word, ³ that the Lord (Jehovah in the Hebrew) had ordered him to go up against the land, and destroy it; and yet it is certain that Sennacherib, in so pretending, lied to Hezekiah; and why then might not Josiah have as good reason to conclude, that Necho, in the same pretence, might have lied likewise? Necho, however, in his message, by using the word Elohim, gave Josiah to understand that, by the false gods of Egypt, he was sent upon that expedition, and therefore Josiah could not be liable to any blame for not hearkening to the words which came from them.

His death, indeed, was sudden and immature; he fell in battle against the Egyptians; and yet he may be said to have 'gone to his grave in peace,' because he was recalled from life, whilst his kingdom was in a prosperous condition, before the calamities wherewith it was threatened were come upon it, and whilst himself was in peace and reconciliation with God. Thus, when ⁴ 'the righteous are taken away from the evil to come,' though, ⁵ 'in the sight of the unwise they seemed to die, and their departure is taken for misery;' yet, in what manner soever their exit be, they may well be said 'to die in peace,' who, after their dissolution here, ⁶ 'are numbered among the children of God, and their lot is among the saints.'

⁷ 'Truly the light is sweet, and a pleasant thing it is for the eyes to behold the sun,' says the wise preacher. The love of life is natural to us, and in our very frame and constitution is implanted the fear of death; so that it requires no small compass of thought and serious consideration, to receive the sentence of our dissolution with a proper composure of mind. The common excuse of human infirmity might therefore apologize for Hezekiah's conduct, had we nothing more to say in his behalf; but this is far from being all.

The message which God sent him by the prophet Isaiah was, that 'he should die,' that is, that his distemper, according to the natural course of things, was mortal, and above the power of human art to cure. But this denunciation was not absolute and irreversible. It implied a tacit condition, even as did Jonah's prediction of the destruction of Nineveh, which the repentance of its inhabitants prevented, as Hezekiah's humiliation retarded the time of his death. At this time, however, he was no more than nine and thirty years old, nor had he as yet any son; for Manasseh was not born till three years after his illness. The Assyrians too were now making great preparations to invade his kingdom; for his sickness was prior to their invasion, though, in the course of the history, it is placed immediately after it. Putting all these considerations together, then, the king had sundry reasons, besides the natural aversion which all men have to death, to be concerned at its approach, and to desire a prolongation of his life.

Length of days, and a peaceful enjoyment of old age, was a promise which God had made to his faithful servants, and the reward that he usually paid them in hand; ⁸ and therefore Hezekiah was apt to look upon himself as under the displeasure of God, for his being so hastily summoned away, and this premature death of his, as a kind of token of his final retribution. In himself he saw the royal family of David extinct, and all the hopes of having the Messiah born of his race become abortive. He saw the storm that was gathering, and threatening his country with desolation, while there was none of his family to succeed in his throne, and all things were in danger of running into anarchy and confusion; and therefore, having this prospect before his eyes, he might well melt into tears at the apprehensions of his approaching death, which would extinguish all his hopes, and consummate all his fears, in making him go down childless to the grave.^a

What his distemper was, the Scripture has nowhere expressly told us: the original word denotes an inflammation; but what kind of inflammation it was, or what part of the body it affected, we have no intimation given us: and therefore, being thus left to conjecture, some have thought it an imposthume; others, a plague-sore; and others, a quinsey; being all led in their opinions by what naturalists have told us of the virtue of the medicine that was here applied for the cure, namely, that figs, in a decoction, are good to disperse any inflammation about the glands, by gargling the throat; and that, in a cataplasm, they wonderfully soften and ripen any hard tumour. But, whatever the quality of the medicine might be, that there was a divine interposition in the whole affair, is evident, both from the speediness of the cure, and the nature of the sign which God gave Hezekiah, in order to convince him of it.

Some very considerable writers would endeavour to persuade us that, before the Babylonish captivity, the Jews had no instruments whereby to measure time, nor any terms in their language whereby to denote the distinct gradation of it; which, were it true, would effectually destroy all that the Scripture relates, both concerning this sun-dial which Ahaz set up, and the famous miracle which was wrought upon it: but who the first inventors of such horological instruments were, it is not so easy a matter to determine.

glory of their nation, and to lay claim to the invention of every learned science or curious art, pretend that machines of this kind were in use among them many years before they appeared in other nations. To this purpose³ their historians have observed that in Arantha, a town situate on the Nile, there was every day a large vessel filled with water, which, as it sunk gradually by running out at a small passage, distinguished the several hours of the day; and that all 'the clepsydræ, or water hour glasses' among the Greeks and Romans, were afterwards formed upon this model.

The Babylonians were a people well versed in all parts of astronomy, and it was from them, as Herodotus⁴ observes, that the Greeks had the pole and the gnomon, and the twelve parts of the day. For Anaximander, whom Pliny, by mistake, calls Anaximenes, who first taught them to distinguish time, travelled into Chaldea for the improvement of knowledge, and from thence brought away this useful invention. Anaximander, indeed, is said to have flourished about two hundred years after this; but as the Scripture informs us, that there was a good deal of intimacy between Tiglath-Pileser king of Assyria, and Ahaz king of Judah, it is not improbable, that as he was taken with the figure of a strange altar, when he went to visit that prince at Damascus, he might then likewise see some of the sun-dials, (for sun-dials might be common in Chaldea, though not in other countries,) which Tiglath-Pileser was accustomed to carry along with him, for the mensuration of time, wherever he went; and, being highly delighted with so curious and useful an invention, might either have one made on the spot, or take the model of one to be made at Jerusalem, and set up in his royal palace.

It is no easy matter to determine of what form the sun-dial was, but,⁵ if we may be allowed to gather any thing from the signification of the word mahal, which is always used in this narration, we may, with the learned Grotius, suppose that it was not horizontal, as sun-dials are commonly made, but of a concave hemispherical figure,⁶ much like what the Greeks call σκάφη, and that therein was a gnomon of some kind or other, which cast its shadow upon the lines engraven in its concavity.

But of what make soever this dial was, we have reason to believe, that the recess of its shadow was a real miracle, and not the effect of any natural cause, namely, the interposition of a cloud, or any other meteor, which might diverge the rays of the sun to another part of the dial, for some small space of time.

The account which we have of this event, in the second

^a As the nation was at this time threatened with an assault by the whole force of the king of Assyria; they therefore needed a commander, who united wisdom, courage, and faith, to head them in such an emergency; and if he were removed, and they were left to a disputed succession, and the weakness of an usurped or opposed government, there could be little prospect, but that Jerusalem would share the fate of Samaria. With great earnestness and perseverance, Hezekiah had brought his reformation to a hopeful establishment; but he might fear lest the instability of the people, and the dissensions of the nobles, would subvert all, if he were taken away at this crisis. He therefore desired to live, not for his own sake so much as for that of his family and people, especially for the interests of true religion; and he prayed to that effect, with many tears as well as with great fervency. The Lord knew, and Hezekiah could appeal to him, that he had walked before him in sincerity and uprightness of heart; having used all his authority and influence, with zeal and earnestness, to suppress idolatry and wickedness, and by every scriptural means to promote the worship and service of God; and that he had done what was good in his sight, being an example to his people. The consciousness of his integrity gave him confidence; and he begged the Lord to remember the fruits of grace which had been produced, and to spare him, that he might be yet more fruitful and useful.—Scott's Comment.—Ed.

⁶ Other authors are of an opinion quite contrary to this. They suppose that, as there is no mention made of any sun-dials in all the works of Homer, and the Jews very probably knew nothing of the division of the day into so many hours till after the time of the captivity, the invention of such machines was subsequent to Hezekiah's days; and therefore, from the word ἑβδωμάδος in the Septuagint, which may properly enough be rendered steps or stairs, they infer, that this famous chronometer of king Ahaz, was nothing but a flight of stairs leading up to the gate of the palace, and according to the projection of the sun, marked at proper distances with figures, denoting the division of the day, and not any regular piece of dial work.—Universal Hist. b. i. c. 7. But this is too poor a thing to be recorded in history, as the invention or erection of a king, which every person might have done as well as he.

book of Kings, makes no mention indeed of the sun's going back, but only of the shadow upon the dial; but, in the book of Isaiah's prophecy, wherein we have this miracle more minutely related, we are told expressly that ¹ 'the sun returned ten degrees,' and from hence the opinion of the ancients, both Jews and Christians, has been, that the miracle was wrought, not upon the shadow, ^a but upon the body of the sun; or "that the sun," as our excellent archbishop Usher ² expresses it, "and all the heavenly bodies went back, and as much was detracted from the next night as was added to this day."

Those who embrace the new philosophy, which places the sun in the centre, and supposes the earth to move round it, have, from their hypothesis, no difficulty in admitting of this miracle, whether it be said to consist in the different determination of the rays, or in the retrogradation of the body of the sun; because it is the same thing as to all outward effects, whether the earth turn round the sun, or the sun round the earth: but, in both cases, there is this difficulty: ³ that the sudden and violent motion either of the sun or earth, to make that day and night of no greater length than the rest, would be in danger of shocking or unhinging the whole frame of nature, as it certainly would have done, had it not been guided and directed by the steady and unerring hand of the great Creator of the universe, whose motion he can either retard or accelerate as he pleases, without occasioning any confusion in the order of things, and with much greater facility to himself, than any human artificer can cause a machine of his own making to go swifter or slower, by the sole suspension of an heavier or lighter weight.

Since the Scripture, therefore, in this case, tells us as plainly, that the sun did recede, as, in the case of Joshua, that it did stand still in the firmament of heaven, we have no other warrant but to take words in their literal sense, even though it be attended with some difficulties. These difficulties arise chiefly from the opposition of some modern systems of philosophy; but whether it be just and reasonable that revelation should conform to philosophy, or philosophy to revelation, especially when the expressions of Scripture are clear, and sentiments of philosophers but mere conjectures, is a question that need require no long deliberation; especially since heavenly bodies, by reason of their vast distance, are inaccessible to our utmost sagacity, and the greater part of the secrets of nature are not discoverable by our most indefatigable search after truth.

⁴ Though at first view we may be apt to think that a sign, which precedes the event, is more significant, because better adapted to our manner of conceiving it, than one which follows after it; yet, upon a nearer examination, we shall find that a sign which is posterior to the event, is not a less, but in some respects, a more convincing proof than the other; especially when the person to whom it is given lives to see both the sign and the event accomplished. The sign which goes before the event proves but one thing, namely, that the event was from God, or that the person who foretold it was divinely inspired; but the sign which is future to the event, manifests these three things: 1st, that the person who foretold it was possessed with the spirit of prophecy: 2dly, that God was the author of the miraculous event which he foretold: and 3dly, that he was the author likewise of the sign which followed the miracle; especially if the sign be miraculous, as it generally is.

To apply this now to the case before us. To convince Hezekiah of his approaching deliverance, God gave him such things for a sign as would not come to pass until his deliverance was accomplished; but then it should be remembered, that as the people were to be convinced that what happened to Sennacherib was not the work of chance, or the effect of natural causes, but immediately inflicted by the hand of God, his prophet was to foretell not only the particulars of what befell him, but such consequences, likewise, as would appear not only to be supernatural, but demonstrations likewise of the divine power and goodness. To this purpose Isaiah is sent, not only to foretell Hezekiah's deliverance, the destruction of the Assyrian army, and the death of Sennacherib; but, to fortify the people against the apprehensions of another enemy, namely, a grievous famine, after that Sennacherib was gone, he is ordered to add, that God would find one means or other to preserve his people. Though the enemy will destroy all the corn in the country, 'yet ye shall eat this year,' says the prophet, 'such things as ye can meet with;' though the next year be the year of Jubilee, or Sabbatical year, in which ye are to let the land rest, 'yet ye shall eat such things as grow of themselves;' ⁵ God shall take care,

^a Those who maintain the contrary opinion, namely, that the whole miracle was wrought upon the dial, and occasioned only by the reversion of the sun's beams, while the sun proceeded in its ordinary course, urge in its defence,—That in 2 Kings xx. 9, where this miracle is recorded, mention is only made of the 'shadow's going back;' and though, in Isaiah xxxviii. 8, the sun is said to 'return ten degrees;' yet, to put the sun for its beams is a common mode of speech in all languages. That the division of the day into hours, upon which the invention of all horoscopic instruments must depend, was of a later date than this: that Daniel is the first writer in the Old Testament who makes any mention of it: and that there is no Hebrew word, in the compass of the whole language, to denote it. As, therefore, the intent of this miracle was, not to lengthen the day, as that of Joshua's, but purely to put back the shadow upon the sun-dial, this might have well enough been done, say they, by the sole refraction of the sun's rays, and without giving any interruption to the course of nature. This interruption, if the recess and return of the sun, or the earth, if we please, was gradual, must have occasioned great inconveniences to mankind upon earth: since, if the degrees were horary, or lines of an hour's distance upon the dial-plate, as we now speak, to make the sun recede ten hours, and after that re-advance ten more, this would have been to prolong that day for twenty hours, which in hot regions, would be enough to scorch the people of the hemisphere that the sun was over, and in colder climates, when it happened to be absent so long, to freeze the inhabitants to death. On the other hand, this interruption, if the sun or earth went back in an instant, and returned as lastly again, must have been seen and felt all the world over, been observed by the astronomers then living, and recorded in the writings of subsequent historians, as well as the sun's standing still in Joshua's time; but, since we find no footsteps of this, on the contrary, by Merodach Baladan's sending to Hezekiah to inform himself about this phenomenon, it is rather evident that the thing had not been observed as far as Babylon, they thence infer that there was no reason for God's putting himself to the expense of so prodigious a miracle, as to make an alteration in the whole fabric of the universe, when a bare refraction of the sun's rays upon the dial-plate would have answered the end as well.—Le Clerc's Commentary; Lowth's Commentary on Isa. xxxviii., and Universal History, b. i. c. 7.

one way or other, that ye shall want no provisions these two years; and in the third year there shall be no enemy to molest you, and therefore 'sow and reap the fruit of your labours;' for though ye have been brought low with losses innumerable and persecutions, yet, in a short time ye shall be re-established; for 'the remnant that is escaped of Judah shall yet again take root downward, and bear fruit upward.'

The like may be said of the sign concerning the virgin that was to 'bear a son, and call his name Immanuel;' though it was some hundred years subsequent to the deliverance which God promised Judah, yet was it of great service to confirm the people in their expectations of it. To this purpose we may observe, that it is not to Ahaz that the prophet addresses himself, (for he, out of a specious pretence of not being willing to tempt God, rejected all signs,) but to the princes of the blood royal; and therefore he says, 'hear ye now, ye house of David, the Lord himself will give you a sign, a virgin shall conceive.' The original word alma (as several learned men have observed) signifies almost always a virgin untainted by a man,—is so rendered by the Septuagint in this place, and cannot, with any propriety, denote any indifferent young woman, who should afterwards be married, and have a son. For how can we imagine that, after so pompous an introduction, the prophet should mean no more at last by 'a virgin's conceiving,' than that a young woman should be with child? What! does Isaiah offer Ahaz a miracle, 'either in the depth, or in the height above?' and, when he seems to tell the house of David that God, of his own accord, would perform a greater work than they could ask, does he sink to a sign that nature produces every day? Is that to be called a wonder, (which implies an uncommon, surprising, and supernatural event,) which happens constantly by the ordinary laws of generation? How little does such a birth answer the solemn apparatus which the prophet uses to raise their expectation of some great matter? 'Hear ye, O house of Judah,—behold, the Lord will give you a sign worthy of himself; and what is that? Why, a young married woman shall be with child. How ridiculous must such a declaration make the prophet! And how highly must it enrage the audience, to hear a man, at such a juncture as this, begin an idle and impertinent tale, which seems to banter and insult their misery, rather than administer any consolation under it!

It is to be observed farther, that, in the beginning of this passage, when God commanded Isaiah to go and meet Ahaz, he ordered him to take with him his son Shear-jashub, who was then but a child. Why the child was to accompany his father, we can hardly suppose any other reason, but that he was to be of use, some way or other, to enforce the prophecy. It is but supposing then that the prophet, in uttering the words, 'before this child shall be able to distinguish between good and evil,'⁴ pointed at his own son, for there is no necessity to refer them to Immanuel, who might then either stand by him, or be held in his arms, and all the difficulty is solved: but then the comfort which accrued to the house of David from this seasonable prophecy, was very considerable.⁵ For it assured them of the truth and veracity of God's promise, and that he would not suffer them to be destroyed, nor the 'sceptre to depart from Judah,' until the Messiah came. It assured them of his almighty power, in that he could create a new thing in the earth, by making a virgin to conceive, and thereby show himself able to deliver them out of the hands of their most potent enemies; and it assured them likewise of his peculiar favour, in that he had decreed the Messiah should descend from their family, so that the people whom he had vouchsafed so high a dignity, might depend on his promise, and 'under the shadow of his wings,' think themselves secure.

CHAP. III.—On the Dial of Ahaz.

SUPPLEMENTAL BY THE EDITOR.

At the beginning of the world it is certain there was no distinction of time, but by the light and darkness; and the whole day was included in the general terms of the evening and morning. The Chaldeans, many ages after the flood, were the first who divided the day into hours; they being the first who applied themselves with any success to astrology. Sun-dials are of ancient use: but as they were of no service in cloudy weather and in the night, there was another invention of measuring the parts of time by water; but that not proving sufficiently exact, they laid it aside for another by sand. The use of dials was earlier among the Greeks than the Romans. It was above three hundred years after the building of Rome before they knew any thing of them: but yet they had divided the day and night into four and twenty hours; though they did not count the hours numerically, but from midnight to midnight, distinguishing them by particular names, as by the cock-crowing, the dawn, the mid-day, &c.

With respect to the dial of Ahaz, it is said, that the shadow was brought ten degrees backward. Was this miracle occasioned by the sun's going ten degrees back in the heavens, or by the earth's turning upon its axis from east to west, in a contrary direction to its natural course. To me it appears that the miracle was effected by means of refraction. For a ray of light, we know, can be raised or refracted from a right line by passing through a dense medium; and we know also, by means of the refracting power of the atmosphere, the sun, when near rising and setting, seems to be higher above the horizon than he really is; and by horizontal refraction, we find that the sun appears above the horizon when he is actually below it, and literally out of sight: therefore, by using dense clouds or vapours, the rays of light might be refracted from their direct course, ten, or any other number of degrees; so that the miracle might have been wrought by occasioning this extraordinary refraction, rather than by disturbing the course of the earth.

It is owing to refraction that we have any morning or evening twilight: without this power in the atmosphere, the heavens would be as black as ebony in the absence of the sun; and at his rising we should pass in a moment from the deepest darkness into the brightest light; and at his setting, from the most intense light to the most profound darkness, which in a few days would be sufficient to destroy the visual organs of all animals.

That the rays of light can be supernaturally refracted, and the sun appear to be where he actually is not, we have a most remarkable instance in Kepler. Some Hollanders who wintered in Nova Zembla in the year 1596, were surprised to find that, after a continual night of three months, the sun began to rise seventeen days sooner than (according to computation deduced from the altitude of the pole, observed to be seventy-six degrees) he should have done; which can only be accounted for by an extraordinary refraction of the sun's rays passing through the cold dense air in the climate. At that time, the sun, as Kepler computes, was almost five degrees below the horizon when he appeared, and consequently the refraction of his rays was about nine times stronger than it is with us.

Now, this might be all purely natural though it was extraordinary, and it proves the possibility of what I have conjectured, even on natural principles; but the foretelling of this, and leaving the going back or forward to the choice of the king, and the thing occurring in the place and time when and where it was predicted, shows that it was supernatural and miraculous. But why maintain, it may be asked, that the event alluded to was effected by refraction? Could not God as easily have caused the sun, or rather the earth, to turn back, as to have produced this extraordinary and miraculous refraction? This is most certain: but, according to our limited apprehensions, it seems more consistent with the wisdom of God to attain an end by simple means than by those that are complex: and had it been done in the other way, it would have required a miracle to invert and a miracle to restore; and a strong convulsion on the earth's surface to bring it ten degrees suddenly back, and to take it the same suddenly forward. The miracle, according to my supposition, was accomplished on the atmosphere, and without in the least disturbing even that; whereas, on the other supposition, it could not have been done without suspending or interrupting the laws of the solar system. The point to be gained was the bringing back the shadow on the dial ten degrees: this might have been accomplished by the means which I have described, as well as by the other; and these means being much more simple, were more worthy the divine choice than those which are more complex, and could not have been used without producing the necessity of working at least double or treble miracles.

It is objected, however, to this view, that Isaiah expressly asserts that 'the sun returned,' and not merely that 'that the shadow went backward.' It becomes not erring man even to seem to contradict this assertion. I would only venture to say, with all humility, that as the very same end might have been attained by means of refraction as would have been accomplished by the retrograde motion of the sun; and as the event was unquestionably miraculous on either supposition, I do not see that the adoption of the view of this subject which I have suggested is in any way derogatory to the authority of divine revelation.²

CHAP. IV.—Of the Transportation of the Ten Tribes, and their Return.

NOTHING³ in history is more common, than to see whole nations so changed in their manners, their religion, their language, and the very places of their abode, as that it becomes a matter of some difficulty to find out their first original. Large empires swallow up lesser states; and, in the course of their conquests, sweeping every thing before them like a torrent, they compel the vanquished to follow the fate of their conquerors, and to inhabit such countries as were unknown to them before.

Never was there a people that had a more ample experience of these unhappy revolutions than the kingdom of Israel, which, upon the revolt of Rehoboam, came to be called 'the kingdom of the ten tribes.' God, by the mouth of his servant Moses, had denounced this judgment upon them, in case of their obstinate disobedience to his law: 'the Lord shall scatter thee among all people, from the one end of the earth to the other; and among all these nations, thou shalt find no ease, neither shall the sole of thy foot have rest.' And accordingly, when by their idolatry, and other grievous impieties, they had 'provoked God to wrath, and filled up the measure of their iniquity;' in the reign of Pekah king of Israel,⁴ he sent Tiglath-Pileser king of Assyria, who invaded his country, and having overrun great part of it, carried away captive the tribes of Naphtali, Reuben, Gad, and the half tribe of Manasseh, from the east side of the river Jordan; and about twenty years after this, in the reign of Hoshea, sent his son Salmaneser against Samaria, who, after a siege of three years, took it, and carried away all the remainder of that miserable people according to what the prophet Hosea had foretold: 'Ephraim is smitten, their root is dried up, they shall bear no fruit. My God shall cast them away, because they did not hearken unto him, and they shall be wanderers among the nations.'⁵

Such, with very small exception, has been the case of this unhappy people, ever since the time of the Assyrian captivity; and yet, such is their pride and arrogance, that instead of owning the truth, they have devised fables of their living all along in great prosperity and grandeur in some unknown land, as a national and united body, in an independent state, and under monarchies or republics of their own. So, that before we begin to inquire into the real places of their transportation, and some other circumstances thereunto belonging, it may not be amiss to examine a little the merit of these pretensions, and what foundation they have for such mighty boasts.

The author of the second book of Esdras informs us, 'that the ten tribes, being taken prisoners by Salmaneser, and carried beyond the Euphrates, entered into a resolution of quitting the Gentiles, and retiring into a country never inhabited before, that they might there religiously observe the law, which they had too much neglected in their own land; that to this purpose they crossed the Euphrates, where God wrought a miracle for their sakes, by stopping the sources of that great river, and drying up its channel for them to pass over; that having thus wonderfully passed this river, they proceeded in their journey for a year and a half, till they arrived at last at a country called Arsareth, where they settled themselves, and were to continue until the latter days, when God would appoint their return, and work the same miracle in passing the Euphrates that he had done for them before.¹

This is the substance of our author's account: but now, who can believe, that a people so fond of idolatry in their own country, should, in their state of captivity, be so zealous for the observation of the law? Arsareth, we are told, is a city in Media, situate beyond the river Araxes; but if this was the place they betook themselves to for the freer exercise of their religion, what need was there for so very long a peregrination? Or who can suppose that their imperious masters would suffer captives, upon any pretence whatever, to retreat in a body, out of their country, and set up a distinct kingdom in another place? ¹ In short, this counterfeit Esdras, who seems to have been a Christian, and to have lived about the end of the first, or the beginning of the second century, is not only so inconsistent in his account of this, and several other transactions, but so fond of uncertain traditions, and so romantic and fabulous about the divine inspiration which he boasts of, that there is no credit to be given to what he says,^a concerning the retreat of the ten tribes into an unknown land.

A famous Jewish traveller ² of the twelfth century, and who seems to have undertaken his travels solely to discover the state of his dispersed brethren, assigns them a large and spacious country, wherein reigned two brothers, descendants of the house of David. The elder

^a There is an unfounded opinion, though very ancient, that the majority of the ten tribes emigrated to an unknown country. The spurious Ezra asserts, "that Salmaneser carried them beyond the river, and they resolved to separate from the heathen and to seek a spot where they might religiously observe the law, for the violation of which they had been so severely punished." Ezra characterizes the country whither they retired as follows: 1. It was uninhabited. (Then they must have sought an unexplored country.) 2. Its distance was such, that their journey lasted a year and a half. 3. To reach it they crossed the Euphrates, which God miraculously divided for the passage of the Jews; and Ezra adds, that on their return to Judea God will again perform the same miracle. 4. This country is called Arsareth. But we ask, how could a people completely subdued, rise in a body and march unresisted through the territory of their proud masters, to establish a kingdom elsewhere? This event happened, if ever, in the thirty-first year of the captivity; but Ezra informs us that they were then in the countries whither Salmaneser had carried them captive. Their desire to keep the law strictly is said to have been their motive; but the Jews in their dispersions revered the law so little, that they adopted the pagan customs and worship. There is a city called Arsareth beyond the river Araxes, and the Jews are supposed to have given it this name. But the country whither the ten tribes retired, being at a great distance from Media, this cannot be the Arsareth of Ezra. The route they took is as little known as the country to which they emigrated; and hence it is that so many authors severally mention China, Tartary, India, and a second river Sabbatius, as the retreat of the ten tribes; while they all appeal to Ezra as their authority. But the account of Ezra is suspicious; for it does not appear from the book of Tobit, that the journey of the tribes was long, or that there was any separation from the heathen, for the more strict observance of the law. On the contrary, Jews were to be found in Susa, Ecabatana, Rages, and in the other cities of Media and Assyria, and also on the banks of the Tigris and Euphrates.

of these, as he tell us, was Amnas, who, besides his capital Thema, had many other cities, castles, and fortresses, and an extent of ground which could not be travelled over under sixteen days. The other, whose name was Salman, had in his dominions forty cities, two hundred boroughs, and an hundred castles. His subjects, who were all Jews, were three hundred thousand; Tanai, which was his capital, containing an hundred thousand; and Tilimosa, a strong city situate between two mountains, where he usually resided, as many inhabitants.

Here we have a spacious country of nothing but Jews: but the author, who pretends to have been there, has so mistaken the situation of several places that he mentions, and gives us such fabulous accounts of the manner of the Persians fishing for pearls; of the virtue of the prophet Daniel's tomb; and of some Turks, who had two holes in the midst of their face, instead of a nose; that a man must be very fond of romances, who can give credit to what seems to be calculated on purpose to flatter the pride of a people, who are still foolishly vain, though under the rejection of Almighty God.

Another Jewish author ³, in his description of the world, has found out very commodious habitations for the ten tribes, and in many places has given them a glorious establishment. In a country which he calls Perricha, inclosed by unknown mountains, and bounded by Assyria, he has settled some, and made them a flourishing and populous kingdom. Others he places in the desert of Chabor, which, according to him, lies upon the Indian sea, where they live, in the manner of the ancient Rechabites, without houses, sowing, or the use of wine. Nay, he enters the Indies likewise, and peoples the banks of the Ganges, the isles of Bengala, the Philippines, and several other places, with the Jews, to whom he assigns a powerful king, called Daniel, who had three other kings tributary, and dependent on him. But this is all of the same piece, a forged account to aggrandize their nation, and to make it be believed, that ⁴ "the sceptre is not departed from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet," and that Shiloh consequently is not yet come.

Manasseh, one of the most famous Rabbins of the last age, has asserted the transmigration of the ten tribes into Tartary, where he assigns them a great province, called Thabor, which in the Hebrew tongue signifies a navel, because this Thabor, as he says, is one of the middle provinces of Tartary. Ortelius, in his Geography, is not only of the same opinion, but in confirmation of it adds that the ten tribes succeeded the Scythians, its ancient inhabitants, and took upon them the name of Gauthei, because they were 'zealous for the glory of God; that Totaces, the true name of the Tartars, is Hebrew, and signifies remains, as the tribes dispersed in the north were the remains of ancient Israel; that among these people there are several plain footsteps of the Jewish religion, besides circumcision; and from them, in all probability, have descended the Jews, that in Poland and Muscovy are found so numerous.

⁵ It cannot be denied, indeed, but that several of the Israelites might pass into Tartary, because Armenia is the only country that parts it from Assyria, wheremto they were primarily carried: but there is no reason for their penetrating Scythia, and thence dispersing themselves in the kingdoms of Poland and Muscovy; because the tranquillity and privileges which the princes of these countries have granted the Jews, are the true cause and motive of their resorting thither in such numbers. In confutation therefore of what has been said above,¹ the Jewish historian has well observed, that the ancient Scythians were a people too fierce by nature, and too expert in war, for a handful of fugitives, such as the Israelites were, ever to conquer or expel; that the people of this country were all along idolaters, until they were converted to the religion of Mahomet, from whence they received the rite of circumcision, and some other ceremonies conformable to the law of Moses; that the etymology of names is, of all others, the weakest and most precarious argument; and that it is ridiculous to seek for the glory of God among the Tartars before the introduction of Mahometanism, since, according to the account of their² historian, “some of them lived like beasts, without any sense of God; others worshipped the sun, moon, and stars; and others again made gods of the oxen that ploughed their land, or prostrated themselves before every great tree.”

Manasseh, the famous Rabbim we lately mentioned, published a book,³ entitled, ‘The Hopes of Israel,’ founded upon the number and power of the Jews in America; but in this he was imposed upon by the fabulous relation of Montesini, who reported, “that he found a great number of Jews concealed behind the mountains of Cordilleras, which run along Chili in America; that continuing his journey in that country, he came at length to the banks of a river, where, upon his giving a signal, there appeared a people, who pronounced in Hebrew these words out of Deuteronomy, ‘Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord,’ that they looked upon Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob as their great progenitors, and had been conducted into that country by incredible miracles; that the Ludians had treated them with great cruelty, and thrice declared war against them; but that, by God’s protecting his people against idolaters, they had been as often defeated, and were now totally destroyed; and that some of their Magi, who made use of enchantments, had openly declared that the God of Israel was the only true God, and that, at the consummation of ages, their nation should become the mistress of the whole universe.”

Deluded with this account, Manasseh endeavoured to find out the road which might possibly lead the Israelites into the West Indies; and, to this purpose, supposing that Asia and America were formerly one continent before they were divided by the straits of Anian, he asserted that the Israelites might travel to America, by land, before the separation happened.

Sir William Penn, in his ‘Present State of the Lands of the English in America,’ tells us, “that the faces of the inhabitants, especially of their children, are so very like the Jews, that when you look upon them, you would think yourself in the Jews’ quarter in London; that their eyes are little and black, like the Jews, that they reckon by moons; offer their first fruits; have a kind of feast of tabernacles; and that their language is masculine, short, concise, and full of energy, in which it much resembles the Hebrew.”

Other historians⁴ have observed that some of the Americans have a notion of the deluge, though they relate it in a different manner; that they celebrate a jubilee every fifth year, and a sabbath every seventh day; that others observe circumcision, abstain from swine’s flesh, and purify themselves by bathing, whenever they have touched a dead carcase; that marriages, among others, are performed⁵ in a manner not unlike what Moses prescribes; and that they generally believe a resurrection;⁶ for which reason they cause their wives and slaves to be buried with them, that, when they arise from their graves, they may appear with an attendance suitable to their quality.

⁷ This conformity of customs, and looks, and sentiments, have induced several to think, that the captive Israelites we are here in quest of, went into America, either by way of China or Tartary, and there settled themselves. But, how specious soever these arguments may appear, there is no manner of solidity in them. To prove a point of this kind, we should produce a whole nation or province in America, distinct from all others in their ceremonies and way of worshipping God, in a manner exactly agreeing with the Hebrews: but to say, that because in one place the people abstain from swine’s flesh, and in another they observe the seventh day; in one, they offer sacrifices, and in another use baths, when they think themselves polluted, the Americans were originally Israelites, is carrying the consequence a great deal too far, and what indeed we may prove in any other nation under heaven, if we may be allowed to argue in this manner from particulars to generals.

The truth is, the devil, in all his idolatrous countries, has made it his business to mimic God in the rites of his religious worship; or, if this were not, there is naturally so great a conformity in men’s sentiments concerning these matters, that the Americans might agree with the Jews in the oblation of their first-fruits, their computations by moons, &c., without having any commerce or affinity with them; and though there be something more characteristic in circumcision, yet as several other nations used it, the Americans, upon this account, cannot be Jews,^a because, if we may believe Acosta, who had ^a We are not to believe that these savages are Jews, merely because their religious rites resemble in some respects those of Judaism. The religious worship of other idolaters has much in common with Judaism; and can we infer that they too are the posterity of Jews? There are those who attribute this similarity in forms of worship to the machinations of the devil, who seeks to rival the glory of God by receiving the same kind of adoration. But without allowing to the arch fiend more power than he really possesses, this resemblance may be explained from the similar dispositions of men. Idolatry does not necessarily derive its ceremonies from the true church. Nations which have never had any intercourse with each other, have the same ideas of a God, and frequently worship him in the same manner. The aborigines of America have been taught neither by the Manicheans nor Egyptians, the belief in two first principles. Yet the inhabitants of Peru relate that man was created by a powerful being named Con; but the sun and moon begat an evil being called Pachachauna, who was more powerful than Con. He transformed men into apes, parrots, and bears, and was the

made their customs a good part of his study, they never did circumcise their children, and therefore are thus far excluded from being descendants of that race.

Thus we have endeavoured to find out the situation of the ten tribes of Israel, and yet can meet with nothing, but either the fabulous accounts of the Talmudists, or the uncertain conjectures of modern critics; let us now have recourse to the Scriptures, and know what the information is that they can supply us with, in this our inquiry.

The sacred history thus expresses it—¹ ‘the king of Assyria took Samaria, and carried Israel away into Assyria, and placed them in Halah and in Habor, by the river Gozan, and in the cities of the Medes;’ only we must note, that there is some ambiguity in the translation: for, whereas it looks as if Gozan were the river and not Habor, there is plainly no river to be found of the name of Gozan, and therefore the emendation should be—² he placed them in Halah, and by the river Habor in Gozan, and in the cities of the Medes.³

The holy penman, we may observe, distinguishes two places into which the Israelites were carried, as indeed they were numerous enough to make two different colonies, Assyria and Media. In Assyria we see the river Habor, or Chaboras, ^a which rises from mount Masius, and, running through Mesopotamia, falls into the Euphrates. Halah, which in Ptolemy is called Chalchitis, is a city and province situate on one side of its banks, and Gozan, which is likewise a city and province, is found on the other; so that the ten tribes were seated in two provinces, which stretched along both sides of this river. A happy situation for them, since they were only separated by a river which watered all the cities that were assigned for their habitation!

² As to the cities of the Medes we are more in the dark, because the Scripture does not specify any; but we may presume that this colony was placed in the mountainous part of Media, because it was less peopled than the lower country. It wanted indeed inhabitants, and if we will believe ³ Strabo, was supplied by strangers and colonies from abroad.

¹ 2 Kings xvii. 6. ² Basnage’s History of the Jews, b. iv. c. 4. creator of the Indians. They worship both these beings but especially the evil being, because they fear that he may again change men into brutes. They may, in the same manner, have instituted rites resembling those of Judaism, without borrowing them from the Jews. They form their altars of twelve stones, they offer to God the first-fruits, and divide the year by moons; but these are customs which might have arisen from peculiar circumstances in any country. It is by no means certain that the Indians practised circumcision. Peter Martyr asserts that they ‘sacrificed their infants to idols, and circumcised themselves;’ but Gomara says that the rite was not universal among them. Acosta, who was well acquainted with the customs of the Americans, observes, ‘‘ that they never circumcised their children, and therefore could not be the posterity of the ten tribes.’’ If they were uniformly circumcised, it would not prove their descent from the Jews, because there are other nations besides the Jews who practise this rite. We cannot then infer the origin of the Indians from an apparent resemblance in their forms of worship to those of Judaism.—Jahn’s Heb. Com. pp. 316, 317.

^a Ezekiel addresses his prophecies from the river Chebar, or Habor. Our translation takes Habor for a city situated ‘by the river of Gozan,’ and major Rennell says there is found in the country anciently named Media, in the remote northern quarter towards the Caspian sea, and Ghilan, a considerable river named Ozan, or Hozal-Ozan. There is also found a city named Abhar or Habor, situated on a branch of the Ozan; and it has the reputation of being exceedingly ancient. Here Mr Morner found ruins composed of large mud bricks, made with straw, and baked in the sun, like some of those found at Babylon. This is probably the place mentioned in Scripture.—Ed.

The truth is, the ancients have extolled Media as a very happy country. Ecbatana, where the king kept his residence in summer, was one of the finest and largest cities in the world. Susa, where he spent the winter, was a very considerable place likewise: but, on the north side, there were high mountains, where nevertheless there was good pasturage, so that what the country wanted was good husbandmen, and such as were used to tillage; for which purpose the Israelites, who had made that their principal business in the Holy Land, were, of all other people, the fittest inhabitants.

In these two provinces were the ten tribes seated at first; and it is not improbable that, in a short time, those of Assyria might extend themselves into several other parts of the empire; for, in Alexander’s time, we meet with ^b a great body of them in Babylon; and that those of Media might stretch upon the right, into the provinces bordering upon the Caspian sea, or, as ^c some imagine, even beyond that sea, as far as the river Araxes; but that they ever became so powerful as ^c to change the ancient names of places into those of their own language, we can hardly believe; because they fell under so many bitter persecutions, were subject to so many revolutions of the kingdoms where they lived, and, from different princes, underwent such a variety of transmigrations, that, before they could gain any such weight and authority in the world, we find them here and there scattered, in lesser bodies, as it were, over the whole face of it.

Not only some of the Greek fathers, but some of our modern critics likewise, have maintained, that the ten tribes were restored, with those of Judah and Benjamin, under the conduct of Zerobabel and Nehemiah, when Cyrus and his successors were so kind as to give the Jews in general a full permission to return into their native land.⁵ To this purpose they have observed, that several of the prophets who foretold their captivity, with the same breath, as it were, have predicted their return; that, in token of such their return, ⁶ ‘twelve goats,’ for every tribe one, ‘were offered at the dedication of the new temple,’ which would scarce have been done, had

^b Besides those that were carried thither at the captivity, Artaxerxes sent a new colony of that nation thither, who, when Alexander the Great was for rebuilding the temple of Belus, had the courage to resist him. For, whereas other people were eager to furnish materials for the building, they refused to do it, as thinking it had some stain of idolatry.—Basnage’s Hist. of the Jews.

^c We read of the Cadusians, the Geles, and of Arsareth beyond the Caspian sea; for which reason the learned Fuller supposes, that the Jews spread themselves thus: ‘‘ For the name of Geles,⁷ says he, ‘‘ is Chaldaic, and signifies strangers or fugitives, which title suited with the Jews, whom God had expelled from their country for their sins. The Cadusians have a little altered the word Chadoschim, which signifies saints, which was a title the Jews, who called themselves a holy nation, much affected; and, lastly, Arsareth, the most famous of all the cities built upon the Araxes, had a Hebrew name, signifying the city of relics, or the remains of Israel.’’ But the author of the History of the Jews, so often cited upon this subject, has confuted the argument drawn from the etymology of the words; and, in particular, shown that the Cadusians were a people much ancients in the country than the Israelites, since Nimus reckoned them among his subjects.—B. vi. c. 4.

ten of these tribes been left behind beyond the Euphrates; that under Nehemiah the Levites confessed the sins of the ten tribes; that in the time of the Maccabees ¹ all Palestine was full of Israelites as well as Jews; that ² St Matthew makes mention of the land of Naphtali; and that St Paul, in his defence before Agrippa, declares, ³ 'that for the promise, to which the twelve tribes hope to come, he was called in question.'

It cannot be thought, indeed, but that the love which the Jews, above all other nations, bore to their native country, and the great encouragement which the princes of the east were pleased to grant to forward the re-establishment, might tempt some of each tribe to take this opportunity of returning with the two tribes of Judah and Benjamin; nor can we doubt, but that, upon their return, they would be apt to assume their former names, and, as far as in them lay, to settle themselves in their ancient possessions. So that, what with those that escaped their conqueror's fury, and remained untransported; those who returned with Ezra, pursuant to the commission which Artaxerxes gave him; and those who took the advantage of the revolutions of the empire, and of the frequent journeys they made to Jerusalem,—great numbers of the ancient inhabitants might be found in the days of the Maccabees, and some of every tribe in our Saviour's time: but that all these returns did never amount to a full restoration of the people, we have abundant testimony to convince us.

Josephus ⁴ indeed tells us, that Ezra, upon the receipt of his commission from Artaxerxes, communicated the contents of it to all the Israelites that were in exile, some of whom resorted to Babylon in order to return with him; "but there were then another sort of Israelites," as his words are, "who being wanted to the place, and settled in their habitations, chose rather to continue where they were." Upon the whole, he computes, that few or none, but those of the tribe of Benjamin and Judah, came along with Ezra; and "this is the reason," as he tells us, "that in his time there were only two tribes to be found in Asia and Europe under the Roman empire; for, as for the ten tribes, they are all planted beyond the Euphrates," says he, "and so prodigiously increased in number, that they are hardly to be computed." Nay, even those that followed Ezra, according ⁵ to the sentiment of some of the Talmudists, were but the dregs of the people, because the nobility and principal men of the house of David still continued in Chaldaea.

However this be, it is certain that Philo, ⁶ in his representation to Caligula, tells him, that Jerusalem ought to be looked upon, not only as the metropolis of Judea, but as the centre of a nation dispersed in infinite places; among which he reckons the isles of Cyprus and Candia, Egypt, Macedonia, and Bithynia; the empire of the Persians, and all the cities of the east, except Babylon, from whence they were then expelled. Nay, prior to this we read, ⁷ that a great number of these orientals appeared at Jerusalem, at the feast of Pentecost, when, after our Saviour's ascension, his apostles began to preach the gospel during that festival. It cannot be thought that they were only proselytes, whom the Jews of the dispersion had converted; they must have been Jews who came to sacrifice at Jerusalem, according to the law; for by St Luke's enumeration of them, it appears that they were the descendants of the tribes that had been long before settled among the ⁸ Medes, among the Parthians, in Mesopotamia, in Cappadocia, in Pontus, and Asia Minor, &c., and therefore we find St Peter, the apostle of the circumcision, directing his epistle ⁹ to the strangers scattered throughout Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia.⁷

Upon the strength of these authorities we may then conclude that, though Artaxerxes, in his commission to Ezra, ¹⁰ gave free liberty to all Jews whatever that were under his dominions to return to Jerusalem, if they were so minded, which some, without doubt, most gladly embraced; yet the main bulk of the ten tribes, being loth to remove, continued in the land of their captivity, where they are still to be found in great numbers: and therefore all those glorious prophecies, which some by mistake have applied to their thin returns under the Jewish governors sent from Babylon, do certainly relate to a much greater event, even their conversion and final restoration under the kingdom of the Messias.

The prophet Hosea, speaking of the present state of the Jews, gives us this character whereby to distinguish them: ¹¹ 'They shall abide many days without a king, and without a prince, and without a sacrifice, and without an image, and without an ephod, and without teraphim.' In vain do they boast of that power and authority which they never had, but in their own country. The kings and the princes that they talk so much of, are all fictitious and imaginary. From the first time of their transmigration to this very day, they have been a people without any governor, or form of government; and if, in the midst of so many different nations, and under so severe persecutions, they nevertheless have hitherto been preserved, it must be imputed to the secret and wonderful providence of God, who hath still designs of pity and gracious loving-kindness towards them. To this purpose the same prophet assures us, that ¹² 'the number of the children of Israel shall be as the sand of the sea, which cannot be measured or numbered; and in the place where it was said unto them, ye are not my people, there it shall be said unto them, ye are the sons of the living God: for he shall recover the remnant of his people,' says another prophet, ¹³ 'that shall be left:—He shall set up an ensign for the nations, and assemble the outcasts of Israel, and gather together the dispersed of Judah from the four corners of the earth;' for ¹⁴ 'behold the days come, saith the Lord,' by another of his prophets, 'that it shall no more be said, the Lord liveth that brought the children of Israel out of the land of Egypt, but the Lord liveth that brought up the children of Israel from the land of the north, and from all the lands, whither he hath driven them. And I will bring them again into the land that I gave unto their fathers;' and, when this is done, ¹⁵ 'I will no more hide my face from them,' but ¹⁶ 'will rejoice in Jerusalem, and joy in my people.' ¹⁷ 'They shall be no more a prey to the heathen:' ¹⁸ 'violence shall be no more heard in their land, wasting, nor destruction within their borders; but they shall call their walls salvation, and their gates praise.' ¹ 'Their land shall no more be termed desolate,' ² 'but they shall dwell in the land that I have given to Jacob my servant, even they and their children's children for ever; and my servant David,' (not the son of Jesse, who was dead long before Ezekiel prophesied, but the Messiah, who was to be of the lineage of David, as Kimchi explains it,) 'shall be their prince for ever.' 'Moreover, I will make a covenant of peace, which shall be an everlasting covenant with them; and I will set my sanctuary among them for evermore. My tabernacle shall be with them; yea, I will be their God, and they shall be my people.'

³ Now, though it cannot be denied that these, and several other prophecies to the like purpose, do denote a great and glorious restoration to God's people; yet it seems very evident that scarce any of them can be applied to the return of the Jews from their captivity in Babylon. Long since that time, and almost seventeen hundred years ago, his covenant of peace has been departed from them; 'violence has been in their land,' which has been laid desolate; their tabernacle and sanctuary have been consumed; they have been a prey to the heathen; and have long ceased to be God's people, and he to be their God: and therefore these prophecies must be understood of some other event, which can only be the general conversion of the Jews to Christianity, and their re-establishment in the Holy Land. For this mystery the apostle has revealed, ⁴ 'that blindness in part hath happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in, and so all Israel shall be saved, as it is written, ⁵ there shall come out of Zion the Deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob. ⁶ Then shall the Lord set his hand again, a second time, to recover the remnant of his people, and to assemble the outcasts of Israel, from every kindred, and tongue, and nation, and people, that, at ⁷ the blowing of the great trumpet, they may come from the land of Assyria and Egypt, and may worship the Lord in the holy mount at Jerusalem.' When this great event shall happen, it is impossible for us to determine; but our business, in the mean time, is to pray, that ⁸ 'the salvation of Israel may come out of Zion, that Jacob may rejoice, and Israel may be glad.'^a

^a Numerous prophecies in the Old Testament declare, as clearly as language can, that the Jews shall return to Judea, and be at last permanently re-established in the land of their fathers. The uniform experience of the literal truth of every prediction respecting their past history may suffice to give assurance of the certainty of their predicted restoration. And amidst many signs that 'the times of the Gentiles' are drawing towards their fulfilment, many concurring circumstances seem also to be preparing the way of the children of Israel. Scattered as they have been for so many ages through the world, and maintaining still their distinctive character, their whole history forbids the thought that they will ever mingle among the nations, or cease to be, what they have ever been, a peculiar people. But while their history, as a nation, gave, for the space of many generations, unequivocal attestations of an overruling providence, sustaining the theocracy of the commonwealth of Israel; and while during a period of still greater duration, they have been 'a people scattered and peeled;' yet after the lapse of so many ages, they are still reserved for illustrating the truth, the mercy, SECT. V.

CHAP. I.—From the Death of Josiah, to the Babylonish Captivity.

THE HISTORY.

AFTER the unhappy death of good Josiah, his son Jehoahaz, ^b who was also called Shallum, was anointed king; but as he was far from following his father's exand the glory of the God of Israel; 'at eventide it shall be light.' They now begin, centuries of persecution and spoliation having passed away, to participate, in cases too numerous to be specified, of benefits arising from the altered spirit of the times. And possessed, as in an unexampled degree they are, of silver and gold, and of large portions of the public funds of various kingdoms, they may be said, even now in some manner, to 'inherit the riches of the Gentiles.' And commanding, as in a great measure they do, the rate of exchange throughout Europe, they are entitled from the present influence of money on the security of governments, and on the art and results of war, to high political consideration; and the time may not thus be remote, when they shall be 'raised up as an ensign among the nations.' Not naturalized to the isles of the Gentiles, either by law or affection, or bound to any soil by the possession of fixed property, which would be of no easy transference, but ever looking with undiminished love to the land of their fathers, even after an expatriation uninterrupted for nearly eighteen centuries, they are ready, whenever the time shall be fulfilled, to fly thither 'like a cloud, and like doves to their windows.' But to what degree, and in what manner, the present convulsions of the Turkish empire, combined with the peculiar, and in many instances, novel condition of the Jews, throughout Europe and America, shall be the means of facilitating their eventual restoration to their own land, (which is ravaged by Arabs, and yields but a scanty revenue to the Turks) no mortal can determine. It is enough for Christians to know, that two thousand of years, through nearly which period it has been dormant, can neither render extinct the title, nor prescribe the heaven-chartered right of the seed of Abraham to the final and everlasting possession of the land of Canaan: that God 'will remember the land, and gather together' unto it his ancient people, and that his word concerning Zion, which he hath neither forgotten nor forsaken, is, 'I have graven thee upon the palms of my hands, thy walls are continually before me. Thy children shall make haste; thy destroyers, and they that made thee waste, shall go forth of thee, &c.' (Is. lxi. 16, 17, &c.) And that through all the changes which have happened in the kingdoms of the earth from the days of Moses to the present time, which is more than three thousand two hundred years, nothing should have happened to prevent the possibility of the accomplishment of these prophecies, but, on the contrary, that the state of the Jewish and Christian nations at this day should be such as renders them easily capable, not only of a figurative, but even of a literal completion in every particular, if the will of God be so, this is a miracle which hath nothing parallel to it in the phenomena of nature.—Keith's Evidence of Prophecies.—Ed.

^b Jehoahaz was not the eldest son of Josiah, as appears from this,—That he was but three and twenty years old when he began to reign, and reigned but three months; after which his brother Jehoakim, when he was made king, was five and twenty years old, (2 Kings xxiii. 31, 32.) For this reason, it is said, that the people anointed him, because, as he did not come to the crown by right of succession, his title might have otherwise been disputed; for in all disputed cases, and where the kingdom came to be contested, anointing was ever thought to give a preference. At this time, however, the Jews might have some reason to prefer the younger brother, because very probably he was of a more martial spirit, and better qualified to defend their liberties against the king of Egypt. His proper name, it is thought, was Shallum; but our learned Usher supposes, that the people looking upon this as ominous, because Shallum, king of Israel, reigned but one month, changed it to Jehoahaz, which proved not much more fortunate to him, for he reigned but three.—Patrick's and Calnel's Commentaries.

ample, he was soon ^a tumbled down from his throne into a prison, where he ended his days, with misery and disgrace, in a strange land. For Pharaoh-Necho, upon his return from the expedition against the Babylonians, wherein he had great success, hearing that Jehoahaz had taken upon him the kingdom of Judah without his consent, sent for him to Riblah in Syria, and on his arrival, caused him to be put in chains, and sent prisoner to Egypt, ^b where he died. He had an elder brother, whose name was Eliakim; but Necho, when he came to Jerusalem, changed it into Jehoiakim; ^c and having constituted him king, and put the land to an annual tribute of an hundred talents of silver, and a talent of gold, he returned with great triumph into his own kingdom.

Jehoiakim ^d being thus placed on the throne, went on in his brother's steps to relax all the good order and

^a The Scripture nowhere tells us, upon what occasion it was that Jehoahaz fell into the king of Egypt's hands, or for what reason it was that he used him so severely; but it is presumable, that to revenge his father's death, he might raise an army, and engage him in a pitched battle, though he failed in the attempt. For why should he put him in bands, if he voluntarily went, and surrendered himself at Riblah? or why be so highly offended at him for accepting of a crown which the people conferred on him? The general opinion therefore is, that he was a man of a bold and daring spirit, and therefore those words in the prophet Ezekiel are applied to him: 'thy mother is a lioness; she brought up one of her whelps; it became a young lion; but he was taken in the pit, and he was brought with chains unto the land of Egypt;' for which reason Pharaoh-Necho treated him in this manner, that he might put it out of his power to give him any farther disturbance.—Patrick's and Calmet's Commentaries.

^b This the prophet Jeremiah foretold, where he bids the king, and the people of Judah, 'not to weep for the dead,' meaning Josiah, 'but for him that goeth away, for he shall return no more, nor see his native country.' Because, 'thus saith the Lord concerning Shallum,' which was the original and right name of Jehoahaz, 'the son of Josiah king of Judah, who reigned instead of Josiah, his father, and who went forth out of this place, he shall not return thither any more.' (Jer. xxii. 11.)

^c It was a usual thing for conquerors to change the names of the persons they vanquished in war, in testimony of their absolute power over them. Thus we find the king of Babylon changing the name of Mattaniah into Zedekiah, when he constituted him king of Judah, (2 Kings xxiv. 17.) But our learned Usher has farther remarked, that the king of Egypt gave Eliakim the name of Jehoiakim, thereby to testify that he ascribed his victory over the Babylonians to Jehovah, the God of Israel, by whose excitation, as he pretended, (2 Chron. xxxv. 21, 22), he undertook the expedition.—Patrick's and Calmet's Commentaries.

^d As to the time when Jehoiakim came to the throne, the difference is very remarkable: for in 2 Chron. xxxvi. 9, it is said, that he was but 'eight years old,' but in 2 Kings xxiv. 8, that he was 'eighteen when he began to reign,' and yet, considering how common a thing it was for kings to make their sons their associates in the kingdom, thereby to secure the possession of it in their family, and prevent all contention among the other brothers, the difference is easily reconciled, by supposing, that when his father had reigned one year, he took him to reign in conjunction with him, when he was no more than eight years old. With his father he reigned ten years; so that, when his father died, he was eighteen years old, and then he began to reign alone, which was no more than three months. The author of the book of Kings makes mention therefore only of the years when he began to reign alone; but the author of the Chronicles speaks of all the time that he reigned, both with his father, and alone. This is a fair solution; though I cannot see what injury it can do to the authority of the sacred text, if we should acknowledge, that there is an error in the transcriber of the book of Chronicles; because two of the most ancient and venerable versions, the Syriac and Arabic, have rendered it in that place, not eight but eighteen, which they were doubtless induced to do by those ancient Hebrew copies from whence they formed their translation.—Patrick's Commentary, and Pool's Annotations.

discipline which his father had instituted, and the people, who never heartily came into that good king's reformation, took this opportunity to follow the bent of their depraved inclinations; whereupon the prophet Jeremiah went first to the king's palace, where he denounced God's judgments against him and his family, and afterwards into the temple, and there spoke to all the people after the same manner. The priests, offended at this freedom, caused him to be seized, and brought before the king's council, in hopes of having him put to death; but Ahikam, ^e who was one of the chief lords thereof, so befriended him, that he got him discharged by the general suffrage, not only of the princes, but also of all the elders of the people that were then present.

But ^f Urijah, ^g another prophet of the Lord, who, in like manner, had declared against the iniquity of the prince and people, did not so easily escape: for though he fled into Egypt, when he understood that Jehoiakim had a design against his life; yet this did not hinder the tyrant from pursuing him thither, where having procured him to be seized, he brought him prisoner to Jerusalem, and there had him executed, and his dead body contemptuously used; which was no small aggravation to all his other crimes.

He had not been above three years upon the throne, before Nabopollassar, king of Babylon, being now become old and infirm, and perceiving that, upon the late advantage which the king of Egypt had gained against his arms, all Syria and Palestine had revolted from him, took his son Nebuchadnezzar into partnership with him in the empire, and sent him with a strong army into those parts, in order to recover what had been lost.

It was in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, when Nebuchadnezzar, having defeated Necho's army on the banks

^e This Ahikam was the father of Gedaliah, (2 Kings xxv. 22.) who was afterwards made governor of the land, under the Chaldeans, and the son of Shaphan the scribe, (who was chief minister of state under king Josiah, 2 Kings xxii. 12.) and brother to Gemariah, (Jer. xxxvi. 10, Elash, xxix. 3, and Jaazaniah, Ezek. viii. 11.) who were great men in those days, and members likewise of the council with him; where, in conjunction with them, he could not fail of having a powerful interest, which he made use of on this occasion, to deliver the prophet from that mischief which was intended against him.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 609.

^f About this time also were living the prophets Habakkuk, Zephaniah, and Nahum, who being called to the prophetic office in the reign of Josiah, continued, very likely, to this time, because we find them prophesying the same things that Jeremiah did, namely, the destruction and desolation of Judah and Jerusalem, for the many heinous sins that they were guilty of. As to Habakkuk, neither the time in which he lived, nor the parents from whom he was descended, are any where named in Scripture; but his prophesying the coming of the Chaldeans, in the same manner that Jeremiah did, gives us reason to believe that he lived in the same time. Of Zephaniah, it is directly said, (chap. i.) that he prophesied in the time of Josiah, and in his pedigree, which is also given us, his father's grandfather is called Hezekiah, whom some take for the king of Judah, and consequently reckon this prophet to have been of royal descent. As to Nahum, lastly, it is certain, that he prophesied after the captivity of the ten tribes, and before that of the other two, which he foretold, (chap. i.) Though therefore the Jews do generally place him in Manasseh's reign, yet others choose to refer him to the latter part of Josiah's, as being nearer to the destruction of Nineveh and of the Assyrian monarchy, to which several prophecies of his do principally relate.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 609; and Howell's History, in the notes.

of the Euphrates, marched into Syria and Palestine, in order to recover these provinces, which he soon did; and having besieged Jerusalem, took it, and carried away the king, and part of the vessels of the temple along with him, to Babylon. In a short time, however, he released him and restored him to his crown, on condition that he should become tributary to him, which he continued to be for three years; but in the fourth, he retracted from that subjection, whereupon Nebuchadnezzar came upon him with a fresh invasion.

Upon the first invasion, the Rechabites, who, according to the institution of Jonadab the son of Rechab, their founder, had always abstained from wine, and hitherto only lived in tents, apprehending themselves in more danger in the open country, came to Jerusalem for safety. By these people God intended to convince the Jews of their disobedience to him; and therefore he ordered his prophet Jeremiah, to bring them to an apartment of the temple, and there offer them wine to drink, which when they refused upon account of its being contrary to their institution, which they never yet had violated, the prophet (after due commendation ^a of their obedience) turned it upon the Jews, and reproached them, who were God's peculiar people, for being less observant of his laws than the poor Rechabites, who were not of the stock of Israel, had been of the injunctions of their ancestor.

Before the next invasion Jeremiah prophesied that Nebuchadnezzar would again come against Judah and Jerusalem; that he would waste the country, and carry the people captive to Babylon, where they should continue in that condition for the space of seventy years; with many more calamities, and woful desolations, that were ready to fall upon them, if they did not repent. But this was so far from making any saving impression upon them, that it only enraged and exasperated them the more against him, inasmuch, that, for fear of their malice and wrathful indignation, he was ^b forced to keep himself concealed.

^a The prophet's words, upon this occasion, are these:—'Because ye have obeyed the commandments of Jonadab your father, and kept all his precepts, and done according to all that he hath commanded you; thus saith the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel, Jonadab, the son of Rechab, shall not want a man to stand before me for ever.' (Jer. xxxv. 18, 19.) To stand before a prince, or to see his face, in Scripture phrase, denotes the honour which accrues from being in his service, but the Rechabites were neither priests nor Levites. Hitherto they had lived in the fields, separate from towns and villages, and were averse indeed to any employment either in church or state; but from the time of their captivity, (for they were carried along with the two tribes,) we find them employed as singers and porters in the service of the temple. To serve in this capacity, there was no necessity for their being of the tribe of Levi; the declaration of the divine will, by the mouth of the prophet Jeremiah, was in this case a sufficient vocation.—Calmet's Commentary on Jer. xxv. 19.

^b Jeremiah's words, upon this occasion, are,—'I am shut up, I cannot go into the house of the Lord,' chap. xxxvi. 5. But then the question is, what we are to understand by his being shut up? For, that he was not at that time shut up in prison, is plain from the prince's advising him and Baruch to hide themselves, ver. 19. Junius and Tremellius do therefore suppose three ways of his being shut up, and leave it to our choice which to take. The first is, that the king had forbidden him to go any more into the temple to prophesy such terrible things to the people; but the prophets of God did not use to observe such prohibitions of their prophetic ministry. The second is, that the chief priests had excommunicated him, and therefore he might not go; but this, in all likelihood, he would have less regarded, for the same reason. The third is, that God, to provide for the

During his concealment, God commanded him to collect together, and digest into one volume, all the prophecies which he had given him against Israel, against Judah, and against other nations, from the time that he first began to prophesy, (which was in the thirteenth year of Josiah,) if haply, by hearing all his judgments summed up together against them, they might be brought to a better sense of their transgressions. To this purpose the prophet employed Baruch, ^c his disciple and amanuensis, to take a copy ^d of them from his mouth, safety of his prophet, and to punish the obstinacy of the people, would not permit him to go any more among them. This, of the three, seems the most probable; though the phrase may very properly denote no more than the prophet's concealing himself, and keeping at home, for fear of some mischief from the people.—Howell's History, in the notes.

^c Baruch, the son of Neriah, and grandson of Maaseiah, was of an illustrious birth, and of the tribe of Judah. Seraiah, his brother, had a considerable employment in the court of king Zedekiah, but himself kept close to the person of Jeremiah, and was his most faithful disciple, though his adherence to his master drew upon him several persecutions, and a great deal of bad treatment. After the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, Baruch and his master were permitted to stay in the land of Judea; but when the remains of the people which were left behind, after having slain their governor Gedaliah, were for retiring into Egypt, they compelled Jeremiah and his disciple to go along with them, where the prophet died, and Baruch soon after made his escape to his brethren in Babylon, where, according to the tradition of the Rabbins, he likewise died in the twelfth year of the captivity. But of what authority the book, which goes under his name, is, or by whom it was written, and whether any thing related therein be historically true, or the whole of it a fiction, is altogether uncertain. Grotius, in his Commentary upon it, thinks it an entire fiction of some Hellenistical Jew, under the name of Baruch; and St Jerome, long before him, (in the preface to his Exposition of Jeremiah,) tells us, that the reason why he did not make a comment on this book, (though, in the edition of the Septuagint, it be joined with Jeremiah,) was, because it was not deemed canonical among the Hebrews, and contains an epistle which falsely bears the name of Jeremiah. This epistle is annexed to the book, and, in the common division of it, makes the last chapter; but the main subject of the book itself is likewise an epistle, either sent, or feigned to be sent, by king Jehoiakim, and the Jews who were in captivity with him in Babylon, to their brethren the Jews who were still left in Judah and Jerusalem; wherein they recommend to their prayers the emperor Nebuchadnezzar and his children, that, under his dominion, they may lead quiet and peaceable lives; wherein they confess their sins, and ask pardon for what is past, take notice of the threats of the prophets, which they had so long despised, and acknowledge the righteousness of God in what he had brought upon them; wherein they remind them of the advantages which the Jews had in their knowledge of the law of God, and of true wisdom, above all other nations, and thereupon exhort them to reform their manners, and forsake their evil customs, which would be the only means to bring about their deliverance from the captivity under which they groaned. The whole is introduced with an historical preface, wherein it is related that Baruch, being then at Babylon, did, in the name of the captive king, and his people, draw up the same epistle, and afterwards read it to them for their approbation; and that, together with it, they sent a collection of money to the high priest at Jerusalem, for the maintenance of the daily sacrifices. This is the substance of the book itself; and, in the letter annexed to it, which goes under Jeremiah's name, the vanity of the Babylonish idols and idolatry is set forth at large, and with liveliness enough. Of the whole there are but three copies; one in Greek, and the other two in Syriac, whereof one agreeth with the Greek, though the other very much differs from it; but in what language it was originally written, or whether one of these be not the original, or which of them may be so, it is next to impossible to tell.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 593, and Calmet's Preface on Baruch.

^d How Jeremiah could remember all the prophecies that he uttered for the space of two and twenty years together, we can and, when he had so done, ordered him to go up into the temple, on the day of expiation, ^a and there read it in the hearing of all the people.

Pursuant to his instructions Baruch went, and, in Gemariah's ^b apartment, read the book, first to the people, who stood below in the courts, and afterwards to the princes who were met together in the secretary's chamber; and who thereupon advised him and his master Jeremiah, both to ^c keep out of the way, until they had known the king's pleasure concerning it. As soon as the king was informed of the book, he sent one of his attendants for it, and commanded him to read it: but he had not gone far, before the king, impatient to hear the judgments denounced against him, snatched it out of his hand, and, notwithstanding the importunity of his nobles to dissuade him, cut it to pieces, and threw it into the fire, ^d which was upon the hearth, (for it was then the hardly conceive, unless we allow that he had the particular inspiration of God to bring all things to his remembrance, that he might neither forget nor misrepresent them in his recital to Baruch: for, without such a supernatural assistance, what security have we that this part of the Scriptures is the work of the Holy Ghost?—Calmet's Commentary on Jer. xxxvi. 4.

^a Some are of opinion that this was done on the great day of fasting, or solemn expiation, which was observed at the beginning of the civil year, on the tenth day of the month Tisri, which answers to the latter end of our September, and the beginning of October; but the context seems to denote, that it was on the last day mentioned in the ninth verse to have been proclaimed in the fifth year of Jehoiakim, which must have been a fast extraordinary, and appointed upon some particular occasion of the state, because the law had ordained no such observation on the ninth month: but what that particular occasion was, it is not so well known; though some have imagined that it was in commemoration of the calamity which had befallen Jerusalem in the year before, when Nebuchadnezzar had sent to Babylon part of the vessels of the house of the Lord, and was upon the point of sending away captive the king and all his princes.—Calmet's Commentary on Jer. xxvi. 4. 9.

^b This Gemariah was one of the captains of the temple, whose apartment was near the New Gate, whereof he kept guard, and had a certain number of Levites under him, who constantly stood centinel. For the temple, we must know, was guarded like a king's palace; and as the upper court, which is mentioned in the text, was, in all probability, the priest's court; so the gate, whereof Gemariah had charge, must have been the east gate of that court, which, in the reign of Jehoshaphat, 2 Chron. xx. 5. is called the New Court.—Calmet's Commentary.

^c The advice which the princes of Judah gave upon this occasion is very remarkable, because it reconciles their duty to God, to justice, and to charity, with what they were obliged to from their prince. Their prince, they knew, was of an hasty and violent temper; and yet the contents of the book were such, that it would not be safe for him to be ignorant of it; and therefore, being in duty bound to acquaint him with it, they advised Baruch and his master to provide for their own security, until they should see what effect it would have upon the king, whereof they promised, no doubt, to give them intelligence.—Calmet's Commentary.

^d The text tells us, that it was in the ninth month, (which answers in part to our month of November,) when the king burned the book. After that the rain began to fall in the month of September, the weather generally grew raw and cold, so that a fire at this time was not unseasonable: the custom, however, in this country was not to have chimneys, as it is among us. The fire was made in the middle of the room, upon an hearth, or in a stove, and the smoke went out either at the door or window, or some opening made on purpose in the roof of the house, as we see in some of our college halls, and some kitchens in ancient monasteries, where the chimney is in the midst of the roof, in the form of a cupola, with several openings for the smoke to fly out at. For, that there were formerly no chimneys in the manner we make them now, is plain from the observation which his amutator makes upon Vitruvius, namely, that, in all his book of winter season,) where it was consumed; and then immediately sent out his officers to apprehend the prophet and his amanuensis; but they had both withdrawn to a place of security, and could not be found.

Upon burning the book, Jeremiah was commanded to make another in the same manner; to have the same prophecies inserted in it, with some ¹ farther denunciations against Jehoiakim and his house, which, in a short time, began to take effect. For Nebuchadnezzar, as we said, having invaded Judea, and laid siege to Jerusalem, soon took it, and put Jehoiakim in chains to carry him to Babylon; but, upon his humiliation, and swearing fealty to him, he again restored him to his kingdom, and left Jerusalem, in order to pursue his victories against the Egyptians: but before he did that, he ^e caused great numbers of the people to be sent captives to Babylon, and gave particular orders to Ashpenaz the master of his eunuchs, that, out of the children of the royal family, and that of the nobility of the land, he should make choice of such as surpassed others in beauty and wit, that, when they came to Babylon, they might be made eunuchs too, and attend in his palace. This Ashpenaz accordingly did; and, among the children that were carried away captive ^f for this purpose were Daniel, Hananiah, Mishaël, and Azariah. Daniel, upon his ar-architecture, he makes no mention of chimneys, which he questionless would have done, had they been of use in his time.—Calmet's Commentary, and M. Perault on Vitruv. b. vi. c. 8.—[In Palestine, and the surrounding regions, the coldness of the night in all the seasons of the year, is often very inconvenient. The king of Judah is described by the prophet, as sitting in his winter-house in the ninth month, corresponding to the latter end of November and part of December, with a fire burning on the hearth before him. This answers to the state of the weather at Aleppo, where, as Dr Russel informs us, the most delicate people make no fires till the end of November. The Europeans resident at Syria, he observes in a note, continue them till March; the people of the country seldom longer than February; but fires are occasionally made in wet seasons, not only in March, but in April also, and would be acceptable at the gardens sometimes even in May. Dr Pococke, in his journey to Jerusalem, being conducted by an Arab to his tent, found his wife and family warming themselves by the fire on the seventeenth of March; and on the eighth of May he was treated with a fire to warm him, by the governor of Galilee. The nights at that season are often very cold, and of this the inhabitants are rendered more sensible by the heats of the day. In May and June, and even in July, travellers very often put on fires in the evening. This statement clearly discovers the reason, why the people, who went to Gethsemane to apprehend our Lord, kindled a fire of coals to warm themselves at the time of the passover, which happened in the spring.—Parson's Illustrations, vol. i.—Ed.]

^e Since the people were thus carried into captivity, the sons of the royal family, and of the nobility of the land, made eunuchs and slaves in the palace of the king of Babylon; the vessels of the temple carried thither, the king made a tributary, and the whole land now brought into vassalage under the Babylonians; from hence we must reckon the beginning of the seventy years' captivity foretold by the prophet Jeremiah, ch. xxv. 11. and xxix. 10, and in the fourth year of Jehoiakim must be the first year in that computation.—Prévost's Connection, anno 606.

^f Some indeed do place their captivity several years later, but it is absolutely inconsistent with what is elsewhere said in Scripture: for these children, after their carrying away to Babylon, were to be three years under the tuition of the master of the eunuchs, (Dan. i. 5.) to be instructed by him in the language and learning of the Chaldeans, before they could be admitted into the presence of the king, to stand and serve before him. But in the second year of Nebuchadnezzar's reign, after his father's death, which was but the fourth year after his first taking of Jerusalem, Daniel had not only admission and freedom of access rival in Babylon, was called Belteshazzar, and the other three were named Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, of whom we have several things to say in another place.

Jehoiakim, after he had lived in subjection to the king of Babylon for three years, rebelled against him: and refusing to pay him any more tribute, renewed his confederacy with Nerho king of Egypt. Hereupon Nebuchadnezzar, ^a not being at leisure to come himself to chastise him, sent orders to all his lieutenants and governors of provinces in those parts, to make war against him, which brought upon him inroads and depredations from every quarter; till, in the eleventh year of his reign, all parties joined together against him, and having shut him up in Jerusalem, they took him prisoner in a sally which he made upon them, slew him with the sword, and, in the completion of the ¹ prophet's prediction concerning him, ^b cast his dead body in the highway, without allowing it the decency of a funeral.

After the death of his father, Jehoiachin, ^c who is likewise called Coniah and Jeconiah, ascended the throne: but for the little time that he continued thereon, persisting in his father's impieties, he drew upon himself ² a to the king. but we find him there interpreting his dream, (Dan. ii.) and immediately thereupon advanced to be the chief of the governors of the wise men, and ruler over all the provinces of Babylon; and, less than four years' instruction in the language, laws, usages, and learning of the country, can scarce be thought sufficient to qualify him for such a trust; nor could he any sooner be old enough for it, because we may observe, that when he was first carried away from Jerusalem, he was but a youth.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 606.

^a What detained him from going in person against Jerusalem we are not told: only it appears, that, in the tenth year of Jehoiakim, he was engaged in an arbitration between the Medes and Lydians, the occasion of which was this:—After the Medes had recovered all the Upper Asia out of the hands of the Scythians, and again extended their borders to the river Haÿs, which was the common boundary between them and the Lydians, it was not long before there happened a war between these two nations, which was managed for five years together with various success. In the sixth year, intending to make one battle decisive, they engaged each other with their utmost strength; but in the midst of the action, and while the fortune of the day seemed to hang in an equal balance between them, there happened an eclipse, which overspread both the armies with darkness: whereupon they desisted from fighting, and agreed to refer the controversy to the arbitration of two neighbouring princes. The Lydians chose Siemesis king of Cilicia; and the Medes Nebuchadnezzar (who, by Herodotus, b. 1. is called Labyntus.) king of Babylon, who concluded a peace between them, on the terms that Astyages, son of Cyaxares king of Media, should take to wife Ariena, the daughter of Halyattis, king of the Lydians; of which marriage, within a year after, was born Cyaxares, who is called Darius the Mede, in the book of Daniel.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 528.

^b In 2 Kings xxiv. 6, we are told expressly, that Jehoiakim 'slept with his fathers,' and yet it is very certain that he was neither buried with them, nor died in his bed, but lay above ground unburied, according to the prediction of the prophet, (Jer. xxxvi. 30.) 'exposed in the day to the heat, and in the night to the frost;' from whence it appears, 'that to sleep with one's fathers,' signifies no more than to die as they did.—Patrick's Commentary.

^c His succeeding his father in the throne of Judah may seem to disagree with the threat which the prophet denounces against his father, (Jer. xxxvi. 30.) 'He shall have none to sit upon the throne of David.' But as Jehoiachin's reign lasted little more than three months, during which time he was absolutely subject to the Chaldeans, a reign of so short a continuance, and so small authority, may very justly be looked upon as nothing.—Calmet's Commentary.

bitter declaration of God's wrath, which was speedily executed. For, in three months after his father's death, Nebuchadnezzar, ^d coming in person with his royal army to Jerusalem, which was then blocked up by his lieutenants, caused the place to be begirt with a close siege on every side. This so terrified Jehoiachin, that ^e taking his mother, his princes, and his chief ministers with him, he went out to Nebuchadnezzar, and delivered himself into his hand: who, though he spared his life, put him in chains, and sent him to Babylon, where he continued in prison until the death of his conqueror. But when Evilmerodach ^f succeeded to his father's throne, he not only released him from his imprisonment, which had continued for seven and thirty years, but treated him with great humanity and respect, allowing him an honourable maintenance, and giving him the precedence of all other princes in Babylon.

At this time Nebuchadnezzar carried away with him, besides the king and his family, a vast number of other captives, among whom was Ezekiel the prophet, all the mighty men of valour, and all the useful artificers, out of Jerusalem, ^g to the number of ten thousand men, together with all the treasures, and ^h rich furniture of the ^d It is very probable that Nebuchadnezzar heard that he had entered into a confederacy with the king of Egypt, as his successor did: and therefore sent an army against him, in the very beginning of his reign, to lay siege to Jerusalem, against which he intended to come himself. But the Jews have a conceit that Nebuchadnezzar's counsellors represented to him, how unadvisedly he had acted in making him king whose father had been in rebellion against him, and that upon their representation, he resolved to depose him. 'From an ill dog there never comes a good whelp,' was the proverb, they say, which the counsellors made use of on this occasion: and to make this more feasible to the father and son, they generally apply that passage in Ezekiel, 'She took another of her whelps, and made him a young lion, and he went up and down among the lions. He became a young lion, and learned to catch the prey, and devour men. Then the nations set against him on every side from the provinces: they spread their net over him, and he was taken in their pit,' chap. xix. 6, &c.—Calmet's and Patrick's Commentaries.

^e It is very probable that he made this surrender, at the advice of the prophet Jeremiah, who gave the same counsel more than once to his successor Zedekiah, (Jer. xxi. 9; xxvii. 17; xxxviii. 2.)

^f During his father's indisposition, who fancied himself metamorphosed into an ox, he took upon him the administration of the government: but after seven years, when his father recovered his understanding, so as once more to ascend the throne, Evilmerodach, as some believe, was imprisoned by his father, and in his confinement, contracted an acquaintance and intimacy with Jehoiachin: so that after his father's death, and his full accession to the throne, he released him out of prison, and heaped many favours upon him: and it was by his advice, as the Jews tell us, that Evilmerodach took his father out of the ground, after he was dead and buried, cut his body in pieces, and gave them to three hundred ravens, lest he should return from his grave, as he had before recovered from his metamorphosis into an ox.—Calmet's Dictionary, under the word Evilmerodach.

^g This must be understood of the whole number of the people that were at this time carried captive, which, according to Abernethy was thus made up:—Jehoiachin and all his court, and great men, were seven thousand; the craftsmen a thousand; and other considerable men in the country two thousand, which completed the number. Jeremiah indeed computes them to be little above three thousand that were now carried away: but he reckons only those that were carried from Jerusalem; whereas in 2 Kings xxxiv. 16, there is an account of those who were carried from other cities, and out of the tribe of Benjamin, which were seven thousand; and this reconciles the difference.—Patrick's Comment.

temple, and of the royal palace. What he left in the land were only the poorer sort of people, over whom he made Mattaniah, the third son of Josiah, king. Of him he took a solemn oath to be faithful and true in his obedience to the crown of Babylon; and, to engage him the more to be so, he changed his name to Zedekiah, which signifies the justice of the Lord, intending thereby to put him in mind of the vengeance he was to expect from the justice of the Lord his God, if he violated that fidelity which he had in his name sworn unto him.

Zedekiah was but just settled in the throne, and Nebuchadnezzar departed out of Judea, and Syria, when¹ several kings of the neighbouring nations, namely, the Ammonites, the Moabites, the Edomites, the Zidonians, the Tyrians, &c., sent their ambassadors to Jerusalem, to congratulate him upon his accession to the throne, and to propose a league against the king of Babylon, in order to shake off his yoke, and prevent his return into those parts any more. Upon this occasion, Jeremiah, by God's command, made him bonds and yokes, which he sent by the said ambassadors to their respective masters, with this message from God, namely, "That he had given all their countries to the king of Babylon, and therefore their wisest course would be to submit to his yoke, which if they refused to do, both they and their countries should most certainly be destroyed:" but to Zedekiah he went in person, and having persuaded him to submit to the king of Babylon, and not to give credit to false prophets, who might flatter him with a deliverance from his power, he prevailed with him for that time not to enter into the league that was proposed.

He had before this,² under the emblem of two baskets of figs, foretold Zedekiah the restoration which God intended for those that were gone into captivity, and the misery and desolation which should befall them who were still in the land; and now in pursuance of his prophetic office, he "took the opportunity of the king's the reign of Jehoiakim, when he first took Jerusalem, he carried part of the vessels of the house of God away into the land of Shinar, and put them into the house of his god," (Dan. i. 2.) These were the vessels which his son Belshazzar profaned, (Dan. v. 2.) and which Cyrus restored to the Jews, (Ezra i. 7.) to be set up again in the temple when rebuilt. 2dly, In the reign of Jehoiachin, he took the city again, and cut in pieces a great part of the vessels of gold which Solomon had made, (2 Kings xxiv. 13.) and by some chance or other had escaped his former plunder. 3dly, In the eleventh year of Zedekiah, he pillaged the temple once more, when he brake in pieces the pillars of brass, and the bases, and the brazen sea, and took along with them all the vessels of silver and gold that he could find, and carried them to Babylon, (2 Kings xxv. 13.) &c. It is somewhat strange, that amongst all this inventory we hear no mention made of the ark of the covenant, which of all other things was held most sacred; but it is very probable that it was burned together with the temple, in this last desolation. For what some say of its being hidden by the prophet Jeremiah, in a certain cave in Mount Nebo, is a mere fable. — Patriarch's and Cabinet's Commentaries, and Dissertation on the Ark of the Covenant.

a At what time, and upon what occasion Zedekiah sent this embassy to the king of Babylon, the sacred history is silent; but it is very presumable that it was at the beginning of his reign, and that as Judea was then tributary to the Chaldeans, the king's policy was to keep up a good understanding with them. Ezekiel however was not as yet possessed of the spirit of prophecy; and for this reason Jeremiah was obliged to take care of the Jews who were gone captives into the land of Babylon, and to send them instructions in what manner they were to behave, namely, sending an embassy to Babylon to direct a letter to the Jews of the captivity, advising them not to be deceived with such prophets,^b as made them entertain false hopes of a speedy restoration; that by the ordination of God their captivity was to last seventy years; and that the people left at Jerusalem would be of little use to assist them in their deliverance, because God, in a short time, would afflict them with the sword, with famine, and with pestilence, so as to consume the greatest part of them, and scatter the rest over the face of the earth; and therefore he exhorts them to live quietly and peaceably in the country, whither they were carried, without expecting any return, until the time which God had appointed.

Upon the receipt of this letter, one Shemaiah, a popular man among the captive Jews at Babylon, took upon him to write to Zephaniah, the second priest, and to all the priests and people of Jerusalem, representing Jeremiah as a madman, and a false pretender to prophecy, and advising them to confine him: which Jeremiah hearing, was commanded by God to send again to the captives of Babylon, to let them know, that he would punish Shemaiah and his posterity very severely, for having deluded them with false prophecies; and at the same time, to convince those that were left in Jerusalem, he showed them,³ by the emblem of a potter's vessel, that it was in the Almighty's power to destroy what nation or people he pleased. But all this availed nothing. They still resolved to go on in their wicked ways: and, to avenge themselves of the prophet, who gave them some disturbance therein, they abused him with words and blows, and, at length, put him in the stocks.

It was no small comfort to him, however, under all his afflictions, to find that Ezekiel, who, much about this time, was called to the prophetic office, prophesied the same things at Babylon that he did at Jerusalem. At Jerusalem, Jeremiah⁴ foretold the divine judgments which were to be executed upon Chaldea and Babylon, by the Medes and Persians, which he wrote in a book, and⁵ delivered it to Seraiah, who was then going to

b The two persons mentioned in Scripture, who took upon them to be prophets sent from God, were Ahaz the son of Kolaiah, and Zedekiah the son of Maaseiah, two of the captivity among the Jews at Babylon: who feeding the people with false promises of a speedy restoration, hindered them from making any settlements in the places assigned for their habitation: but, as the prophet Jeremiah denounced their sudden and fearful destruction, Nebuchadnezzar, understanding that they disturbed the people by their vain prophecies, caused them both to be seized, and roasted to death in the fire. The later Jews say, that these two men were the two elders who would have corrupted Susanna, and that Nebuchadnezzar commanded them to be burned for this reason: but the whole foundation of this conceit is, that Jeremiah (chap. xxix. 23, where he speaks of these men) says, 'that they committed villany in Israel, and adultery with their neighbours' wives': from whence they conjecture all the rest.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 597.

c The words in the text according to our translation are, 'the word which Jeremiah the prophet commanded Seraiah, the son of Neriah, &c., when he went with Zedekiah, the king of Judah, into Babylon, in the fourth year of his reign, and this

Babylon upon an embassy, with instructions to read the contents of it to his captive brethren upon the banks of the river Euphrates; and when he had made an end of reading, to tie a stone to it, and ^a throw it into the river, thereby to denote, that as it would naturally sink, so should the Babylonish empire be totally destroyed, and never rise any more.

At Babylon, Ezekiel, by several types and prophetic revelations, foretold the taking of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans; Zedekiah's flight from the city by night; the putting out of his eyes; his imprisonment and death at Babylon; the carrying away the remainder of the Jews into captivity; the desolation of their country, and the many and great calamities which should befall them for their iniquities. But to those of the captivity, who, avoiding these iniquities, did endeavour to keep themselves steady and faithful in God's service, God, by the mouth of his prophet, promised to become a sanctuary in a strange country, and to bring them back again unto the land of Israel, where they should flourish in peace and righteousness, and once more ¹ become his people, and he their God.

Thus did these two great prophets visit the people which were still remaining in Jerusalem with several warnings; endeavouring, both by significant emblems, and direct predictions, to reclaim them. But, when they still persisted in their obstinacy and disobedience, God at length brought upon them the calamities which he had so often foretold, and so severely threatened.

Seraiah was a quiet prince,' (Jer. li. 59,) and from hence some Hebrew interpreters infer, that Zedekiah went to Babylon in the fourth year of his reign to make his court, and cultivate the good graces of his patron and paramount Nebuchadnezzar. But this opinion, though followed by several, has no foundation in any other part of Scripture; and the passage now before us, may, according to the original, be very properly rendered in this wise. 'The word which Jeremiah commanded Seraiah, when he went to Babylon upon an embassy from Zedekiah.' The chief business of this embassy was to request of Nebuchadnezzar, a restitution of the sacred vessels of the temple which he had taken away, when he carried Jehoiakim captive into Babylon. Our translation, however, is not at all significant in this place, when it styles this Seraiah, a quiet prince. The Septuagint have very properly rendered the words ἀρχὴν δόξαν the prince of the presents, which some apply to the presents which king Zedekiah made to the temple, and others to the things he daily supplied for sacrifices; but the most natural sense in this place is, that he was charged with the presents and tribute which Zedekiah was obliged to send to Nebuchadnezzar; that his business was, to present them to the emperor, and, upon that occasion, to solicit the restoration of the sacred vessels; upon which account, the Vulgate has rendered the words 'princeps prophetic,' the chief person in the embassy, who at the time of audience, was to make a speech to the emperor, in his prince's name.—Cabnet's Commentary.—[Dr Boothroyd renders the passage in question thus,—'The word which Jeremiah, the prophet, commanded Seraiah, the son of Meriah, the son of Maaseiah, when he went on behalf of Zedekiah, king of Judah, to Babylon, in the fourth year of his reign; for Seraiah carried a present.—Boothroyd's New Version.—Ed.

^a We have an emblematical action of the like kind described in the book of the Revelation of St John: 'and a mighty angel took up a stone, like a great millstone, and cast it into the sea, saying, Thus, with violence shall that great city Babylon be thrown down, and shall be found no more at all,' chap. xviii. 21, where the word Babylon is taken in an analogical sense, because the destruction of that great city and empire, as we shall see hereafter, was so remarkable, as to afford a comparison for any other great and opulent state brought to ruin and desolation.

^b It is a great dispute among the learned, whether this history of Judith was transacted before or after the Babylonish captivity. Those who maintain the latter opinion, found a great deal upon the words of the history itself, wherein the author, according to the Greek version, (chap. iv. 3.) expressly tells us, that 'the Israelites were newly returned from captivity, and all the people of Judah were lately gathered together, and the vessels, and the altar, and the house, were sanctified after their profanation;' and wherein it is farther affirmed, that they 'were led captives into a land that was not theirs,' that the temple of their God was 'cast to the ground, and their cities taken by the enemies; but now they are come up from the places where they were scattered, and have possessed Jerusalem,' (ch. v. 18, 19.) It is in vain, say they, to endeavour to correct the sense of these passages; the bare reading of them, and the first impression they make upon the mind, naturally leads one to say, that this history was not transacted till after the return from the captivity, which, in a great measure, is confirmed by the opinion of almost all the ancients, and a great many of the moderns; but then they widely disagree in their computations of the period of time when this remarkable event happened. For some place it under Cambyzes, the son of Cyrus, others under Xerxes, others under Darius; and others again, under Antiochus Epiphanes, in the time of the Maccabees: which last opinion is the most tenable, if we will but allow, that a feast was instituted in commemoration of it, as we read in the Vulgate, but in none of the other translations. Those who maintain that this transaction happened before the captivity, are in like manner divided: for some place it under Manasseh, and others under Zedekiah.

Those who contend for Zedekiah's reign, make the Nabuchodonosor in the book of Judith, and the Nebuchadnezzar in the 2d of Kings, the same person; and as it is positively said in the 2d chapter of Judith, that he put his general Holofernes on this expedition, in the first month of the eighteenth year of his reign, which was the ninth of Zedekiah king of Judah, Holofernes's death, and the siege of Jerusalem happened, they say, in the same year; only it must be supposed, that the attempt against Bethulia was in the beginning of the year, and the siege of Jerusalem at the end of it. The captivity, therefore, from which the Jews are said to have newly returned, must be that in Jehoiakim's time, for that in Zedekiah's continued seventy years, before which Nebuchadnezzar had quite subdued Arphaxad, king of the Medes, and demolished Ecbatan. And as for the Bethulians enjoying peace during the life of Judith, it may be supposed that Nebuchadnezzar, being employed two years in the siege of Jerusalem, might spend some years in reducing other parts of the country; and seeing Bethulia was a place naturally strong, and situated among the mountains, he might be unwilling to foil his army before it, and, especially considering the ill success of his general, to make any fresh attempt upon it, until he had subdued all the rest. Those, again, who contend for Manasseh's reign, make the Nabuchodonosor in Judith to be the same with Saosduchimus in Ptolemy, and Arphaxad the same with Phraortes, mentioned by Herodotus; and that, as these two princes made war with one another, wherein Phraortes was vanquished, and perished with his army, all the other things recorded of Saosduchimus and his general might happen without inconsistency. For the captivity there mentioned, might be that from whence Manasseh, with some of his subjects, had lately returned, when the temple, which had been profaned, was purified again, and the service of the sanctuary restored to its ancient dignity, (2 Chron. xxxiii. 1, &c.) This is a short state of the several opinions concerning the date of this transaction, and the last of these, in our judgment, seems to be best founded.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 665; Cabnet's Preface on the Book of Judith.

^c For though the Jews and ancient Christians did not receive this book of Judith into their canon of Scripture, yet they always looked upon it as a true history; and accordingly Clement, in his epistle to the Corinthians, has cited it as well as the author of the apostolic constitutions, which go under his name; and as St Athanasius, or the writer of the Synopsis, that is ascribed to

The author of the book of Judith ^a relates, that Nebuchodonosor, ^b king of Assyria, in the twelfth year of his reign, fought a great battle in the plains of Ragan, ^c with Arphaxad ^d king of Media, wherein he not only utterly him, gives a summary account of it, even as he does of other sacred books, from his example we may be permitted to justify the short abridgment which we have made of it in our 'History of the Holy Bible.'—Calmet's Dictionary under the word Judith.

^a Who this author was, it nowhere appears. St Jerome seems to think that Judith wrote it herself, but produces no good authority for his opinion. Others will have it, that the high priest Joakim, mentioned in this book, was the author of it; but this is equally a bare conjecture; nor is there much more certainty in those, who, supposing the history to have happened in the time of Cambyses, ascribe it to Joshua, the son of Josedek, who was high priest at that time. But whoever the author was, he seems to be posterior to the facts which he relates, because he speaks of the festival instituted in memory of Judith's victory, as still continued in his time, (Judith xvi. 20.) The book was originally written in the Chaldee language, which is not now extant; but from thence, at the desire of Paula and Eusebium, St Jerome formed the translation, which we now have in the vulgar Latin edition of the Bible, not rendering it word for word, as himself tells us in his preface to the history, but repairing the corruptions of the various readings, and giving us, according to the best of his judgment, the true and entire sense of the original. Besides this translation of St Jerome's, there are two others, one in Greek, and the other in Syriac. That which is in Greek is attributed to Theodotion, who lived in the time of Commodus, who was made emperor of Rome in the year of Christ 180. But the version was much ancienter; for Clemens Romanus, as we said, in his epistle to the Corinthians, which was wrote near 126 years before, has a quotation from it. The Syriac translation was made from the Greek, and so was also the English, which we, at present, have among the apocryphal writings in our Bible. And of all these three versions, it may be observed, that there are several particulars in them which are not in Jerome's, and which seem to be those various readings which he professes to have cut off, as vicious corruptions of the text; so that, in this respect, St Jerome's translation ought to have the preference, whenever there is any remarkable difference between them.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 655, and Calmet's Dissertation on the Book of Judith.

^b This Nabuchodonosor is the same prince whom Herodotus^c calls Saosduchimus, who, after the death of Esarhaddon, (the same who took the advantage of Massimordacus's dying without issue, and united the kingdom of Babylon to that of Assyria,) succeeded to his acquisitions; and the reason why the author of this book of Judith, who apparently wrote either in Babylon, or some other part of Chaldea, calls him Nabuchodonosor, is, because this was the common name, as Pharaoh was in Egypt, of the kings of that country.—Calmet's Commentary on Judith, and Prideaux's Connection.

^c The plains of Ragan are very probably those which lie about Rages, a town of Media, standing upon the mountains of Ecbatan, and distant about a small day's-journey from that city.—Calmet's Dictionary.

^d Both our learned Prideaux and primate Usher are of opinion, that this Arphaxad was the person whom profane historians call Dejeoes, the first king of the Medes, and founder of Ecbatan; but the account which the book of Judith gives of Arphaxad, and of the circumstances of his death, seems to be more applicable to what Herodotus relates of Phraortes, his son and successor. For, as Arphaxad had many nations under his dominion, and fell in battle against the king of Assyria, (Judith i. 6, 15.) so Herodotus (b. i.) tells us of Phraortes, "That, having subdued the Persians, and made them part of his empire, he soon overcame the rest of the people of the Upper Asia, that is, all that lay north of Mount Taurus, to the river Halys, passing from nation to nation, and always attended with victory; until coming with an army against the Assyrians, with an intent to besiege Nineveh their capital, he was vanquished and slain in the two and twentieth year of his reign. Dejeoes, indeed, is said by Herodotus to have been the first founder of Ecbatan; but as the undertaking was very great, it is not improbable, that he left enough to his successor Phraortes to complete; so that all the works which the author of Judith ascribes to Arphaxad (chap. i.)

defeated, and slew him, but made himself master of several of his cities, and among others, of Ecbatan, ^e the royal seat of the Median empire, which he miserably defaced: and afterwards returned in great triumph to Nineveh: that, some time after inquiring of his officers, nobles, and counsellors, what tributary countries had not gone with them to the war, for he had summoned them all to attend him, and finding that none of the western provinces had paid that regard to his commands, he made a decree that Holofernes, ^f the chief captain of his army, should not fail the next year to chastise their disobedience: that, pursuant to this decree, this general took the field with a vast army; ^g and having wasted and destroyed several other nations, at length came unto Judea, where he laid siege to Bethulia, ^h a strong town in the

might be his."—Calmet's Commentary and Dictionary; and Prideaux's Connection, anno 635.

^e This city, Herodotus says expressly, was built by Dejeoes, the first king of the Medes; but that author is wrong in ascribing the honour of the whole work to him, which his son Phraortes, at least finished and beautified to such a degree, that, though the Scripture is silent, profane authors have given us a very advantageous account of it. The city, according to them, was situate on a spacious eminence, and into it Dejeoes had brought together the whole nations of the Medes, who never before had lived in any thing but caves and huts, dispersed up and down in the country, which great concourse of people made it very large and populous. It was encompassed with seven walls, at equal distances from each other. The first was the lowest and equal in circumference with those of Athens, that is, according to Thucydes, (b. ii.) 178 furlongs. The rest rose gradually, and overlooked each other, about the eighth of a battlement. The battlements were of different colours. The first was white, the second black, the third red, the fourth blue, the fifth of a deep red, the sixth of a silver, and the seventh of a gold colour; and for this reason, as Bochart has observed, this city was usually called by the ancients Agbata, which, in the Arabic language, signifies, a thing of different and distinct colours. The royal palace and treasury stood within the seventh wall; and the palace alone, according to Polybius, (b. x.) was seven furlongs round, and built with all the cost and skill that a stately edifice did require; for some of its beams are said to have been of silver, and the rest of cedar, which were strengthened with plates of gold.—Calmet's Comment. and Dictionary under the word; and Wells' Geography of the Old Testament, vol. 3. [This city still exists under the name of Hamadan, and is situated in lat. 34° 53' N., long. 40° E. The tombs of Esther and Mordecai are said to be still preserved in it, and are protected by a colony of Jews, who have been resident there from time immemorial, and at present amount to about 600 families. The whole population of Hamadan is estimated at 40,000.]—Ed.

^f Some annotators are of opinion, that the word Holofernes is of Persian extract, in the same manner as Tisaphernes, Intaphernes, &c. But others imagine that this general was a native either of Pontus or Cappadocia. Polybius makes mention of one of that name, who, having conquered Cappadocia, soon lost it again, because he was for changing the ancient customs of the country, and introducing drunkenness, together with feasts and songs to Bacchus; whereupon Casaubon conjectures, that this was the same Holofernes that commanded Nabuchodonosor's forces, as it must be owned, that his riot and debauchery, as well as the rapidity of his conquests, makes him not unlike him.—See Polybius. apud Athen. b. x. c. 11.; and Casaub. in Athen.

^g The author of Judith's history has thus described it:—"Holofernes mustered the chosen men for the battle, as his lord commanded him, unto an hundred and twenty thousand, and twelve thousand archers on horseback. A great multitude of sundry countries went with them like locusts, and like the sand of the earth; for the multitude was without number" (Judith ii. 15, 20).

^h Our modern travellers to the Holy Land do almost unanimously agree, that Bethulia is situate in the tribe of Zebulun, about a league from Thiberias towards the west, where they pretend that some marks of Holofernes's camp are still to be seen; but some great men are apt to suspect the report of these travel-

tribe of Simeon, and by cutting off its waters, reduced it to such extremity, that, through the people's impotency, Ozias the governor had promised to surrender the place unless it was relieved in five days: that Judith, a widow lady of an ample fortune, but ^a of great virtue and piety withal, sent for the governor and principal men of the city, to let them know that God, by her hand, would find out an expedient to deliver them; but in what manner this was to be effected, she desired them not to inquire: that, having addressed herself to God by prayer for success, and being not insensible of her own beauty, for she was extremely handsome as well as virtuous, she adorned herself in all her rich attire, and attended only with one maid, ^b left Bethulia, and went directly to the Assyrian camp: that, being stopped by the outguard, and carried before the general, he received her with all the civility and respect that her appearance seemed to demand; and, having understood that the design of her leaving her countrymen was, both to escape the destruction which she foresaw was coming upon them, and to inform him in what situation their affairs were, and how he might become master of the place without the loss of one man, he not only promised her his protection, but appointed her and her maid an apartment proper for them; for he was already enamoured with her wit and beauty: that, having thus far succeeded very prosperously, she requested of him, that, as she was a strict observer of the religion of her country, she might be permitted to eat separately ^c such provisions as she had brought with her; and, without any molestation to have leave to go out of the camp at night, or before it was day, in order ^d to perform her devotions; which accordingly was readily granted her: that having lived in this manner for three days, on the fourth, Holofernes invited her to a splendid entertainment, where she appeared in her choicest ornaments of dress; and the general, in hopes of enjoying the beautiful stranger that night, gave a loose to mirth, and drank more plentifully than ever he was known to do: that, in the evening, all the company being dismissed, except Judith, who was left alone with the general intoxicated with liquor, and now fallen fast asleep upon the bed, she thought this a proper opportunity to put her design in execution; and therefore, approaching the place where he lay, and taking down his scimitar, which hung by him, she first prayed to God to strengthen her in the enterprise, and then, at two strokes, severed his head from his body, which she gave to her maid, who, by her order was waiting ^e at her tent door, to put it in the bag wherein her provisions were brought: that, having thus accomplished their design, they passed through the camp unobserved, and made the best of their way to Bethulia, where Judith, acquainting the governor and elders of the city with what she had done, and in testimony thereof, producing the head of Holofernes, advised them to hang it out upon the walls as soon as the morning appeared, and then every one to arm, and sally out of the gates as if they meant to attack the enemy, but, in reality, only to give them an alarm, that thereupon they might have recourse to their general, as she supposed they would, and so come to know what fate had befallen him: that, upon the Bethulians appearing in arms, the outguards gave notice to their officers, and the officers sent to their general; but when they understood that their general was dead, his head gone, and nothing left behind but a senseless trunk wallowing in blood, such a general consternation overspread the camp, that, instead of preparing themselves to fight, the Assyrians threw away their arms, and fled: while the Bethulians, and other neighbouring people, to whom Ozias had sent intelligence of this their disaster, attacked them in small parties, from several quarters; and having slain a considerable number of them, greatly enriched ^f themselves with their spoils:

lers, who are too much accustomed to take up with the traditions of the country, though there is not always the greatest certainty in them. This, however, is incontestible, that both Judith and her husband were of the tribe of Simeon, (Judith viii. 1, and ix. 2,) and for what purpose they should remove to so great a distance from their own inheritance, and settle in a different tribe, we cannot see. Since, therefore, the Scripture takes notice of a place in the tribes of Simeon named Bethuel, (Joshua xix. 4,) a place dependant on Gaza of the Philistines, and famous for its temples, which were very remarkable, both for their antiquity and fine structure, from whence not unlikely it had its name of Bethel, or the house of the Lord, there is much more reason to conclude, that this was the place; since the other, which travellers talk of in the tribe of Zebulun, must be of too modern a date to be the city intended here, because we find neither Joshua, nor Josephus, nor Eusebius, nor St Jerome making any mention of it.—Calmet's Dissertation and Commentary on the Book of Judith.

^a The character which the historian gives her with respect to this is,—"That there was none who gave her an ill word, for she feared the Lord greatly," (Judith viii. 8,) which is certainly an high commendation, considering how tender and delicate a thing the reputation of a young and beautiful widow is.

^b The word, in ancient translations, is Abrā, which signifies a companion, or maid of honour, such as ladies of the first condition had, rather than a servant; for the same word in the Septuagint is applied to the women that attended both Pharaoh's daughter, (Exod. xi. 5,) and Queen Esther, (chap. iv. 4.)

^c There was no law of God that prohibited the Jews from eating several things that the Gentiles made use of. Bread, wine, and fruits were allowed them with other people; but, either some tradition then prevailing among the Jews, or some religious vow that Judith might have bound herself under, the fear of giving scandal to her countrymen when she returned, or the prayers and pagan invocations which were made over the meat that was served up to Holofernes; some of these reasons, I say, very likely hindered her from accepting the offer which the general made, of provisions from his table, and inclined her to desire to eat alone; a restraint which we find Daniel putting himself under in the court of Nebuchadnezzar, (chap. i. 8,) and Tobit, in that of Salmanassar, (chap. i. 10, &c.) where he says of himself, that "when all my brethren, and those that were of my kindred did eat of the bread of the Gentiles, I kept myself from eating, because I remembered God with all my heart."—Calmet's Commentary.

^d As prayer, no doubt, is best performed in places of retirement, and the hurry of a camp must needs be inconvenient for religious offices, Judith, who professed herself a woman of strict piety, had a good pretence to request of the general a liberty to retire out of the camp, when she thought proper, and without any questions asked her, to perform her devotions, which she foresaw would be a means to favour her escape, after she had executed the design she came about. For it was on this precaution, rather than any obligation, either from the law or from custom, that this devotion of her praying without the camp was founded.—Calmet's Commentary.

^e Namely, to go along with her out of the camp to prayers, as she had done the nights before; for it does not appear, from the whole history, that Judith had communicated her design to her woman, but rather that she took upon herself the risk of the whole affair, which could not be conducted with too much secrecy and prudence.—Calmet's Commentary.

^f So great was the number of these, that the text tells us, the Bethulians were thirty days in gathering them, (ch. xv. 11.) For considering the largeness of the camp of the Assyrians, and the several detachments they might have, some of the mounthat a deputation of the elders from Jerusalem with their chief priests accompanying them, came to Bethulia to compliment Judith upon this her great achievement, with whom she repaired to the temple at Jerusalem; where public thanks were given, and burnt sacrifices offered to God, for this signal victory, and Judith's oblation,^a upon this occasion was the plunder of Holofernes's tent, with all his rich equipage, which the soldiers had presented her with; and, lastly, that after these public rejoicings,^b she went back to Bethulia again, where she lived in great splendour and renown, and, after a good old age, died, and was buried with her husband Manasseh, much beloved, and much lamented by the people. But to look back to the affairs of Judea.

In the seventh year of his reign, Zedekiah, being grown impatient of the Babylonish yoke, had sent his ambassadors, and made a confederacy with Pharaoh Hophra king of Egypt; which when Nebuchadnezzar understood, he drew together a great army out of all the nations that were under his dominion, and, in a short time, marched towards Judea, to punish him for his perfidy and rebellion. His victorious army soon overran the country, and having taken most of the cities, in the ninth year of Zedekiah's reign, the tenth month of the year, and the tenth day of the month, it came before Jerusalem, and blocked it close up on every side; so that, in a short time, the famine began to prevail: and in memory of this, the Jews have ever since observed the tenth day of Tebeth, (the month when this happened,) as a day of solemn fasting and humiliation even to this time.

On that very day of the month when the siege of Jerusalem began, Ezekiel, then a captive in Chaldea, had it revealed to him by the type of a boiling pot, what a dismal destruction should be brought upon that city; and, in the beginning of the next year, Jeremiah was ordered to declare to the king, that the Babylonians who were then besieging the town, would certainly take it, and burn it with fire, make him prisoner, and carry him to Babylon, where he should die: which provoked Zedekiah to such a degree that he ordered him to be elapped up close in prison.

As Nebuchadnezzar's army was approaching Jerusalem, Zedekiah, and his people, in dread of what might follow, made a show of returning unto the Lord their God. They entered into a solemn covenant thenceforward to serve him only, and to obey his laws; and in pursuance of that, agreed to proclaim a manumission, or liberty to all Hebrew servants of either sex, according to what the law^c enjoined; but upon the coming of Hophra king of Egypt, to the relief of Jerusalem, and Nebuchadnezzar's raising the siege to meet him, and give him battle, the Jews were generally of opinion, that the Chaldeans were gone for good and all, and thereupon repented of their covenant of reformation, and caused every man his servant, and every man his hand-maid, to return to their servitude. Which base and impious peravication so provoked God, that he ordered his prophet to proclaim liberty to the sword, and to the famine, and to the pestilence, to execute his wrath upon them, and their king, and their princes, and all Judah and Jerusalem, to their utter destruction.

Jeremiah, indeed, in all the answers which he returned the king, (who, upon the departure of the Chaldeans, sent frequently to consult him,) was always positive, that the Egyptians, whom he depended upon, would certainly deceive him; that their army would return without giving him any assistance; and that the Chaldeans would thereupon renew the siege, take the city, and burn it with fire. During their absence, however, he thought it no improper time to endeavour to avoid the approaching siege, by retiring to Anathoth, his native place; but as he was passing the gate of the city which led that way, the captain of the guard seized him as a deserter, and brought him back to Jerusalem, where he was confined in prison. ^a Nothing is more common, both in sacred and profane history, than to meet with several kinds of spoils taken in war, dedicated to God, in acknowledgment of his goodness, and in memory of the victory, which, by his blessing and assistance, was then obtained.—Calmel's Commentary.

^b The joy which the people of Jerusalem expressed upon Judith's entry, is thus related: "Then all the women of Israel ran together to see her, and blessed her, and made a dance among them for her; and she took branches in her hand, and gave also to the women that were with her, and put a garland of olive upon her, and on her maid that was with her, and she went before all the people in the dance leading the women, and all the men of Israel followed with garland, and with songs in their mouths.—Judith xv. 12, 13.

him back to Jerusalem, where he was confined in prison.

^c The words of the law are these:—"If thy brother, an Hebrew man, or an Hebrew woman, be sold unto thee, and serve thee six years, then, in the seventh year, thou shalt let him go free from thee; and when thou sendest him out free from thee, thou shalt not let him go away empty; thou shalt furnish him liberally out of thy flock, and out of thy floor, and out of thy wine-press: of that wherewith the Lord hath blessed thee thou shalt give unto him: and thou shalt remember, that thou wast a bondman in the land of Egypt, and the Lord thy God redeemed thee.—It shall not seem hard unto thee, when thou sendest him away from thee; for he hath been worth a double hired servant to thee, in serving thee six years, and the Lord thy God shall bless thee in all that thou doest." (Deut. xv. 12, &c.) Now, for the better understanding of this, we must observe that there were two periods of time, wherein this release of Jewish bond-slaves was enjoined, the year of jubilee, which was every fiftieth year, and the sabbatical year, which was every seventh year. The sabbatical year is what is here intended: it now happened in the eighth year of Zedekiah's reign; but, as Prideaux in his preface remarks, had not been observed for above 360 years before; for which reason the Jews, being now in a state of compunction, were for restoring it to its primitive institution: but upon the removal of their fears, by the withdrawing of Nebuchadnezzar's forces, they repented of their good intentions, and recalled their servants to their slavery again. Why the observation of such a year in seven was enjoined, the reasons are pretty obvious: for besides the commemoration of the Israelites' release from the Egyptian bondage, which the text specifies the general release of servants, and the restoration of lands and tenements to their first owners, which were then to be transacted, were to hinder the rich from oppressing the needy, and reducing them to perpetual slavery; that debts should not be too much multiplied, nor the poor, consequently, entirely ruined; but that a liberty of people's persons, an equality of their fortunes, and the order and distinction of their tribes and families (as far as it was possible) might be preserved; and as it was something like this that Lycurgus established among the Lacedemonians, in his instituting an equality among persons, banishing slavery, and preventing, as far as he could, any one's becoming too powerful, or too rich.—Belford's Scripture Chronology, b. iv. c. 4. and Calmel's Dictionary, under the word Sabbath.

him before the princes, who, in much rage, fell upon him, and beat him, and then committed him to the common jail, where he continued for many days.

In the mean time, the Egyptians not daring to engage the Chaldean army, retired before them into their own country, leaving Zedekiah and his people, with their unequal strength, to contend with Nebuchadnezzar, who now returned more exasperated than ever, to re-invest the city of Jerusalem. Nor had he been long before it, ere the king sent messengers to Jeremiah to inquire of him, then in prison, concerning the fate of the present war: but his constant answer was, "That God being highly provoked against him and his people, for their manifold iniquities, would fight against the city, and smite it; that both king and people should be delivered into the hands of the king of Babylon; that those who continued in the city during the siege, should perish by the pestilence, by the famine, and by the sword; but that those who endeavoured to escape, though they fell into the hands of the Chaldeans, would have their lives preserved:" at which several of the princes, and chief commanders, being very much offended, pressed the king against him, as one who, by his speeches, discouraged the soldiers and people, and was enough indeed to occasion a defection.

In this conjuncture of affairs, the king was obliged to deliver him into their hands; and they, with unrelenting cruelty, cast him into a nasty dungeon, ^a where inevitably he must have perished, had not Ebed-Melech, ^b one of the king's eunuchs, interceded with his master to have him released from thence, and sent him back to his former prison; for which favour the prophet assured him from God that he should not perish at the sacking of the city.

As the city began to be pressed more by the siege, the king desired a private conference with Jeremiah, who accordingly was sent for to an apartment of the temple; but the prophet could give no other answer to his questions, than what he had done before; only he advised him to surrender to the enemy, as the best expedient to save both himself and the city. The king, though urged by the prophet, could by no means bring himself to think of that. At his breaking off the discourse, however, he obliged him to secrecy, though he did not forget to remand him to prison: and this is the last interview that the prophet had with the king.

In the mean time, the siege began to draw toward a conclusion. The people within the walls, through the scarcity of provisions, were reduced to the last necessity, even ^c to feed on one another; and those without had

^a Some think, that when he was in this dismal place, he made those mournful meditations, which are set down in the third chapter of the Lamentations: 'They have cut off my life in the dungeon, and cast a stone upon me.—I called upon thy name, O Lord, out of the low dungeon, and thou hast heard my voice,' &c. ver. 53, 55, 56.—Louth's Commentary on Jer. xxxviii.

^b This charitable intercessor for the prophet in his distress, is, in the text, said to have been an Ethiopian; accordingly Huetius (in his Treatise on the voyaging of Solomon, c. 7.) observes from Josephus, that Solomon in his voyage to Tarshish, (1 Kings x. 22) amongst other merchandise, brought slaves from Ethiopia, which was likewise the practice of the Greeks and Romans in after ages, as he there proves by several testimonies; and such an one he supposes this Ebed-melech to have been originally, though afterwards he was promoted to be an eunuch, or chief officer of the king's house.—Louth's Commentary on Jer. xxxviii.

now finished their works, and provided all things for a general assault; when in the eleventh year of king Zedekiah, and on the ninth day of the fourth month of that year, the city was taken by storm, about midnight, and every place filled with blood and slaughter. Through the favour of the night, Zedekiah and his friends ^c endeavoured to make their escape towards the wilderness; but he had not gone far, before he was taken, and carried to Nebuchadnezzar, who was then at Riblah, ^d where, after some severe reproaches, ^e he first caused his sons and the princes of Judah taken with him, to be slain before his face, and then commanded his eyes ^f to be put out

^c It is a hard matter to conceive how the besieged could make their escape, seeing that the Chaldeans had begun the city round about. Josephus indeed gives us this account:—"That as the city was taken about midnight, the captains with the rest of the soldiers, went directly into the temple; which king Zedekiah perceiving, he took his wives, children, commanders, and friends, and they slipt all away together, by a narrow passage towards the wilderness. But then what this narrow passage was is still the question. The Jews indeed think that there was a subterraneous passage from the palace to the plains of Jericho, and that the king, and his courtiers might endeavour to make their escape that way. Dion, it is true, tells us (b. lxxvi.) that in the last siege of Jerusalem, the Jews had covert ways, which went under the walls of the city, to a considerable distance into the country, out of which they were wont to sally, and fall upon the Romans that were straggling from their camp: but since neither Josephus, nor the sacred historian, takes notice of any such subterraneous conduit at this siege, we may suppose that the Chaldeans having made a breach in the wall, the besieged got away privately between the wall and the out-works, in a passage which the enemy did not suspect. The words in the second book of Kings are:—"They went by the way of the gate, between the two walls, which is by the king's garden," (chap. xxv. 4.) which in Jeremiah are thus expressed:—"They went by the way of the king's garden, by the gate between the two walls;" so that, as the king's garden faced the country, very likely there was some very private and imperceptible gate, through which they might attempt to escape, and the besiegers perhaps might not keep so strict a watch at that part of the town, especially in the hurry of storming it, because it led to the plain, and made their escape in a manner impracticable.—Jewish History, b. x. c. 11; Patrick's, Le Clerc's, and Calmet's Commentaries.

^d Riblah was a city of Syria, in the country of Hamath, which country is the nearest to Judea, and which city, according to St Jerome, was the same with that which was afterwards called Antioch; and as it was the most pleasant place in all Syria, here Nebuchadnezzar lay, to attend the success of the siege of Jerusalem, to send his army proper supplies, and to intercept any relief that might come to the besieged.—Patrick's Commentary.

^e Nebuchadnezzar no sooner cast his eye upon him, says Josephus, (Jewish Antiquities, b. x. c. 11.) than he called him all the faithless and perfidious names that he could think of. "Did you not promise to manage the power and authority that I put you in possession of for my advantage and behoof? And am not I well requited, do you think, for making you a king in your brother Jehoiakim's place, by your employing of the credit and interest that I gave you, to the ruin of your patron and benefactor? But that God is great and just, who for the punishment of your treachery and ingratitude, hath now made you my prisoner." But there is a mistake in this speech of Nebuchadnezzar's, namely his making Zedekiah succeed his brother Jehoiakim whereas he was put in the place of his nephew Jehoiachin; but his nephew's reign was so very short, little more than three months, that this imperious monarch might look upon it as nothing at all.

^f Josephus takes notice, that the seeming contradiction in the prophecies of Ezekiel and Jeremiah, concerning the fate of Zedekiah, made that prince give no heed to what was foretold. Ezekiel's prophecy is delivered in these words:—"I will bring him to Babylon, to the land of the Chaldeans, yet he shall not see it, though he die there," (chap. xii. 13.) and Jeremiah's in these:—"He shall be delivered into the hands of the king of Babylon, and shall speak with him mouth to mouth, and his eyes shall behold his eyes," (chap. xxxii. 4.) both of which were literally and himself to be bound in fetters of brass, to be sent to Babylon, and put in prison for life, to the full accomplishment of ^a what the two prophets, Jeremiah and Ezekiel, had foretold concerning him.

As soon as Nebuchadnezzar had advice of the taking of Jerusalem, he sent Nebuzaradan, the captain of his guards, with orders to raze the place, plunder the temple, and carry the people that were left captives to Babylon; which he failed not to execute with the utmost rigour and cruelty. For having taken all the vessels out of the house of the Lord, and gathered together all the riches that he could find, either in the king's palace, or in any great men's houses, he ^b set both the temple and city on fire, and overthrew all the walls, fortresses, and towers thereunto belonging, until he had brought the whole to a perfect desolation: and upon these two sad occasions, namely, the taking of the city, and the destruction of the temple, the prophet Jeremiah composed a mournful poem, which is called his Lamentations, ^c and the Jews accomplished; for Zedekiah was carried to Riblah, where he saw the king of Babylon, and spake to him, and beheld his children executed; but had afterwards his eyes put out, and was then carried to Babylon, where he was incapable of seeing the city, because he had lost his eyesight.—Jewish Antiquities b. x. c. 11; Cabnet's and Patrick's Commentaries.

^a The reflection which Josephus makes upon this occasion is very good and moral:—"This may serve to convince even the ignorant," says he, "of the power and wisdom of God, and of the constancy of his counsels, through all the various ways of his operations. It may likewise show us, that God's foreknowledge of things is certain, and his providence regular in ordering of events; besides that, it holds forth a most exemplary instance of the danger of our giving way to the motions of sin and infidelity, which deprive us of the means of discerning God's judgments, which are ready to fall upon us.—Jewish Antiquities, b. x. c. 11.

^b The temple was burned, from the time that it was built, 400 years, says Sir John Marsham; 424 years 3 months and 8 days, says Primate Usher; 430 years, says Abarbanel, and other learned Jews: but Josephus computes the thing still higher; for he tells us, that the temple was burned 470 years 6 months and 10 days, from the building of it: 1060 years 6 months and 10 days from the Israelites' coming out of the land of Egypt: 1950 years 6 months and 10 days, from the deluge; and 3530 years 6 months and 10 days from the creation of the world. Josephus stands amazed, that the second temple should be burned by the Romans in the same month, and on the very same day of the month, that this was set on fire by the Chaldeans, and as some of the Jewish doctors say, when the Levites were singing the same psalm in both destructions, namely, xciv. 23, 'He shall bring upon them their own iniquity, and he shall cut them off in their own wickedness; yea, the Lord our God shall cut them off.'—Patrick's Commentary, and Jewish Antiquities, b. x. c. 11.

^c The Lamentations of Jeremiah, for the title is properly and significantly plural, consist of a number of plaintive effusions, composed upon the plan of the funeral dirges, all upon the same subject, and uttered without connexion as they rose in the mind, in a long course of separate stanzas. These have afterwards been put together, and formed into a collection or correspondent whole. If any reader, however, should expect to find in them an artificial and methodical arrangement of the general subject, a regular disposition of the parts, a perfect connexion and orderly succession in the matter, and, with all this, an uninterrupted series of elegance and correctness, he will really expect what was foreign to the prophet's design. In the character of a mourner, he celebrates in plaintive strains the obsequies of his ruined country: whatever presented itself to his mind in the midst of desolation and misery, whatever struck him as particularly wretched and calamitous, whatever the instant sentiment of sorrow dictated, he pours forth in a kind of spontaneous effusion. He frequently pauses, and as it were ruminates upon the same object; frequently varies and illustrates the same thought with different imagery, and a different choice of language: so that the whole bears rather the appearance of an accumulation of corresponding sentiments, than an accurate and connected series of different ideas arranged in the form of a regular treatise. I would not be understood to insinuate, that the author has paid no regard whatever to order or arrangement; or that transitions truly elegant from one subject, image, or character, to another, are not sometimes to be found; this only I wished to remark, that the nature and design of this poem (being in reality a collection of different sentiments or subjects, each of which assumes the form of a funeral dirge) neither require, nor even admit of a methodical arrangement. The whole poem, however, may be divided into five parts: in the first, second, and fourth, the prophet addresses the people in his own person, or else personifies Jerusalem, and introduces that city as a character: the third part is supposed to be uttered by the chorus of Jews, represented by their leader, after the manner of the Greek tragedies; and in the fifth, the whole nation of the Jews, on being led into captivity, pour forth their united complaints to Almighty God. This last, as well as the others, is divided into twenty-two periods, according to the number of the letters of the alphabet; with this difference, that in the four other parts the initial letters of each period, exactly correspond with the alphabetical order. And from this circumstance we have been enabled to form some little judgment concerning the Hebrew metres. The acrostic or alphabetical poetry of the Hebrews was certainly intended to assist the memory, and was confined altogether to those compositions which consisted of detached maxims or sentiments without any express order or connexion. The same custom is said to have been prevalent, indeed is said still to prevail in some degree among the Syrians, the Persians, and the Arabs. With how much propriety the prophet has employed this form of composition on the present occasion, is evident from what has been said concerning the nature of this poem. The manner and order of this kind of verse is as follows:—Each of the five parts, or grand divisions, is subdivided into twenty-two periods or stanzas; these periods in the three first parts are all of them triplets, in other words, consist each of three lines only; in each of the two former parts there is one period, consisting of four lines. In the four first parts, the initial letter of each period follows the order of the alphabet; but the third part is so very regular, that every line in the same period begins with the same letter, so as necessarily to ascertain the length of every verse or line in that poem; indeed, even in the others, though the lines are not distinctly marked in this manner, it is no difficult matter to ascertain their limits, by resolving the sentences into their constituent members. By this mode of computation it appears, that in the fourth part all the periods consist of distichs, as also in the fifth, which is not acrostic: but in this last part I must remark another peculiarity, namely, that the lines are extremely short, whereas in all the rest they are long. The length of these metres is worthy of notice: we find in this poem lines or verses, which are evidently longer, by almost one half, than those which occur usually and on other occasions. The length of them seems to be, on an average, about twelve syllables; there are a few which do not quite amount to that number, and there are a few which perhaps exceed it by two or three syllables: for, although nothing certain can be determined concerning the number of syllables, in truth I pay no attention to the fictitious of the Mazorites, there is room, nevertheless, for very probable conjecture. We are not to suppose this peculiar form of versification utterly without design or importance; on the contrary, I am persuaded that the prophet adopted this kind of metre as being more diffuse, more copious, more tender, in all respects better adapted to melancholy subjects. I must add, that in all probability the funeral dirges, which were sung by the mourners, were commonly composed in this kind of verse; for whenever, in the prophets, any funeral lamentations occur, or any passages are formed upon that plan, the versification is, if I am not mistaken, of this protracted kind. If this then be the case, we have discovered a true legitimate form of elegy in the poetry of the Hebrews. It ought, however, to be remarked, that the same kind of metre is sometimes, though rarely, employed upon other occasions by the sacred poets, as it was indeed by the Greeks and Romans. There are, moreover, some poems manifestly of the elegiac kind, which are composed in the usual metre, and not in unconnected stanzas, according to the form of a funeral dirge. Thus far in general as to the nature and method of the poem,

Having thus destroyed the city and temple, Nebuzaradan made all the people that he found in the place captives. Some of the chief of these, such as Seraiah the high priest, Zedekiah ^a the second priest, and about seventy others, he carried to Riblah, where Nebuchadnezzar ^b caused them all to be put to death. The poorer and labouring part of the people, such as could till the ground, and dress the vineyards, he left behind him, and made Gedaliah ^c their governor; but as for all the rest, he carried them directly away to Babylon; only Jeremiah, of whom Nebuchadnezzar had given him charge to take particular care, he not only took out of prison when he first came to Jerusalem, but as the rest were upon their departure, gave him his option, whether he would go with him to Babylon, where he should be maintained very plentifully at the king's charge, or else remain in the country; and when the prophet had chosen the latter, he dismissed him honourably, with a handsome present, and with letters of recommendation to the governor Gedaliah, wherein he gave him a strict charge to take particular care of him.

and the form of the versification;—it remains to offer a few remarks concerning the subject and the style.

That the subject of the Lamentations is the destruction of the holy city and temple, the overthrow of the state, the extermination of the people—and that these events are described as actually accomplished, and not in the style of prediction merely—must be evident to every reader; though some authors of considerable reputation have imagined this poem to have been composed on the death of king Josiah. The prophet, indeed, has so copiously, so tenderly, and poetically, bewailed the misfortunes of his country, that he seems completely to have fulfilled the office and duty of a mourner. In my opinion there is not extant any poem which displays such a happy and splendid selection of imagery in so concentrated a state. What can be more elegant and poetical than the description of that once flourishing city, lately chief among the nations, sitting in the character of a female, solitary, afflicted, in a state of widowhood, deserted by her friends, betrayed by her dearest connexions, imploring relief, and seeking consolation in vain? What a beautiful personification is that of 'the Ways of Sion mourning, because none are come to her solemn feast!' How tender and pathetic are the following complaints!

"Is this nothing to all you who pass along the way? Behold and see, If there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow, which is inflicted on me; Which Jehovah inflicted on me in the day of the violence of his wrath. For these things I weep, my eyes stream with water; Because the comforter is far away, that should tranquilize my soul; My children are desolate, because the enemy was strong."

But to detail its beauties would be to transcribe the entire poem. I shall make but one remark relative to certain passages, and to the former part of the second alphabet in particular. If, in this passage the prophet should be thought by some to affect a style too bold and energetic for the expression of sorrow, let them only advert to the greatness of the subject, its importance, sanctity, and solemnity; and let them consider, that the nature of the performance absolutely required these to be set forth in a style suitable, in some degree at least, to their inherent dignity:—let them attentively consider these things, and I have not a doubt but they will readily excuse the sublimity of the prophet.—Louth on Hebrew Poetry.—ED.

^a The Jews call their second priest their Sagan, whose business it was to supply the function of the high priest, in case he was sick, or any other incapacity attended him. We find no such particular institution under the law; but Eleazar, the son of Aaron, who is styled 'the chief over the chief of the Levites, and who had the oversight of them who kept the charge of the sanctuary,' (Num. iii. 32.) and whose authority was not much inferior to that of the high priest, may, not improperly, be deemed one of that order.—Calmet's Commentary.

^c Gedaliah, we understand, was the son of Ahikam, Jeremiah's great friend; and it is not unlikely, that, by the prophet's advice, who exhorted all, both king and people, to surrender themselves to the Assyrians, (Jer. xxxviii. 5, 17,) he made his escape from the city, and went over to the king of Babylon and for this reason was promoted to the government of Judea.—Calmet's and Patrick's Commentaries.

WE, who have not received the book of Judith in our canon of Scripture, are not under the like necessity of vindicating its divine inspiration and authority, as are they who, by a public act of council, have thought proper to admit it; but still we see no reason why we should recede from the opinion of the ancients, merely because some modern commentators, who, by the same freak of fancy, might have turned the plainest narrative in Scripture into an allegory, have adventured to call it a parable. Mysteries indeed may be made of any thing, and, in a pregnant brain, fit allusions will never be wanting, when once a full scope is given to the imagination, and a writer is permitted to invent what he pleases: but it would be madness to give up the truth of historical facts merely because the man has ingenuity enough to apply them to a feigned purpose, especially when upon examination we find that there are sufficient proofs and testimonies of their reality, and no insuperable objections to the contrary.

Let us suppose, then, that the events contained in this history happened before the Babylonish captivity, and in the reign of Manasseh king of Judah; that Nabuchodonosor in Judith was the same with Saosduchius in Ptolemy, who reigned over the Assyrians and Chaldeans, having subdued Esarhaddon king of Assyria; that Arphaxad is the same with Phraortes, mentioned in Herodotus, and that these two kings waged war with each other; that Saosduchius having overcome Arphaxad, resolved to reduce all the nations spoken of in Judith, under his dominion, and to that purpose, sent Holofernes at the head of his forces to subdue those countries that would not submit; that at this time Manasseh, who had been a little before delivered from the captivity in which he had been carried to Babylon, dwelt at Jerusalem, concerning himself but little with the government, and leaving the care of public affairs to Joakim the high priest; that the inhabitants of Bethulia resolved by God's assistance, to preserve their religion and liberties, and accordingly shut their gates against Holofernes; and that Judith, a woman of great courage and conduct, seeing the extremity to which the city was reduced, undertook to destroy Holofernes, and, in her attempt, succeeded. Supposing all this, I say, and this is the substance of the whole, where do we find any thing contrary to the rules either of history or chronology?

The war, we suppose, commenced between Nabuchodonosor and Arphaxad, in the year of the world 3347; the expedition and death of Holofernes were both in the next year, 3348, Manasseh was taken and carried to Babylon 3349, he returned some years after, and died 3361: so that here we find a proper space for the things related in this history to be transacted; and that they were really thus transacted we have the concurring testimony both of the Jewish and Christian church, who, though they deny the book a place in the number of their sacred and divine writings, yet did always esteem it one of their apocryphal pieces, and a true and uncontested history, well contrived for the edification of the vulgar, though not of authority enough to determine any controversy in matters of religion.

It is some confirmation of its genuineness, however, that, in writings which are of undoubted authority, we meet with some citations out of it; and therefore, when we find St Luke, in Elizabeth's salutation of the Virgin Mary, using these words, —³ 'Blessed art thou among women,' which are manifestly taken from the compliment which Ozias makes Judith, ⁴ 'Blessed art thou of the most high God, above all the women upon earth;' and St Paul in his exhortation to the Corinthians, using these, —⁵ 'Neither murmur ye, as some of them also murmured, and were destroyed of the destroyer,' which he certainly borrows from the tenth chapter of Judith, according to the Greek interpretation; we cannot forbear concluding, that, in the apostolic age, this book was looked upon as a piece of true and uncontroverted history.

Difficulties, indeed, there will occur in relation to names, dates, and other particulars, almost in all histories, and especially in the Oriental, ⁶ when we shall find, not only in writers of different characters, the Greek and Hebrew, the sacred and profane, but even in writers of the same nation, the same person under different appellations. Though, therefore, in strictness of speech, it may be accounted an error in history, to call the king of Nineveh by the name of Nabuchodonosor; yet, as it was the style and manner of the Jews to denote any prince who lived beyond the Euphrates by that name, we need not wonder that we find an author, who lived in an age when the fame and reputation of Nabuchodonosor the Great had quite eclipsed the name of all his predecessors, calling another prince, who lived at a far distance, that is, Saoduchinus the king of Assyria, by the name of the king of Babylon, which perhaps at that time might be the standing name of every great and distant monarch.

Nor is there any great trespass against the truth of history ⁷ in this author's asserting that Arphaxad built the walls, the towers, and the gates of Ecbatan; since by Arphaxad he does not mean the Dejoces in Herodotus, but his son Phraortes, who succeeded him in the kingdom of Media: for that he must mean so, is plain, because he gives us to understand, that this Arphaxad was defeated, and ⁸ himself slain by the Assyrian archers, which even Herodotus ⁹ himself makes to be the fate, not of Dejoces the father, but of his son Phraortes, who, having subdued the Persians, as he tells us, and made himself master of almost all Asia, was not content therewith, but coming at last to attack Nineveh and the Assyrian empire, was overcome, and killed in the bold attempt.

His father indeed might lay the foundation of Ecbatan, and during his lifetime, carry on the building; but a work of this kind is not so soon effected, but that he might leave the completion of it to his son, who being a prince of a warlike spirit, and having many forces under his command, is therefore, in the book of Judith, not improperly said to have made the gates of this royal city ¹⁰ 'in height seventy cubits, and in breadth forty cubits, for the going forth of his mighty armies, and for the setting in array of his footmen.'

Whoever looks into the order and succession of the Jewish high priests, as we have them delivered to us in the first book of Chronicles, ¹¹ in the books of Ezra, ¹² Nehemiah, ¹³ and in the history of Josephus, ¹⁴ will find them so intricate and perplexed, so many omissions and mislocations, such a diversity of names and numbers, and such seeming contrariety in the several accounts, as will cost him no small pains to reduce them to any tolerable regularity. The reason is, because the Scripture nowhere professes to give an exact catalogue of all such as had been admitted to that office and dignity until the captivity.

That in the book of Chronicles seems to bid fairest for it: but, upon examination, it will appear ¹⁵ to be only a direct lineal descent of the pontifical family, from Aaron to Josedech the son of Seraiiah, who was high priest at the captivity; and not a succession of such as had borne the pontifical office, because several in that pedigree are inserted that were never high priests, ¹⁶ and several are omitted that were. The pedigrees of the high priests in Ezra and Nehemiah are but imperfect parts of that which we have in the book of Chronicles; and as for the catalogue of Josephus, it is so corrupted, that scarce five of the names in it do agree with any thing that we have in Scripture: so that, considering the defect of these accounts, we may be allowed to infer, that Joakim or Eliakim, (for they are names both of the same import,) might have been high priest in the time of Manasseh; even though we should suppose there was no mention made of him as such, either in the Holy Scriptures, or in the history of Josephus.

a The high priests of the family of Eli are instances of the latter; for they are left out of that pedigree, though they were high priests; and those of the true race who were excluded by them, are instances of the former; for they are in it, though they were never high priests: and it is very likely that, from the time of Solomon to the captivity, many more such instances might have happened, to hinder that pedigree from being an exact catalogue of the high priests.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 655.

strengthen with a girdle,⁷ that is, to invest with the pontifical habit and office; and therefore, his 'being a father to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and to the house of Judah, and his having the key of the house of David laid upon his shoulder; so, he should open, and none should shut, and he should shut and none should open,' does very well agree with the part which Joakim is said to have acted in the book of Judith. For though the supreme power was doubtless in Manasseh, yet, since his return from the captivity, having either sequestered himself from public business, or¹ being engaged in the defence of his country in some other place, he might intrust the management of his affairs in Jerusalem to the high priest, who, having such an amplitude of power, and acting as chief minister in that place, might be well enough mentioned in this transaction of Judith,² and in the deputation of the elders from Jerusalem to thank her for it, without naming his master at all.

What the manners and customs of the Persians were we may in some measure learn from the Greek historians, who, upon the dissolution of that monarchy by the conquest of Alexander, were obliged to say something of a people whom they succeeded in the dominion of the east; but, as these historians did not write till after the kingdom of Persia was destroyed, they have taken little or no notice of other Oriental nations; and therefore what affinity there might be in their manners and usages, we cannot tell; and³ consequently must not blame the author of the book of Judith, for making Holofernes act out of character, as we think, unless we know how far the customs of the Assyrians and Persians did conform or disagree.

Herein, however, we know, that all Oriental nations were unanimous, namely, in affecting pomp and grandeur; and therefore (whether it was a Persian custom or no) we need not wonder, that we find Holofernes, the captain-general of the Assyrian army, ⁴ 'resting upon his bed, under a canopy, which was woven with purple, and gold, and emeralds, and precious stones;'⁵ and when Judith was introduced, 'coming out before his tent, ^a with silver lamps going before him.' We need not wonder at the rapidity of his conquest, since, doubtless, he had several lieutenant-generals under him, who, with strong detachments from the grand army, might, in separate bodies, invade all the provinces which the historian mentions; and, since he nowhere met with any opposition until he came into Palestine, but expected a great deal in Egypt, he thought it advisable to halt, for some time, in the neighbourhood of Bethulia, and to put his men into quarters of refreshment, until the forces which he had detached upon sundry expeditions were come up, and had joined him. And for this reason he was not so eager to press the siege of Bethulia, that he might not harass and fatigue his men in fighting against rocks and inaccessible mountains, but preserve them fresh and unfoiled, for their great and more important expedition against Egypt.

The truth is, the king of Nineveh was resolved not only to subdue the several nations from the Euphrates to Ethiopia, but intended likewise to oblige them all to⁵ adore and acknowledge him only to be god;⁶ and therefore the Bethulians, who could not, without impiety, and a renunciation of their religion, submit to the dominion of such a king, had reason to promise themselves the assistance of God, in the prosecution of this war; and Judith, who found herself under a divine and irresistible impulse to go upon so adventurous an exploit, had good reason to hope for success against a prince, who had declared himself an enemy to the God of heaven, and an usurper of that honour and adoration which belonged to him alone.

^b 'If thy brother, the son of thy mother, or thy son, or thy daughter, or the wife of thy bosom, or thy friend, which is as thine own soul, entice thee secretly, saying, let us serve other gods which thou hast not known, thou, nor thy fathers; thou shalt not consent unto him, nor hearken unto him, neither shall thine eye pity him, neither shalt thou spare, neither shalt thou conceal him, but thou shalt surely kill him:' and, in pursuance of this law, much more might Judith, or any other inhabitant of Bethulia, whom God had inspired with the like courage and magnanimity, endeavour to counterplot the designs of any person, who, in an hostile manner, should come, not only to invade their civil rights and liberties, but to extirpate their religion; and, instead of enticing, to compel them by force of arms, to receive a form of idolatry, which neither they nor their fathers knew.

Many things may be alleged against Judith's method of proceeding in this affair, but they are most of them reducible to the common stratagems of war, which not only the law of arms, but the commands of God in some cases, and the examples of several of the best men in sacred history, have declared to be allowable. What comes not under this denomination, we shall not pretend

^b How great soever the folly and impiety was, in desiring to pass for a god, yet the king of Nineveh was not the only prince that we find infected with it. The flatterers of Darius the Median proposed to him to make a decree that, under pain of being cast into the den of lions, no one should dare to ask a petition of any god or man, but of him only, for the space of thirty days, (Dan. vi. 7.) When Alexander the Great took it into his head, to exact the same divine honours of his people that they had formerly paid to the kings of Persia his predecessors, he found people about him base and prostitute enough to commend the design, and to maintain, that thus to advance kings above the rank of mortal man, was not only a pious, but a prudent and advantageous thing; for so the historian expresses it: "That the Persians, not only through motives of piety but of wisdom, worshipped their kings as gods, for they deemed majesty to be a bulwark to the welfare of the nation," (Quint. Curt. b. viii.) The Egyptians had their princes in the like veneration, and looked upon them as highly raised above the condition of other men; but the Greeks, it must be owned, held all this baseness and abject flattery in a just detestation, insomuch that the Athenians put Timagoras to death, for having prostrated himself before the king of the Persians: and Sperchius and Bulis, two Lacedaemonians, though then in a state of captivity, could not be brought to pay that adoration to Artaxerxes, which he required of every one that approached him.—Plut. in Artax.

^a Holofernes may be thought, in this piece of state, to imitate the custom of the Persians, among whom it was usual to carry fire before their kings, as it was afterward done before the Roman emperors, and is at present before the emperor of the Turks; but the reason of this might be no more, than either that Judith and her maid were apprehended, and brought to Holofernes, before it was quite day, or that the inner apartment of his tent was so very dark, that he had lights continually burning in it.—Calmet's Commentary on Judith x. 22.

to vindicate; ¹ for the notion of mental reservations and ironical speeches, which are not allowed in common conversation, are but the poor subterfuges which commentators have used to apologise for the conduct that they can by no means justify.

The history, indeed, represents this Judith as a woman of great courage; but it nowhere intimates that she was without faults. The manner of her preparation for the undertaking, and the success wherewith it was attended, may make us presume, that its design was originally from God; but then the continued train of falsehood and dissimulation wherewith it was carried on, must needs persuade us, that the means of conducting it was left to the woman, who, on this occasion, has given us a very remarkable specimen of the cunning and sagacity, the guile and artifice, of her sex.

One thing, however, may be said, and that without any forced explication, in favour of her conduct:—That her answer to the eunuch's suggestion she might design for no more than a common compliment, which the situation of her affairs, at that time, obliged her to make. ² She might perceive, very likely, the bad design which the Assyrian general had upon her; but she did not think herself concerned to discover that she perceived it. She pretended, in some measure, to be ignorant of it; and to pretend an ignorance of what is proposed, when the thing is naughty and will not bear examination, is a point of modesty as well as prudence: as, where it will admit of a double construction, there to take it in the better sense, is even reputed an act of candour and good breeding. 'Let not this fair damsel fear,' says the old pander, 'to come to my lord, and to be honoured in his presence, and drink wine, and be merry with us, and be made this day as one of the daughters of the Assyrians, who serve in the house of Nabuchodonosor.' How the daughters of Assyria, who served in this capacity, were used, Judith very probably had been informed: but, since the eunuch seemed to put it on the foot of a great favour and honour done her, she could not do less than return him a compliment; but then we all know, ³ that the offers of service, which, upon every occasion, we are so apt to make to one another, and those expressions of submission and respect, which so commonly pass among us, are not to be taken in a literal sense, because they always imply a tacit condition; and therefore the answer which the historian puts in Judith's mouth, 'surely, whatever pleaseth him, I will do speedily,' will fairly admit of this construction, 'whatever Holofernes shall desire of me, so far as it is consistent with my duty, my honour, and my religion, I will not fail to do.'

Thus we have endeavoured to satisfy most of the popular objections, and to reconcile most of the seeming inconsistencies, that occur in the history of Judith; and if there still remain any that cannot sufficiently be cleared up, they ought, in justice, to be imputed to our ignorance and want of better information. Had we the ancient books of the Chronicles of the kings of Israel and Judah, to which we are so often referred in Scripture, or had we the histories of the Assyrians, Chaldeans, Medes, Persians, and Egyptians, (with whom the Jewish nation had so long an intercourse,) perfect and entire, it is not to be doubted, but that many of the difficulties which at present seem insurmountable, would then easily subside and sink into nothing. The plain truth is, "there was scarce ever a history written" according to our learned Prideaux's ⁴ observation, "but what in the very next age will seem to have inconsistencies enough in it as to time, place, and other circumstances, when the memory of men concerning them begins to fail; and therefore we may be much more apt to blunder, when we take our view at the distance of above two thousand years, and have no other light to direct us to our object, but such glimmerings, from broken scraps of history, as are in effect next to nothing."

The like is to be said of the several seeming absurdities that may be observed in the writings and behaviour of the prophets:—That were we sufficiently acquainted with the style and manner of writing that was in use in those days, and especially in the eastern countries, we should think it no strange thing to find them expressing themselves by types and figures, parabolical representations, and emblematical actions. For, however it comes about, so it is, that mankind have all along been marvelously taken with story and picture. ⁵ These excite the curiosity of our nature; they tempt us to learn, help us to remember, and convey instruction to the mind, in a more pleasing and effectual manner than plain documents can; and hence it came to pass, that a great part of the learning of the wise men of the east consisted in ⁶ 'prophecies, in subtle and dark parables, and in the secrets of grave sentences,' as the author of the book of Ecclesiasticus has branched it out; for ⁷ 'to understand a proverb and the interpretation; the words of the wise, and their dark sayings,' was the very best description that Solomon himself could give of wisdom. ⁸ Among the ancients, indeed, mythology was in the highest esteem. The Egyptians, who were in great reputation for learning, delivered their notions in hieroglyphics; and from them the Greeks took the mode of couching their meaning in fable. Hesiod, ⁹ who contends with Homer for antiquity, is supposed by Quintilian to be the author of the fables which go under the name of Æsop; but, however this be, the very supposition of his being so, makes it probable that he did write fables, as, perhaps, most men of learning and note in those days accustomed themselves to this form of writing.

¹⁰ But, besides this parabolical way of writing which was in great vogue among the ancients, and to which the Jews, by a kind of natural genius, were wonderfully inclined, the people of the east had a way of expressing themselves by actions as well as words, and, to enforce the matter they were upon, would frequently make use of outward and visible signs and representations. ¹¹ This, our learned Mr Mede shows, was the practice of the Indians, Persians, and Egyptians; and, even among the Romans, who were a people that used great modesty of style, and more gravity in their actions, than many other nations, it was a customary thing in their orations and pleadings, to use all arts to raise the passions, by actions and representations as well as words; insomuch, ¹² that they would frequently hang up the picture of the thing they were to speak to. Cicero tells us of himself, that he sometimes took up a child, and held it in his arms to move compassion; and to excite horror and indignation, nothing was more common, than for the accusers to produce, in open court, a bloody sword, or the garments of the wounded; to show the bones that had been taken out of the wound, or the scars that it had left behind it: "The power of these things is usually great," says Quintilian, "directing the attention of men to the subject in question;" for it can hardly otherwise happen, but that by this means they should fix the attention of their hearers, when, at one and the same time, they speak both to their eyes and ears.

From these few remarks, it appears in general, that the figurative expressions of the prophets, their actions, and types, and parables, were not incongruous to the customs of the times and places where they lived, and yet very proper means to give a lively and affecting representation of the message they had to deliver; and so proceed we to the passages which seem to give disgust.

To take several of these in their literal sense, would be an effectual way to disparage the divine precept, which, according to this acceptance, would put the prophet upon acting in a manner quite inconsistent with common prudence; and therefore interpreters are generally agreed, that the things of this kind, which will not come under a literal construction, were either transacted in vision, that is, the prophet in a dream, or some other deliquium, imagined that he did such and such things, and then related them to the people; or that they were parables, which God dictated to the prophet, and the prophet recited to the people; only it must be observed, that the literal interpretation of a text always claims the preference, if there be not some weighty reason against it, or some intimation in the text itself, that the words are figurative and enigmatical.

The prophet Jeremiah³ is ordered by God, 'to take the wine-cup of his fury at his hand, and to carry it up and down, far and near Jerusalem, and the cities of Judah, and the kings and princes thereof: to Pharaoh king of Egypt, and his servants, princes, and people; to all the Arabians, and kings of the land of Uz; to the kings of the land of the Philistines, Edom, Moab, and Ammon; to the kings of Tyre and Sidon, and of the isles beyond the sea, Dedan, Tema, and Buz; to the kings of Zimri, of the Medes, and Persians, and all the kings of the north.' Now, since it was morally impossible for the prophet to visit all these kings and nations in person, and the nature of the thing would not admit of any real performance, it could be no otherwise done than in vision. 'The cup of God's wrath,' is a common figure in Scripture, to denote the severity of his judgments; and therefore, when the prophet says, that 'he took the cup at the Lord's hand, and made all the nations drink thereof,' he can mean no more, than that he prophesied against these several nations, and, by virtue of the spirit of foreknowledge which God had imparted to him, pronounced their doom.

salem, can hardly be understood in a sense altogether literal; because it is not probable, either, that the ambassadors would take the yokes at his hands, or carry them to their respective masters; but then, as yokes and bonds are common figures in Scripture, to denote captivity, and the miseries that attend it, his sending the yokes and bonds, may signify no more,⁵ than his declaring, from God, the fate of these princes, when the king of Babylon was let loose upon them. Only it must be observed, that the prophet might really make some of these yokes and bonds, (as the Scripture says expressly, that he put one upon himself,) to enliven the idea, and make the impression of what he was to say more strong and emphatical. For these ornamental figures, and affecting images interspersed with it, added new force and dignity to the prophet's message, made it more awful and solemn to the delivery, and gave it the advantage of a deeper and more durable impression.

In like manner, again, the whole affair of this prophet's girdle, his carrying it to the Euphrates, hiding it in a rock, and, at such a determinate time, going for it again, and finding it quite rotten and spoiled, can hardly be taken in a literal sense; because the vast^a distance of the place, and trivialness of the errand, as well as the impossibility of getting out of Jerusalem, if it was then invested by the Babylonians, make strongly against it; and therefore we may suppose, that all this was transacted in the prophet's imagination only; that, in the night-time, God sent upon him a vision, wherein all this series of things seemed to be performed by him, to imprint it the deeper upon his understanding, namely, that the kingdom of Judah, which was once as nearly united to God as the girdle is to a man's loins, should be utterly ruined and destroyed; and though the river Euphrates be at a wide distance from the prophet's place of abode, yet, in the vision, which is never confined to places, it might be more aptly made choice of than any other, thereby to denote to the Jews, that over that river they were to be carried captive to the city of Babylon.

The short of the matter is,—Several things which the prophets set down as matters of fact, might not be actually done, but only represented as done, to make the more lively impression upon their readers and hearers. Nay, there are several commands which God gives Ezekiel in particular, such as, his 'lying for 390 days on one side,' which was next to a thing impossible, 'his baking his bread with man's dung,' which was a thing unseemly, and his 'shaving his head and beard,' which, as he was a priest,⁶ was a thing expressly forbidden him, that the prophet is never once said to have performed, nor were they indeed given him with an intent that he should perform them, but only relate them to the people, and so

^a The learned Bochart has invented a new solution of this difficulty. He supposes, that as it was a common thing for the initial letter to be dropped, in the names of places and persons, the Hebrew word Phrath may be supposed to stand for Ephrath or Ephratah, which is Bethlehem, about five or six miles distant from Jerusalem: by which means the prophet's journey is greatly shortened, and the pains of going thither once again is not much. But whether this solution, as ingenious as it is, will bear the test, is left to the examination of the critics.—Calmet's Commentary, and Scripture Vindicated, in locum.

make them 'signs unto the house of Israel,' that is, either resemblances of things past, or prognostications of things to come.

St Peter, we may observe,¹ was commanded in his vision, to do what he never did; 'Rise, Peter, kill and eat:' nay, by his reply, it appears, that himself did not think that he was any ways bound to obey the command; 'Not so, Lord; for I have never eaten any thing that is common or unclean.' And yet the use which he made of this vision was, to report it to the church as a sign or emblematical indication of God's having accepted the Gentiles into the gospel terms of salvation. And, in like manner, when Ezekiel, in his vision, received the command of 'shaving his head and his face,' his answer might have been in St Peter's strain, 'Not so, Lord;' for, by thy law, I am forbidden 'to make baldness upon my head, or to shave off the corner of my beard;' and yet he might relate this vision to the people, the better to enforce the threats which God had authorized him to denounce against Jerusalem: 'Therefore thus saith the Lord God, Behold I, even I am against thee, and will execute judgments in the midst of thee, in the sight of the nations; and I will do in thee that which I have not done, and whereunto I will not do any more the like, because of all thy abominations.'

In a word, the prophets, in their visions, might receive several commands concerning things illegal or indecent; ² but then they considered these not as formal commands, but as types, emblems, and predictions, delivered to them in a perceptive form, in order to imprint the things intended the deeper upon their minds, and to make the representation thereof to the people with whom they had to do more lively and affecting; nor should it seem strange, that the divine wisdom, in this case, makes choice of things improper, and sometimes impracticable, since his purpose in so doing is to make the prophet perceive at once, that it was all symbolical, and not designed to direct him how and what to act, but how and what to apprehend, foresee, and foretell of things to come.

Whether the command given to Hosea to marry a woman that either had been or would prove a prostitute, is to have a literal or figurative construction, commentators and critics, both ancient and modern, are not a little divided; but since in the figurative there is no violence offered to Scripture, and in the literal there is nothing immoral or absurd, it matters not much in which sense we take it. In Scripture, it is a common thing to represent the defection of a people from the service of God, ³ by the metaphors of adultery and fornication; and, therefore, to introduce the prophet as marrying a woman that proved an adulteress, as having several children by that marriage, and as calling these children by such names as denoted the destruction of a rebellious nation, is no bad manner of expressing the near relation between God and his people; his constant care in preserving and multiplying them; their vile ingratitude in revolting from him; and the great severity wherewith he intended to punish their revolt. Or, take the words in a literal sense, and that the prophet was really commanded to marry a woman of a bad reputation; yet might there not be many prudential considerations to make such a match eligible? The Scripture, we may observe, in the appellations which it gives persons and things, has less regard to what they actually are, than to what they once were; and hence it is, that Moses's rod, when turned into a serpent, ⁵ is still called his rod; and those whom our Saviour healed of their several infirmities, are still the deaf, ⁶ the lame, &c., even after they are cured. Now, if the woman whom Hosea was ordered to marry, though once she had lived an incontinent life, was now become chaste and virtuous, where was the great absurdity of his actually doing it, since, besides other motives to us unknown, he was, in this action, to be a sign to the Israelites, and to set an example to them, 'who had gone a whoring after other gods,' ⁷ that, if they would forsake their false deities, and return to their true God, the God of their fathers, he would still accept, and receive them, in the like manner as the prophet had taken an adulteress to his wife, upon assurance that ever, for the future, she would prove faithful to his bed?

The account of Ezekiel's packing up his household goods, removing them by night, and breaking through the walls of his house to carry them away more secretly, though some interpreters have looked upon it as the mere narration of a vision, or the recital of a parable, yet to me it seems more probable, that the whole was transacted just in the manner wherein it is described; especially considering the near resemblance between the prediction and the event. For, after that the prophet, by the symbolical action of removing his goods in a fright, had typified the taking of Jerusalem, he proceeds to apply what he had done in this prediction.—⁸ 'I am your sign; like as I have done, so shall it be done unto them: they shall remove, and go into captivity; they shall dig through the wall to carry out thereby; and the prince that is among them shall bear upon his shoulder in the twilight, and shall go forth.—My net also will I spread upon him, and he shall be taken in my snare; and I will scatter, toward every wind, all that are about him to help him, and all his bands.' And accordingly the event happened; for ⁹ 'when the city was broken up,' says the historian, 'all the men of war fled by night, by the way of the gate, between two walls, which is by the king's gardens, for the Chaldees were against the city round about, and the king went the way towards the plain. But the army of the Chaldees pursued after the king, and overtook him in the plains of Jericho, and all his army were scattered from him.'

The like is to be said of the same prophet's being ordered by God to delineate upon a slate the city of Jerusalem, and the Babylonish camp investing it, namely, that the portraiture of the fort, the mount, the camp, and battering rams, against it, ¹⁰ are so very like to what happened at the siege, that we can hardly forbear presuming, that the whole narration is literal, or that the prophet did really draw a sketch of the siege of the city, as God commanded him. For since, as we observed before, it was a practice sometimes among the best of orators to represent, in a picture, the particular thing they were to speak to, thereby to gain the reader attention of their hearers, why should it be thought inconsistent with the character of a prophet, or any diminution of his discretion, or gravity, to do the same thing, in order to gain the same end? ^a

To walk naked indeed for three years together, as the prophet Isaiah ¹ is said to have done, does not so well comport with the rules of decency, and seems to carry in it an appearance of frenzy or madness; but we are to remember, that, in Scripture phrase, those are said to go naked, who either go without ² their upper garment, or without the ³ habit that is proper to their station or quality; and that the Hebrew text does not say, that Isaiah walked in this manner for three years together, but that he thus walked as a type or sign of the three years' calamity which would come upon Egypt and Ethiopia. So that the sense of the passage is thus:—That Isaiah went about without his upper garment, in token that the Egyptians and Arabians should undergo a calamity of three years' continuance from the king of Assyria; but how long or how often he did this, the Scripture is silent; only it may be presumed, that he did it in such a manner, whether three days together, or thrice the same day, as might best prefigure the three years' calamity: and since the action was to be typical, the prophet, who, through the iniquity of the times, could scarce gain the audience of the people at any rate, was to appear in an uncommon garb, and with something particular in his manner, to strike the eyes and awaken the observation of all around him: for, had not there been some visible impropriety in the action, something seemingly inconsistent with the character of so grave a man, it would not have answered the purpose of exciting the curiosity and attention of the people for which it was intended.

Thus we have endeavoured to vindicate the actions of the prophets, or rather the wisdom of God which put them upon such actions, from all imputations of weakness and folly; and shall only observe farther, that our misconceptions of these things must, in a great measure, proceed from our ignorance of the prophetic style, as says a learned examiner of this style;—⁴ “For all places of Scripture that are expressed in allegorical or proverbial forms of speech, or by types and resemblances of things, as all prophecies more or less are, must needs have been better understood in those times when they were written, than they can be now, because we have but an imperfect notion of many things to which the allusion is made, and from whence the similitude is taken.”

a Language, as appears from the nature of the thing, from the records of history, and from the remains of the most ancient languages yet remaining, was at first extremely rude, narrow, and equivocal: so that men would be perpetually at a loss, on any new conception, or uncommon accident, to explain themselves intelligibly to one another; the art of enlarging language by a scientific analogy being a late invention: this would necessarily set them upon supplying the deficiencies of speech by apt and significant signs. Accordingly, in the first ages of the world, mutual converse was upheld by a mixed discourse of words and actions; hence came the eastern phrase of “the voice of the sign;” and use and custom, as in most other affairs of life, improv-

CHAP. III.—Of the Sacred Chronology and Profane History during this period.

THE particular differences, and seeming incongruities, in point of chronology, that have occurred in this period of history, we have endeavoured to solve and reconcile in the notes that are annexed to it; but there is a passage

ing what had arisen out of necessity, into ornament, this practice subsisted long after the necessity was over; especially amongst the eastern people, whose natural temperament inclined them to a mode of conversation, which so well exercised their vivacity, by motion; and so much gratified it, by a perpetual representation of material images. Of this we have innumerable instances in holy Scripture: as where the false prophet pushed with horns of iron, to denote the entire overthrow of the Syrians: where Jeremiah, by God's direction, hides the linen girdle in a hole of the rock near Euphrates; where he breaks a potter's vessel in sight of the people; puts on bonds and yokes; and casts a book into Euphrates; where Ezekiel, by the same appointment, delineates the siege of Jerusalem on a tile; weighs the hair of his beard in balances; carries out his household stuff; and joins together the two sticks for Judah and Israel. By these actions the prophets instructed the people in the will of God, and conversed with them in signs; but where God teaches the prophet, and, in compliance to the custom of that time, condescends to the same mode of instruction, then the significative action is generally changed into a vision, either natural or extraordinary: as where the prophet Jeremiah is bid to regard the rod of the almond tree, and the seething pot; the work on the potter's wheel, and the baskets of good and bad figs; and the prophet Ezekiel, the ideal scene of the resurrection of dry bones. The significative action, I say, was, in this case, generally changed into a vision; but not always. For as sometimes, where the instruction was for the people, the significative action was perhaps in vision; so sometimes again though the information was only for the prophet, God would set him upon a real expressive action, whose obvious meaning conveyed the intelligence proposed or sought. Of this we shall give, at the expense of infidelity, a very illustrious instance. The excellent Maimonides, not attending to this primitive mode of information, is much scandalized at several of these actions, unbecoming, as he supposed, the dignity of the prophetic office; and is therefore for resolving them in general into supernatural visions impressed on the imagination of the prophet; and this, because some few of them may perhaps admit of such an interpretation. In this he is followed by Christian writers, much to the discredit, as I conceive, of revelation; and to the triumph of libertinism and infidelity; the actions of the prophets being delivered as realities; and these writers representing them as mean, absurd, and fanatical, and exposing the prophet to contempt. But what is it they gain by this expedient? The charge of absurdity and fanaticism will follow the prophet in his visions, when they have removed it from his waking actions: for if these actions were absurd and fanatical in the real representation, they must needs be so in the imaginary; the same turn of mind operating both asleep and awake. The judicious reader, therefore, cannot but observe, that the reasonable and true defence of the prophetic writings is what is here offered: where we show, that information by action was, at this time and place, a very familiar mode of conversation. This once seen, all charge of absurdity and suspicion of fanaticism, vanish of themselves: the absurdity of an action consists in its being extravagant and insignificant; but use and a fixed application made these in question both sober and pertinent: the fanaticism of an action consists in a fondness for unusual actions and foreign modes of speech; but those in question were idiomatic and familiar. To illustrate this last observation by a domestic example: when the sacred writers talk of being ‘born after the spirit,’ of being ‘fed with the sincere milk of the word,’ of ‘putting their tears into a bottle,’ of ‘bearing testimonies against lying vanities,’ of ‘taking the veil from men's hearts,’ and of ‘building up one another;’ they speak the common, yet proper and pertinent phraseology of their country; and not the least imputation of fanaticism can stick upon these original expressions. But when we see our own countrymen reprobate their native idiom, and affect to employ only scripture phrases in their whole conversation, as if some inherent sanctity in the prophet Ezekiel, generally supposed to relate to this time, wherein some learned chronologers do not so well agree.

The passage is this :—¹ ' I have laid upon thee the resided in the eastern modes of expression, we cannot choose but suspect such men far gone in the delusions of a heated imagination. The same may be said of significative actions. But it is not only in sacred story that we meet with the mode of speaking by action. Profane antiquity is full of these examples; the early Oracles in particular frequently employed it, as we learn from an old saying of Heraclitus: "That the king whose oracle is at Delphi, neither speaks nor keeps silent, but reveals by signs." The influence language would have on the first kind of writing, which was hieroglyphical, is easy to conceive. Language, we have shown, was out of mere necessity, highly figurative, and full of material images; so that when men first thought of recording their conceptions, the writing would be, of course, that very picture which was before painted in the fancy, and from thence, delineated in words: even long after, when figurative speech was continued out of choice, and adorned with all the invention of wit, as amongst the Greeks and Romans, and that the genius of the simpler hieroglyphic writing was again revived for ornament, in emblems and devices, the poetic habit of personalizing every thing filled their coins, their arches, their altars, &c. with all kinds of imaginary beings. All the qualities of the mind, all the affections of the body, all the properties of countries, cities, rivers, mountains, became the seeds of living things: for,

— "as imagination bodied forth

The forms of things unknown, the artist's hand

Turn'd them to shape, and gave to airy nothing

A local habitation and a name." Shakspeare.

The reciprocal influence hieroglyphic writing would have on language is as evident. The Chinese used this kind of writing, as well as the Egyptians; and the character given of their language is entirely correspondent: "The style of the Chinese, in their compositions," says Du Halde, "is mysterious, concise, allegoric, and sometimes obscure. They say much in few words. Their expressions are lively, animated, and thick sown with bold comparisons, and noble metaphors." Their style, we see, was concise and figurative; the very character, as we have seen, of all the barbarous nations upon earth, both ancient and modern; for nature is ever uniform. The cold phlegmatic temper of the Chinese made their style short and laconic; the use of hieroglyphics made it figurative; and from this mixture it became obscure; but had those remote inhabitants of the east and west possessed the warm imagination of the proper Asiatics, then had their language, like that of the people spoken of above, abounded with pleonasm instead of laconisms. The old Asiatic style, so highly figurative, seems likewise, by what we find of its remains, in the prophetic language of the sacred writers, to have been evidently fashioned to the mode of ancient hieroglyphics, both curiologic and tropical. Of the first kind are the figurative expressions of 'spotted garments,' to denote iniquity; an 'intoxicating draught,' to signify error and misery; the 'sword and bow,' a warrior; a 'gigantic stature,' a mighty leader; 'balance, weights, and measures,' a judge, or magistrate; 'arms,' a powerful nation, like the Roman. Of the second kind, which answers to the tropical hieroglyphic, is the calling empires, kings, and nobles, by the names of the 'heavenly luminaries, the sun, moon, and stars;' their temporary disasters or entire overthrow, denoted by 'eclipses and extinctions;' the destruction of the nobility, by 'stars falling from the firmament;' hostile invasions, by 'thunder and tempestuous winds;' and leaders of armies, conquerors, and founders of empire, by 'lions, bears, leopards, goats, or high trees.' In a word, the prophetic style seems to be a speaking hieroglyphic.

These observations will not only assist us in the intelligence of the Old and New Testament, but likewise vindicate their character from the illiterate cavils of modern libertines, who have foolishly mistaken that colouring for the peculiar workmanship of the speaker's heated imagination, which was the sober established language of their times; a language which God and his Son condescended to employ, as the properest vehicle of the high mysterious ways of Providence, in the revelation of themselves to mankind.—Warburton's Divine Legation of Moses vol. iv. pp. 133—136, and 173—175.—Ed.

years of their iniquity, according to the number of days, three hundred and ninety days; so shalt thou bear the iniquity of the house of Israel. And when thou shalt accomplish them, lie again on thy right side, and thou shalt bear the iniquity of the house of Judah forty days. I have appointed thee each day for a year.' The generality of commentators, who take God's laying upon the prophet the years of his people's iniquity, to denote his forbearing to punish them for their offences for such a determinate time, do agree, ² that there is an exact sum of 390 years mentioned in this place; that this sum is to begin from the time that Jeroboam first set up the golden calves; and that the 390 and 40 years are not distinct numbers, but that the less is to be included in the greater; but then the question is, where we are to end these 390 years? or to which of the captivities do they extend?

Several learned men of great authority make these years to end ³ at the last captivity by Nebuzaradan, captain of the guards under Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, and four years after the last destruction of Jerusalem, which happened in the eleventh year of Zedekiah; for, from the time of the setting up the calves, ⁴ say they, ⁵ this last instance of God's severity, are just 390 years; from the eighteenth year of Josiah, when the kingdom of Judah entered into covenant with God, to this time, are just forty years; and, by this last captivity, all the predictions of the several prophets, relating thereunto, were perfectly fulfilled.

It is to be observed, however, that this last captivity was so small, so sudden, and attended with so little difficulty, as can by no means come up to the pomp and solemnity of the prophet's description, in that very chapter wherein this epocha is mentioned. The account which we have of the invasion is this :—⁶ "Whilst Nebuchadnezzar lay at the siege of Tyre, he sent Nebuzaradan with part of his army to invade the land of Israel, on purpose, as is supposed, to revenge the death of Gedaliah; because there was no other reason for his falling upon the poor remains of those miserable people, whom he himself had left and settled there. In this expedition Nebuzaradan seized upon all the Jews whom he found in the land, made them captives, and sent them to Babylon; but they all amounted to no more than seven hundred and forty-five persons." Here was no resistance made, no siege maintained, no famine incurred. The people fell a cheap and easy prey, because they were ruined, and destroyed before. But now, in the expedition to which the prophet ⁶ alludes, Jerusalem was besieged, and the defendants reduced to the necessity of ⁷ 'eating bread by weight, and with care, and of drinking water by measure, and with astonishment,' as he expresses it.

For this reason, we should rather incline to the hypothesis of those who end both the computations at the destruction of Jerusalem, in the eleventh of Zedekiah; who, according as they compute the time from Jeroboam's apostasy, make the period of God's forbearing

the house of Israel, from thence to the destruction of Jerusalem, to contain just three hundred and ninety years; and who begin the forty years of God's forbearance of the house of Judah, from the mission of the prophet Jeremiah to preach repentance to them, that is, ¹ from the thirteenth year of Josiah, when he was first called to this office; from which time, to the last year of Zedekiah, when Jerusalem was destroyed, were exactly forty years. For ² since the hundred and twenty years of God's forbearing the old world is reckoned from the mission of Noah to preach repentance, there seems to be some parity of reason, that his forty years' forbearance of the kingdom of Judah should be reckoned from the like mission of Jeremiah.

But there is another way of explaining this passage; for if by the word iniquity, which God imputes to the house of Israel and Judah, we are to understand the punishment of their iniquity, which is very common, and seems to be the most natural sense in this place, it is plain, that as the whole tenor of the prophet's discourse seems to denote an event future, and far distant, it may not improperly relate to the continuation of God's punishment upon the tribes of Israel and Judah, for their great and manifold provocations.

³ Now the punishment of Israel for their iniquities may be said to commence at the taking of Samaria, in the reign of Hoshea; as that of Judah did, at the taking of Jerusalem, in the reign of Zedekiah. If then we reckon from the destruction of Jerusalem to the time when Cyaxares II. (whom ⁴ the Scripture calls 'Darius the Median,') became king of Babylon, we shall find it about forty years; and as he was a known favourer of the Jews, and might therefore give them leave to return home, we may be allowed to infer, that here the term of their punishment did expire. And, in like manner, if we reckon from Salmeser's taking Samaria to the last victory which Alexander the Great obtained over Darius Codomanus, whereby he became sole monarch of all Asia, we shall find it to be much about three hundred and ninety years: and as his kindness to the Jews was very remarkable, we may here date the restoration of their liberty, and consequently their release from the punishment which God inflicted on them for their sins.

Thus, accordingly as we take the sense of the words in the prophet, the history which is alluded to puts on a different aspect, and relates to a different period: but proceed we now to the profane history itself.

What dealings and intercourse, in the space of these last four hundred years, ⁵ namely, from the building of Solomon's temple to the captivity of Babylon, the Jewish people had with the Philistines, the Ammonites, Moabites, Phœnicians, Syrians, and other neighbouring nations; and what relation and dependence they had on the great and powerful kingdoms of Assyria, Babylon, and Egypt, has, in some measure, been observed in the course of this history. What we are farther concerned to do, is to take notice of some more remarkable events, which, during this period of time, are supposed to have happened in the world.

⁵ In the thirty-fifth year of the reign of Uzziah king of Judah, and while there was an interregnum in the kingdom of Israel, the Olympic games were instituted in Greece. The use and design of them was to train up the youth in active and warlike exercises, that, if occasion required, they might be capable of doing their country service in the field; and it was not from the mountain Olympus, in Thessaly, but from the city Olympia, (since called Pisa, near Elis, a city in Peloponnesus, where they were celebrated in the adjacent plains, near the river Alpheus), that they took their names. Here was the splendid temple of Jupiter, which had vast treasures belonging to it, by reason of the oracles which were there given out, and these games which were there celebrated in honour of that deity; and here was likewise that famous statue of Jupiter, ⁶ made by Phidias, which was accounted one of the wonders of the world, and from which he obtained the name of Jupiter Olympius.

It was about four hundred and forty years before this time, that these games and exercises were at first instituted by one Heracles; not the son of Jupiter and Almena, so much celebrated by the Greek and Latin poets, but one of the priests of Cybele called by that name, who came into Greece from Ida, a mountain in Phrygia, (whence he and his companions were called Idæi, Dactyli, and Corybantes,) and brought in many superstitious rites with them. After the death of this

⁶ This statue of Jupiter is described by Pausanias, in the following manner:—"He is made sitting on a throne of gold and ivory, with a crown on his head, which seems to be made of olive branches. In his right hand he holds an image of victory, made of ivory likewise, that has on its head-dress a crown of massy gold; and in his left a sceptre, made of all kinds of metals mixed together, with an eagle on the top of it. His shoes and stockings are all of gold, and the rest of the drapery is of the same metal, adorned with figures of various animals, and a great number of flower-de-luces. His throne is embellished with ivory, ebony, gold, precious stones, and a multitude of embossed figures. At the four feet, or pedestals of the throne, are four victories, and two others at the feet of the statue. At the two feet, on the fore-side of the throne, on one hand, are the figures of sphinxes, who are carrying off some Theban youths; and on the other side, are represented the figures of the children of Niobe, whom Apollo and Diana shot to death with their arrows. Between the feet of the throne is represented Theseus, and the rest of the heroes who accompanied Hercules to the war against the Amazons, together with several Athletes of diverse kinds; and the place is all around adorned with pictures, representing the labours of Hercules, together with several others of the most renowned historical subjects. On the upper part of the throne, on the one side, are engraven the Graces, and on the other the Hours, because, according to the poets, both these were the daughters of Jupiter. On the foot-stool of the statue are golden lions, and a representation of the combat of Theseus with the Amazons; and on a basis thereof are innumerable golden figures, such as that of the sun going into his chariot, of Jupiter and Juno, Mercury, Vesta, and Venus, who has Cupid standing by her; of Apollo, Diana, Minerva, Hercules, Amphitrite, Neptune, and the Moon, which is here represented sitting upon a horse." This is the substance of what Pausanias says of this famous statue; but notwithstanding that its workmanship was the wonder of all the ancients, and the curiosity of seeing it might increase the number of those who came to the Olympic games, yet Strabo finds great fault with it for want of a due proportion, because it was of such a prodigious bigness, that if it had stood upright, it must have made a hole in the roof of the temple.—Bedford's Scripture Chronology, b. vi. c. 2. in the notes.

Hercules, these games were discontinued for many years, till, by advice from the oracle of Apollo, Iphitus established them again; even in the lifetime of Lycurgus, who is nowhere said to have opposed them; and so they continued until the time of Constantine the Great, who, upon his profession of the Christian faith, first slighted the ludi seculares, and afterwards all other games, as monuments of pagan superstition; so that falling by degrees into disesteem, in the time of Theodosius the Great, if not before, they were utterly unfrequented, and dwindled into nothing.

These games were used to be performed at the end of every four years, and so every four years made an Olympiad, and lasted for five days; when the youth of Greece contended for mastery in five sorts of exercises, one for each day, namely, the cæstus, or whirlbat, the quoit, leaping, wrestling, and racing, either on foot or horseback, or in chariots; all which exercises were thought so honourable, that even kings themselves did not disdain to become competitors for the victory; and accordingly we find Pindar, the most celebrated poet in those days, addressing his first Olympic to Hiero king of Syracuse, for having won the prize in one of the horse-races.

The prize, however, was not great; it was no more than a garland of palm or olive: but the victor was treated with such tokens of respect and esteem, and was attended by the people with such loud acclamations, while he rode into the city in a coach through a breach in the wall, which, upon this occasion, was made for his more pompous entrance; and while he was sure to have the best of poets to celebrate his praise, and rank him even among the gods, that to come off conqueror, and be crowned in this place, was thought an honour not inferior to that of a triumph in Rome; and this the rather, because the inhabitants of Elis, who were the presidents of these games, were so remarkably impartial in giving sentence according to merit, that whoever was crowned by their order and determination was always thought justly to deserve it.

Thus,¹ it appears, that the original use of these Olympic games was to encourage activity of body; but in process of time, they came to be employed to a quite different purpose, even to fix the chronology of the history of the Greeks, among whom^b it grew a custom to reckon by Olympiads; for before that custom prevailed, their historians were vastly negligent in fixing the date

^a Dr Hales gives the following account of the Olympiads, which is probably correct, and is certainly more perspicuous than that in the text. These celebrated games were originally instituted in honour of Jupiter Olympius, by the Phrygian Pelops, who settled in the Grecian peninsula, called from him Peloponnesus about B. C. 1350. They were repeated by the Thelian Hercules, about B. C. 1325, and, after a long interruption, restored in part by Iphitus king of Elis, and celebrated at Olympia, on the banks of the river Alpheus, B. C. 884, according to the most probable account. However, the vulgar era of the Olympiads did not commence till 108 years after, July 19, B. C. 776.—Hales' Analysis, vol. i. p. 135, second edition.—Ed.

^b It is to be observed, however, that it was not from the first Olympiad, that they began their computation, but from the 27th, when Chorebus, a native of Elis, was victor, because there was no register kept of the preceding Olympiads; and therefore the commencement of this era was an hundred and eight years after the establishment of the games which occasioned it.—Cabinet's Dictionary under the word Olympiad.

of such transactions as they related. Varro, the most learned person among the Romans, both for history and antiquity, reckon three sorts of times. The first from the beginning of mankind to the first flood, which he calls uncertain, because no account is given of it by any heathen writer. The second, from the flood to the first Olympiad, which he calls fabulous, because many strange stories are reported of the gods and demigods in those times, but without any method or order. The third, from the first Olympiad to his time, which he calls historical, because thenceforward all transactions were laid in their proper places; but before the institution of this method of computation, "every thing was confused in the Grecian history," as Eusebius² tells us, "and³ no one thing written with any tolerable exactness."

In the eleventh year of Jotham,^c king of Judah, which was the twelfth of Pekah king of Israel, another famous era commenced, and was in use throughout all the empire, upon the building of the city of Rome, the history of which is as follows.

After the destruction of Troy,⁴ Æneas landing in Italy, was at first opposed by Latinus, king of the Latins, or aborigines; but being overcome in battle by the Trojans, Latinus made peace with their leader, and permitted him and his men, to live independent in his kingdom. Enraged at this treatment, Turnus king of the Rutuli, fomented a fresh war against Æneas; but in the conclusion, he was slain in single combat by the Trojan chief, and his mistress Lavinia, who was the occasion of all this contention, was, by her father Latinus, given to the conqueror for a wife. Æneas, it must be observed, had another son by a former wife, named Creusa, who was lost in the siege of Troy; and after his death, his relict Lavinia, being great with child, and fearing the power of Ascanius, for that was his name, fled into the woods, and was there delivered of a son, who, for that reason, was called Sylvius, and because he was born after his father's funeral, was likewise called Posthumus. It was not long, however, before the people began to express their resentment of this hard usage of Lavinia, so that Ascanius was obliged to recall her; and to avoid all occasions of disagreement for the future, he left to her and her son Sylvius, the city of Lavinia, which Æneas had built, and called after her name, whilst himself removed to Alba Longa, a city of his own erecting and where he lived for the remainder of his days, highly delighted with the situation of the place.

After the death of Ascanius, there happened a contention between this Sylvius the son of Æneas, and Iulus

^c Of the time when this city was built, there are two accounts, the Varronian and the Capitolian. The Varronian places it in the year before, but the Capitolian in this year, and yet they may both be easily reconciled; for as it was customary in those times, when they began to build a city, to go round it with a plough, and make a furrow where the walls were to be built, but leave a void space for the gates: the year before they might thus mark out the city, dig the foundation of the walls, and provide stones, timber, and other materials, and this year lay the foundation; so that the computation might easily begin from either year, though the Capitolian is the general account.—Bedford's Scripture Chronology, b. vi. c. 2. [Dr Hales fixes the date of the building of Rome as B. C. 753; which makes the fourth year of Jotham. See table at the end of this section.]—Ed.

the son of Ascanius, about the succession to the kingdom; but as the relations of Lavinia had the more prevalent interest in the country, the matter was so compromised that Iulus was made high priest, and Sylvius king, in whose family the kingdom continued for several generations, and every succeeding prince was named Sylvius.

Of this race was Latinus the Second, grandson to Sylvius, who built several towns on the borders of Latium; and their inhabitants, standing much upon the honour of their original, were afterwards called Prisci Latini. Of this race was Tiberinus, who, as some say, was drowned in the Tiber, and from that unhappy accident gave name to the river. Of this race was Aventinus, who, by being buried in the place, gave name to one of the mountains on which Rome was built; and of this race was Procas, who, after his death, left his two sons, Numitor and Amulius, to reign alternately every year; but Amulius the younger deposed Numitor, slew his son Ægisthus, and to cut off the whole race, compelled his daughter Hia to enter into a vow of perpetual virginity, by becoming a priestess to the goddess Vesta. Her vow however did not last long; for a certain soldier found means to get her with child, but to cover the disgrace, a report was raised, that all this was done by Mars, the god of war. At length she was delivered of two sons, Romulus and Remus, whom their uncle Amulius commanded to be drowned, and their mother to be buried alive, as being the punishment which the law inflicted, when vestal virgins had violated their chastity.

Whether the mother underwent this punishment, or, as some will have it, upon the entreaty of Antho, the daughter of Amulius, obtained her pardon, it is certain that the two children were thrown into the Tiber, in order to be drowned; but as the stream was low, and much mud was in the place, a certain woman, named Lupa, found them before they were dead, and having suckled them for some time, from whence the story of their being nursed by a she-wolf took its rise, brought them at length to Faustulus, the king's shepherd, who recommended them to the care of his wife Laurentia, and so they were both preserved.

As soon as they came to a proper age, they lived at first in the capacity of shepherds; but being naturally of a brave and martial temper, they applied themselves, not only to the business of hunting wild beasts, but of clearing the country likewise of such gangs of robbers, as came to plunder and infest it; so that, in a short time, the fame of their adventures made multitudes of the neighbouring youth, who were of the like complexion, resort unto them. Enraged at their proceedings, a strong company of these robbers set upon them at a certain time, and though Romulus defended himself against their attack, took Remus prisoner, and pretending that he had plundered the estate of his grandfather Numitor, delivered him to king Amulius, who sent him to his brother Numitor, to be executed for the fact.

When Remus was brought before Numitor, he behaved with such courage and intrepidity, that he could not but suspect something uncommon in him; and thereupon hearing that he had another brother, and that they were twins, and comparing their age with the time when his daughter Hia's two children were exposed, he began to think, that these, without doubt, must be the boys whom some good providence had wonderfully preserved; and, being confirmed in his opinion by the information of Faustulus, who had brought them up, he entered into a conspiracy with them, against his brother Amulius, where-in it was agreed, that Romulus with his men should privately enter the city, and being joined with such forces as Remus could muster up in Numitor's family, should, all on a sudden, attack the palace, and seize the king.

The plot succeeded. Amulius was taken and killed; and after that Numitor had congratulated his grandsons upon their success, he ascended the rostrum, and in a full assembly of people, declared how wicked and inhuman his brother Amulius had been; that these were his two grandchildren; how they were born, and bred up, and came to be discovered; and that by their contrivance it was that the tyrant was taken off; where-upon the people immediately came to a resolution, that Numitor should be their king, and that, next under him, Romulus and Remus should be held in the greatest veneration.

As soon as these matters were settled and adjusted, the two young princes (to perpetuate the memory of their preservation) resolved to build a city upon the spot where they had been nourished and brought up; and several of the neighbouring people, as well as their own men, came in to their assistance. It was not much doubted, but that this new city would, in process of time, outvie all the other towns in Italy; but then, as the two brothers were twins, and it was not well known which was the elder, they agreed to determine, by the flight of birds who should give the name to the city, and upon the grandfather Numitor's decease, which of them should reign first.

To this purpose they went each of them to the top of an hill. Romulus ascended what was afterwards called Palatinus, and Remus Aventinus, from whence he discovered six vultures first; but his brother afterwards saw twelve, so that the dispute was never the nearer an end. Remus laid claim to the sovereignty, because he saw the first vultures, and Romulus because he saw the most; insomuch that from words proceeding to blows, Remus was unhappily slain by his brother, and, in his death, ¹ put an end to the controversy.

When the city was built, Romulus called it Roma, which, in the Greek tongue, signified strength, and not by his own name Romula, because it was a diminutive. As the city, however, when finished, had not a sufficient stock of inhabitants, he found out an expedient to remedy this defect, by making a neighbouring grove an asylum or place of refuge, to all malefactors and discontented persons; so that, in a short time, vast numbers of all nations, that could not live in their own country with safety fled hither for protection, and peopled the city. These inhabitants however could last but for one age, because they were most of them men, and when they desired to marry with their neighbours, were rejected with scorn; so that they were under a necessity to get themselves wives by some stratagem or other. To this purpose Romulus proclaimed a feast, and public games, in the honour of Neptune, to be celebrated near his new city; and when the virgins from every quarter came thither to see and divert themselves, upon a signal given, they were all seized by force, carried into the city and compelled to become wives to those that wanted them. Exasperated with this base treatment, the neighbouring people immediately prepared for war, but are repulsed with loss by the Romans; till the Sabines, who were their most formidable enemy, and principally concerned in the late affront, marched against them, and, under the command of their king, Tatius, were just upon giving them a total defeat; when their daughters, who were now become wives to the Romans, ran between the two armies, and with their hair torn, and all other indications of sorrow, acquainted their parents that they had been used civilly, and that, if matters were carried to such extremities, nothing could be expected on their side but ruin and destruction. Hereupon their parents, being overcome by their prayers, and tears, and arguments, laid aside all angry resentment, and entered into a treaty with their sons-in-law, which succeeded so well, that several of them left their ancient habitations, and came with all their substance, and lived in Rome. From so small a beginning did this city gradually increase to be the seat of the western empire, and the mistress of the then known world!

One very remarkable event more, which happened the very next year after the building of Rome, namely, in the twelfth year of Jotham king of Judah, and the thirteenth of Pekah king of Israel, was the dissolution of the Assyrian monarchy upon the death of Sardanapalus, as several heathen authors have thus related it. This emperor exceeded all his predecessors, in sloth and voluptuousness. He clothed himself in women's attire; he painted his face, and decked his body more like a strumpet than a king; he affected an effeminate voice; spun fine wool and purple among his concubines, and proceeded to such a degree of luxury and shamelessness, that he wrote verses in commemoration of his dissolute manner of life, and commanded, after his death, to have them inscribed on his tomb.

The kings of the east seldom appeared in public: but Sardanapalus was never seen by any, but such only as were either assistants or associates in his lasciviousness; until Arbaces, the general of the Median forces, bribed one of his eunuchs, by giving him a golden cup, to be introduced into his presence; where, seeing his vile degenerate behaviour, he began to think it a disparagement, that so many brave and gallant men should be under the dominion of a worthless wretch, that affected to be a spinster rather than a king. This he communicated to his friends and acquaintances, to the governors of several provinces, but more especially to Belesis, the governor of Babylon, with whom he entered into a close confederacy to depose the present emperor, and to divide his dominions between them, whereof Belesis was to have Babylon, Chaldea, and Arabia, and himself all the rest.

¹ When matters were thus agreed on, Arbaces endeavoured, by all sorts of arts and insinuations, to make himself acceptable to the Medes; to persuade them to invade the Assyrian empire, and, in hopes of regaining their liberty, to draw the Persians into the like confederacy. On the other hand, Belesis prevailed with the Babylonians to revolt, and gained the king of Arabia, with whom he had a very great intimacy, to his party; so that, when all their forces were joined together, the army is said to have consisted of 400,000 men.

Sardanapalus, seeing such a strong confederacy and combination of arms against him, thought it high time to shake off his sloth; and having drawn forth the forces of the rest of the provinces, he engaged the enemy thrice, and as many times defeated them. In the first action he pursued them to the mountains, seventy furlongs beyond Nineveh. In the second he so defeated them, that they were all upon the point of returning home, had not Belesis, who was a Babylonish priest, and pretended to great skill in astrology^a and divination, given them

^a Whatever skill he might pretend to in astrology, it is certain that he was an excellent astronomer, and when he came to Babylon, and was made emperor there, set himself to rectify the Chaldean year, which seems to have stood unaltered from the flood till that time. The ancient year of the Chaldeans consisted of 360 days, or of twelve months, with thirty days to each month; but as this was five days and a quarter less than the revolution of the sun to the same point of the equinox, the Egyptians, in the time of Thoth, their second king, and grandson of Ham, added five days to the year, so that every year consisted exactly of 365 days. But then, in four years there was one day less than in so many Julian years, which in a great length of time, namely, in 1460 years, made the beginning of the year run through all the seasons. To prevent this inconsistency, the Chaldeans, about every six years, added to their year of 360 days an intercalary month, which made their years unequal; and therefore Belesis, being well acquainted with the Egyptian astronomers, and finding that their year was equal, though not absolutely perfect, reduced the Babylonian year to the same standard, that is, he made it consist of 365 days, which were divided into twelve months, of thirty days each, and five days, which were added at the end of the year. But then, because, in each of these years there would be a redundant quarter of a day, and in four years, one whole day, instead of the bissextile day, as it is in the Julian computation, he began every fourth year a day sooner. This alteration he ordered to begin in the first year of his reign, and from thence it was called "the famous era of Nabonassar," for so Belesis was likewise named, which continued in Egypt to the death of Anthony and Cleopatra, and was afterwards in use among the mathematicians and astronomers to the time of Ptolemy, who made his canon by this account, which is justly esteemed the surest and most useful guide of ancient chronology, where the sacred historians are silent.—Bedford's Scrip. Chron. b. vi. c. 2. Whiston's Theory, b. ii.; and Chron. of the Old Testament, p. 12. [It is not probable that the Chaldean astronomers, in whose country must have been preserved much of the learning of the antediluvian world, were under the necessity of borrowing any part of their science from the Egyptians, whose ancestors, at their first emigration from Babylonia, must have carried with them from that country the rudiments at least of all their own science. Accordingly the account of the origin of the famous era of Nabonassar, which Syncellus has given us, from the earliest writers on Chaldean history and antiquities, differs considerably from this. "Nabonassar," says he, as quoted by Dr Hales, "having collected the acts of his predecessors, destroyed them, in order that the computation of the reigns of the Chaldean kings might be made from himself." Such was the origin of the era of Nabonassar, which that monarch made to begin, with his own reign, on the 26th day of February, B. C. 747, and the year employed in it, was the movable year of twelve equal months of thirty days each, to which were added five supernumerary days. This year, which had been in common use among the Chaldeans, Egyptians, Armenians, Persians, and other oriental nations, from time immemorial, ran through all the seasons in the course of 1461 years, which was therefore considered as the grand Nabonassarian period or annus magnus of the Chaldean astronomers, for assurance, that God would at last reward their labours with success. In the third engagement Arbaces himself was wounded, and his army routed, and pursued as far as the mountains of Babylon; so that the chief officers were for dispersing and shifting for themselves, when Belesis gave them once more assurance, that if they would but continue together for five days longer, every thing in that time would have a different turn.

With much entreaty was the army prevailed on not to disperse, when suddenly news was brought, that a great enforcement was coming from Bactria to join the king, so that the only game which Arbaces had to play was, to march against them, and by all means imaginable, prevail with them to revolt; wherein he succeeded beyond all men's hopes and expectations, and so gave another turn to the face of affairs.

Sardanapalus, in the mean time, knowing nothing of this, and being elated with his repeated successes, was indulging his sloth and luxury, and preparing beasts for sacrifice, with plenty of wine, and other things necessary to feast and entertain his soldiers; when Arbaces, having intelligence by deserters in what condition his army lay, fearless of any foe, and overcome already with surfeiting and drunkenness, broke into their camp by night, and, having made a terrible slaughter of most of them, forced the rest into the city,

The king, after this defeat, took upon him the defence of the place, and committed the charge of the army to Salamenus, the queen's brother; but Salamenus was worsted in two pitched battles, one in the open field, and the other before the walls of Nineveh, where himself was slain, and most of his men cut to pieces; so that all the resource which Sardanapalus had, was to sustain the siege as long as he could, until the succours, which he had sent for out of all his provinces, should come to his assistance; and this he had some hopes of being able to do, because there was an ancient prophecy, "that Nineveh never could be taken by force, until the river became its enemy."

Arbaces, on the other hand, was much encouraged by his successes, and carried on the siege with the utmost vigour; but the prodigious strength of the walls, which were an hundred feet high, and so very broad, that three chariots might go abreast upon them, and the vast plenty of all manner of stores and provisions, necessary for a long defence, hindered him from making any considerable progress.

Thus two years were spent, without any prospect of relief on the one side, or of taking the town on the other. In the third year, a continued fall of rains made the Tygris overflow to such a degree, that coming into the much the same reason that 4714 has been considered as the grand Julian period by the astronomers of modern Europe. Hence the astronomical era of Nabonassar, or annus magnus of the Chaldeans, commenced on the 28th day of March, B. C. 867, near 120 years before the Historic era; and the king and his counsellors were induced to fix on that year and day for the commencement of their grand or astronomical period, because there was a synchronism of the new moon and vernal equinox on that day, which was likewise the beginning of the Chaldean year. It is, however, the historical era that was in common use among chronologers; and its freedom from intercalation rendering it peculiarly convenient for astronomical calculations, it was adopted by the early Greek astronomers Timachares and Hipparchus, and by Ptolemy and others of the Alexandrian school in Egypt. — Hales's Analysis, vol. i. p. 155, second edition. — Ed.

city, it tore along with it twenty fathoms of the wall which Sardanapalus concluding to be the accomplishment of the oracle, because by this means the river was apparently become an enemy to the city, he grew quite dispirited, and gave up all for lost. However, to prevent his falling into the hands of the enemy, he caused a large pile of wood ^a to be made in the court of his palace, and there heaping up together all his gold, silver, and royal apparel, and having enclosed his eunuchs and concubines in the midst of it, ordered it to be set on fire, and so burned himself and them together. The only action wherein ¹ those historians, who make no mention of his victories, represent him as a valiant man! Arbaces, being informed of this, marched his army through the breach of the wall, and took the city. After this he rewarded his followers according to their merit; made Belesis governor of Babylonia, Chaldea, and Arabia, according to their compact, and took the rest of the empire to himself; which put an end to the Assyrian monarchy, after it had governed all Asia ² above thirteen hundred years, and, according to the vision which Daniël ³ had of it, in its conquests had been as swift as an eagle, but now its wings were plucked. ^b

^a Concerning this pile, Athenæus informs us that it was four hundred feet high, upon which he placed one hundred and fifty golden beds, and as many golden tables; that he had thrown into it some millions of talents of gold and silver, besides the richest furniture of purple, and the finest garments; and that this pile was fifteen days in burning. To which Diodorus adds, that Belesis, by craft, obtained leave of Arbaces to carry off the ashes, under pretence of building an altar with them at Babylon, by which means he gained an immense treasure. But all this looks more like a romance than a true story. — Bedford's Scripture Chronology, b. vi. c. 2, in the notes.

This period has been hitherto considered as the Gordian knot of sacred chronology; the intricacy of which, all the chronologers have complained of, but none have been able to unravel. The difficulty of harmonizing the reigns of the kings of Judah and Israel together, has principally arisen; 1. from the discordance of some of the correspondences in the years of their respective reigns, with the direct lengths of those reigns; and 2. from not critically determining the duration of the two interregnums or vacancies, in the succession of the latter kings, so as to make them correspond with the former throughout. The whole is here adjusted and harmonized, and it is hoped, satisfactorily, upon the following principles:—1. The standard of the reigns of the kings of Judah is considered as correct; for it is verified by the concurrence of the books of Kings and Chronicles, the latter relating especially to the kings of Judah, and of Josephus, Abulfaragi, and Eutychius. The incorrectness, therefore, complained of, must be confined to the latter series; and must be remedied, by reducing it to the former. 2. The two series of reigns agree in three points of time: 1. The reigns of Rehoboam and Jeroboam began together, or in the same year, (1 Kings xii. 1—20; 2 Chron. x. 1—19;) as did also, 2. The reigns of queen Athaliah and of Jehu, who slew the two kings of Judah and Israel, Ahaziah and Jehoram, the same day, (2 Kings ix. 24—27;) and, 3. Samaria was taken by the Assyrians in the ninth year of Hoshea king of Israel, and in the sixth year of Hezekiah king of Judah, (2 Kings xviii. 10.) 3. Hence it necessarily follows, 1. That the first six reigns in Judah must be equal in length to the first eight in Israel; and also, 2. That the next seven in Judah, to the sixth of Hezekiah, including one interregnum, must be equal to the remainder in Israel, including two interregnums. 4. But upon comparing the former together, it appears that the first six of Judah amount to ninety-five years; whereas, the first eight of Israel amount to ninety-eight years, according to the table of reigns in Scripture. Consequently, three years must be retrenched from the latter, to reduce them to an equality with the former. Accordingly, one year is here subtracted from each of the reigns of Baasha, Ela, and Zimri, which are thereby reduced from current,* to complete years. And this reduction is warranted by the correspondences: for Baasha began to reign in the third year of Asa king of Judah, (1 Kings xv. 33;) and his son Ela, in the twenty-sixth of Asa, (1 Kings xvi. 8,) which gives the reign of Baasha, 26—3=23 years complete. Ela was slain in the twenty-seventh of Asa, (1 Kings xvi. 10;) he reigned, therefore, only 27—26=1 year complete. And Zimri and Omri reigned in succession, from the twenty-seventh to the thirty-eighth of Asa, (1 Kings xvi. 29;) or only 38—27=11 years complete. And as their reigns were all included in the one reign of Asa, and therefore more likely to be correctly referred thereto, this is a reason why these three reigns should be selected for reduction, rather than the succeeding or the preceding. 5. Upon comparing the latter together, it appears that there was one interregnum in the kingdom of Judah, of eleven years, and two in Israel of twenty-two years, and of ten years; which are requisite in both, to equalize the two periods together, of one hundred and seventy-six years each; counting them from the joint accession of queen Athaliah and Jehu, to the sixth of Hezekiah, and capture of Samaria, in the same year. That the lengths of these interregnums are rightly assigned, will appear from the correspondences of reigns. 1. Amaziah king of Judah, survived the death of Jehoash king of Israel, fifteen years; he died, therefore, about the sixteenth year of his son Jeroboam II. (2 Kings xiv. 17; 2 Chron. xxv. 25;) but Azariah, or Uziah, did not begin to reign

* That the reigns in these lists are all computed, in current time, according to the popular mode of computation in the east, and every where, may further be collected from that of Zedekiah, eleven years; which actually was only ten years, four months, and eight days, supposing the first year to have been complete. Compare 2 Kings xxiv. 18, with xxx. 2—4.

until the twenty-seventh year of Jeroboam II. (2 Kings xv. 1; 2 Chron. xxvi. 1;) therefore, from the death of Amaziah to the succession of his son Uziah, there was an interregnum of 27—16=11 years. 2. Jeroboam II. began to reign in the fifteenth year of Amaziah, king of Judah, and reigned forty-one years, (2 Kings xiv. 23;) he died, therefore, in the sixteenth year of Uziah, king of Judah; but Zechariah, his son, did not succeed him till the thirty-eighth of Uziah, (2 Kings xv. 8;) consequently, the first interregnum in Israel lasted 38—16=22 years. 3. Pekah, king of Israel, began to reign in the fifty-second of Uziah, (2 Kings xv. 27; 2 Chron. xxvi. 3;) and in the twentieth year of his reign was slain by Hoshea, (2 Chron. xv. 30,) in the third year of the reign of Ahaz king of Judah, (2 Kings xvi. 1;) but Hoshea did not begin to reign till the twelfth year of Ahaz, (2 Kings xvii. 1;) or the thirteenth current, (2 Kings xviii. 10;) consequently, the second interregnum in Israel lasted 13—3=10 years. 6. A curious and satisfactory confirmation of this adjustment of the reigns of the kings of Israel, is furnished by Josephus, who reckons their amount, from the revolt of the ten tribes, to the extinction of that kingdom, 210 years, (Ant. ix. 14, 1;) and if, from the whole corrected amount, 271 years, we deduct the two interregnums, 32 years, the remainder, 239 years, complete, or 240 current, gives the lengths of the reigns alone. This furnishes a decisive proof of his great skill as a chronologer, in developing the length of this intricate and perplexed period. That he was no stranger to the chasm of thirty-two years in Israel, we may infer from his taking into account the eleven years of interregnum in Judah, necessary to complete his amount of the whole period, from the foundation to the destruction of the temple, 441 years. 7. We are now competent to detect some errors that have crept into the correspondences of reigns; and which have hitherto puzzled and perplexed chronologers, and prevented them from critically harmonizing the two series; not being able to distinguish the genuine from the spurious numbers.

1. 'Jehoshaphat began to reign over Judah in the fourth year of Ahab,' (1 Kings xxi. 41.) It should be the second.

2. 'Ahaziah, the son of Ahab, began to reign over Israel in the seventeenth of Jehoshaphat,' (1 Kings xxii. 51.) It should be the twentieth of Jehoshaphat.

3. 'Jehoram, the son of Ahaziah, began to reign over Israel in the second year of Jehoram, son of Jehoshaphat,' (2 Kings i. 17.) It should be in the twenty-second year of Jehoshaphat; as also, where it is again incorrectly stated, in the eighteenth, (2 Kings iii. 1.)

4. 'Jehoram, the son of Jehoshaphat, began to reign over Judah, in the fifth year of the reign of Joram, the [grand] son of Ahab,' (2 Kings viii. 16.) It should be the fifth year from the death of Ahab; or the third year of Joram's reign. 'Jehoshaphat being then king of Judah,' is an anachronism, and an interpolation in the Masoretic text.

5. 'Jehoash began to reign over Israel in the thirty-seventh year of Joash, king of Judah,' (2 Kings xiii. 10.) It should be the thirty-ninth year; as in the accurate Aldine edition of the Greek Septuagint.

6. The correspondences by which the interregnum in Judah was collected, are incorrect; they should be 25—14=11 years.

7. 'Hoshea slew Pekah king of Israel, in the twentieth year of Jotham,' (2 Kings xv. 30.) But Jotham reigned only sixteen years, (2 Kings xv. 33.) It should be in the third year of Ahaz, as collected from 2 Kings xvi. 1.—Ed.

PRELIMINARY OBSERVATIONS.

THE two methods by which Scripture gives an account of the events by which the great plan of redeeming mercy has been carried on, are history and prophecy. Where Scripture history fails, prophecy takes place; so that the account is carried on, and the chain is not broken, till we come to the very last link of it in the consummation of all things.

The period, accordingly, on which we are now entering, though less the subject of Scripture history than most of the preceding, is more the subject of prophecy than the events of the former periods. It was the will of God that the spirit of prophecy should cease; but before that took place, an outline of the history of events till the coming of Christ was given in the prophecies which were recorded in Scripture. It is also deserving of notice, that, whereas the historical notices of the preceding periods in profane history are scanty and imperfect, they are, in regard to this period, authentic and full.

Nor can we fail to notice the number and magnitude of the revolutions which, from this era, took place among the nations of the earth, preparatory to the coming of Christ. The king of Babylon is represented in Scripture as overturning the world; but the Babylonish empire was overthrown by Cyrus, who founded the Persian empire in its room, and which greatly surpassed it in extent and glory. But this also was overthrown by Alexander, who established the Grecian empire on its ruins; and this in its turn was destined to be subverted by the Romans, whose empire surpassed all that had preceded it in extent and dominion. These mighty revolutions were designed by the sovereign Ruler of the universe, to prepare the world for the coming of Christ. ¹ 'I will overturn, overturn, overturn it, until he come whose right it is, and I will give it him.' ² 'For thus saith the Lord of hosts, I will shake the heavens and the earth, and the sea, and the dry land; and I will shake all nations, and the desire of all nations shall come, and I will fill this house with glory, saith the Lord of hosts.' These mighty empires were suffered thus to overthrow and destroy one another, to show the instability and vanity of all earthly power and greatness; which served as a foil to set forth the glory of Messiah's kingdom, which shall never be destroyed. This was the kingdom which the God of heaven was to set up;—a kingdom that shall not be left to other people, but which shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and shall stand for ever. ³

How remarkable was the preservation of the church amid those overturnings of the kingdoms of the world! It is indeed wonderful that the chosen people should have been preserved for five or six hundred years, while the earth was, as it were, rent in pieces; especially considering that the land of Judea, the chief place of the church's residence, lay in the midst of the contending nations, and was very much the object of the envy and hatred of all the heathen nations.

The first thing that offers itself to our observation in the history of this period, is the captivity of the Jews in Babylon. They were often, in the time of the judges, brought under the dominion of their enemies; but there had never been any such thing as destroying the sanctuary and city of Jerusalem, and all the towns and villages of the land, and carrying the whole body of the people into a distant country. Yet, the great plan of redeeming love and mercy was promoted by this dispensation; for it had the effect of curing the nation of their tendency to idolatry. This was a remarkable and wonderful change in that people, and what directly promoted the work of redemption. It also tended to prepare the way for the coming of the Redeemer, by diminishing the glory of the Jewish dispensation. In the language of prophecy ² it removed the crown and diadem, that it might be no more, till he should come, whose right it was. The Jews henceforward were always dependent on the governing power of other nations, that is, during the space of near six hundred years, with the exception of a short interval. They were, besides, by the captivity into Babylon dispersed over the world before the coming of Messiah,—a circumstance which tended greatly to promote the kingdom of Christ. Though Cyrus gave them liberty to return to their own land, many of them never returned, but were scattered abroad, and continued to dwell among the nations. The effect of this dispersion was the raising of a general expectation of the Messiah—the birth of a glorious person in Judea, who should reign over the world in peace and righteousness. It is unnecessary to say, how much this general dispersion of the Jews contributed to the general and rapid promulgation of the gospel.

It was during the captivity that Ezekiel and Daniel greatly enlarged the canon of Scripture. To each of these prophets Christ appeared in the form of that nature which he was afterwards to assume. These two prophets, in many respects, were more particular concerning the coming of Christ, and his glorious kingdom, than any of the prophets had been before. Daniel mentions the time in which Messiah should come. Thus does gospel light increase the nearer we approach to the dawn of the Sun of righteousness.

But Babylon itself, into which the Jews had been carried captive, was overthrown by Cyrus. Its destruction was brought about in such a manner, as wonderfully to show the hand of God, and to fulfil his word by his prophets. That great city was destroyed after it had stood about seventeen hundred years. The Jews were in consequence permitted to return to their own land, and to rebuild Jerusalem and the temple. This return of the Jews from Babylonish captivity is, next to the redemption out of Egypt, the most remarkable of all the Old Testament redemptions, and most insisted on in Scripture, as a type of the redemption of man from the dominion of sin and Satan. Their return was a remarkable dispensation of providence, inasmuch as Cyrus, the main instrument by whom it was effected, was a heathen prince, who gave them liberty not only to rebuild the city and the temple, but to receive the silver and gold which were requisite for their undertaking. Afterwards God inclined the heart of Darius to further the building of the temple with his own tribute money, and by commanding the Samaritans, who had been striving to hinder them, to help without fail, by furnishing them with all that they needed in order to it.¹ God inclined the heart of Artaxerxes, another king of Persia, to promote the work of preserving the state of the Jews, by his ample commission to Ezra; helping them abundantly with silver and gold of his own bounty, and offering more as should be needful, out of the king's treasure-house. In the prophecy of Daniel, this is called the decree for restoring and building Jerusalem; hence the seven weeks are dated.

It was during this period that Ezra added to the canon of Scripture, and that the canon of the Old Testament was completed and sealed by Malachi. Soon after this, the spirit of prophecy ceased till the appearing of the great Prophet, who came a light to lighten the Gentiles, and to be the glory of his people Israel.

The events, characters, and dispensations, which the history of the patriarchal and Mosiac economies records, were made subservient to the Redeemer,—to the representation of his offices, and to the arrival of the period suitable for the accomplishment of his work. The prophets who were successively raised up bore testimony concerning him; and their power of eloquent and of sublime description never rose so high, as when setting forth the dignity of his person, the efficacy of his work, and the glories of his kingdom. At length the Divine Redeemer, for whom this preparation had been made, appeared, and justified by the works which he performed, and the redemption which he wrought out, the light in which poetry, history, and prophecy, had held him forth. His glory was beheld as the glory of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth.

SECT. I.

CHAP. I.—From the Captivity to the Death of Cyrus.

THE HISTORY.

AFTER the return of Nebuchadnezzar and his victorious army to Babylon, all those Jews who, for fear of him, had taken refuge among neighbouring nations, or had hid themselves in the fields and deserts of their own country, hearing that Gedaliah was made governor of the land, resorted to him at Mizpah,^a where he set up his residence. Among these were Johanan and Jonathan, the sons of Kereah, and Ishmael, the son of Nethaniah, with divers others: but Ishmael came to him out of a treacherous intent only; for being of the blood-royal, he reckoned to make himself king of Judea, now that the Chaldeans were gone, and to that purpose had formed a conspiracy to kill Gedaliah, and seize on the government, wherein Baalis,^b king of the Ammonites, was confederate with him.

^a In the history of Jacob we read, that after a stay of several years at Haran, making his escape from thence, he was overtaken by Laban, his father-in-law, in a mountainous tract, which was afterwards called Gilead, that is, an heap of stones, as also Mizpah, that is, a watch tower, because, at the covenant which was made between Laban and him, an heap of stones was gathered to remain a monument of it, and upon that occasion Laban's expressions are these:—'The Lord watch between me and thee, when we are absent one from another. If thou wilt afflict my daughters, or if thou wilt take other wives besides my daughters, no man is with us; see, God is witness between me and thee.' (Gen. xxxi. 49, 50.) From that time, the place where this covenant was made, and where, probably in memory of it, a city in after-ages was built, was called Mizpah. It was situate on the east side of the river Jordan, and in the division of the land, fell to the tribe of Dan; and here it was that Gedaliah chose to fix his habitation, or perhaps was ordered to fix it here, because it lay nearest of any to Babylon, from whence he was to receive his instructions as to the administration of the government.—Wells' Geography of the Old Testament, vol. i.

^b That Ishmael, who was of the blood-royal of Judah, should attempt to take away the life of Gedaliah, is no wonder at all. His envy of the other's promotion, and his ambition to make himself a king, might be strong incitements to what he did; but why Baalis should have any hand in so black a design, we can hardly imagine any other reason than the ancient and inveterate hatred which the Ammonites always had against the Hebrews; and therefore this king of theirs, seeing that the Jewish nation was at this time, in a manner, brought to nothing, was minded to take revenge for all the injuries that his ancestors had received from them, and to give the finishing stroke to their ruin by cutting off their governor, and so dispersing all the remains of that unhappy people, which was now gathered together at Mizpah.

A. M. 3417. A. C. 587; OR, ACCORDING TO HALES, A. M. 4825. A. C. 586. JER. xl. 7—iv. DANIEL, AND EZRA i.—v.

His design, however, was not carried on so secretly, but that Johanan, the son of Kereah, got notice of it, and acquainted the governor with it; but he being a man of a generous temper, and not apt to entertain jealousies of others, took no notice of Johanan's information, but continued the same friendly correspondence with Ishmael that he had ever done. This gave the traitor an advantage against him; for pretending to pay him a visit one day, he and his confederates, at a time when the people were gone out to harvest work, fell upon him, and slew him, even while he was entertaining them at his table. With him he murdered all the Jews and Chaldeans that were at Mizpah, except some few, whom he made captives; and having kept the matter private, the next day but one, he destroyed fourscore Israelites, who were coming in a mournful manner, ^a with their oblations, into the town, and there put them all to the sword, except ten, who, for the redemption of their lives, offered him all the ^b treasures they had in the field.

After this massacre, Ishmael not thinking himself safe in Mizpah, took the captives with him, among whom were king Zedekiah's daughters, and was making the best of his way to the king of the Ammonites, when Johanan and the rest of the captains of Judah, hearing of this detestable deed, made after him with what forces they could get together: but when he perceived them coming, he left all his train behind him, and with only eight men, made his escape into the land of Ammon.

Johanan, and the rest of the captains, being thus left with all the people, and now reflecting on what Ishmael had done to Gedaliah, began to be apprehensive, that the Chaldeans might possibly revenge his death upon them; and, therefore, for fear of the worst, they retired to Chimham, ^c not far from Bethlehem, that in case they were called to an account, they might more readily make their escape into Egypt.

Jeremiah, from the time that he parted with Nebuzardan, had taken up his abode with Gedaliah the governor; but after his death, among the rest of the captives, was carried from thence by Ishmael the conspirator, and now, upon his defeat, accompanied Johanan, and the rest of his countrymen, to their new habitation at Chimham. Here they had not been long before Johanan, and the other princes of the people came to request of him that he would consult the Lord concerning their intended journey into Egypt, with warm professions, however, of a ready compliance with whatever he should think fit to enjoin them. The prophet did so: and in ten days' time returned them this answer from God:—“That if they would tarry in Judea, and live peaceably under the king of Babylon, he would screen them from their present danger, and incline the heart of their conqueror to be favourable to them; but that if they persisted in their intention of going into Egypt, he would infallibly cause every thing they dreaded, the sword, the famine, and the pestilence, to pursue them.” But notwithstanding both their own professions, and the prophet's declarations, wherein they ^d blamed Baruch, as being accessory, they were resolutely bent upon going into Egypt; and accordingly taking all the remnant of Judah, men, women, and children, the king's daughters, Jeremiah the prophet, and Baruch his scribe, with them, they went and settled in the country, until the judgments wherewith God had threatened their disobedience came upon them.

The Jews ^e were no sooner settled in Egypt, than

But whatever their views might be, it is certain that they put their design in speedy execution; for the murder of Gedaliah happened but two months after the destruction of the city and temple of Jerusalem, namely, in the seventh month (which is Tisri, and answers in part to our September and October), and on the thirtieth day of the month: for that day the Jews have kept as a fast, in commemoration of this calamity (which indeed was the completion of their ruin) ever since.—Calmet's Commentary on Jer. xl. 14; and Prideaux's Connection, anno 588.

^a The Hebrews, at the death of their friends and relations, gave all possible demonstrations of grief and mourning. The duration of which was commonly seven days; but it was lengthened or shortened according to circumstances. That for Moses and Aaron was prolonged for thirty days, which, Josephus says, ought to be sufficient for any wise man, on the loss of his nearest relation, or his dearest friend. The mourning habit among the Hebrews was not fixed either by law or custom. We only find in Scripture, that they used to tear their garments. Though it was an express prohibition in the law, ‘ye shall not make any cuttings in your flesh for the dead, nor print any marks upon you,’ (Lev. xix. 28); yet this seems to relate only to such practices, when they became superstitious, and were done in honour to false gods; for in cases of ordinary mourning for the dead, or for any other grievous disaster, the words of the prophet seem to imply, as if they had been permitted in common use: ‘both the great and the small shall die in the land; they shall not be buried, neither shall men lament for them, nor cut themselves, nor make themselves bald for them, neither shall men tear themselves in mourning to comfort them for the dead.’ Jer. xvi. 6, 7.

^b Treasures, according to the common phrase of Scripture, signify any thing that is hid or kept in reserve, whether it be gold, silver, corn, wine, oil, apparel, or any other thing; and among the people of the east, it was a usual thing to bury their corn, and other provisions, in deep holes, and caverns, which they dug and filled up so very dexterously, that no one could perceive that the earth had been moved, nor could any find them out, but those who made them.—Calmet's Commentary.

^c This place may be supposed, from 2 Sam. xix. 38, to have been anciently given by king David to Chimham, the son of old Barzillai the Gileadite, and which, at this time, bore his name, though near five hundred years after the first donation. It was in the neighbourhood of Bethlehem, about two leagues from Jerusalem, and hither the poor people betook themselves; because it was at a much farther distance from Babylon than Mizpah, and in their straight way to Egypt, in case they should determine to go thither, as they seemed inclinable to do, because there they supposed they should ‘have no war, nor hear the sound of the trumpet, nor have hunger of bread.’ Jer. xlii. 14.

^d The words in the text are,—‘The Lord our God hath not sent thee to say, go not into Egypt to sojourn there; but Baruch, the son of Neriah, setteth thee on against us, to deliver us into the hands of the Chaldeans, that they may put us to death, and carry us away captive into Babylon.’ Jer. xliii. 2, 3. But what foundation the people should have for this their accusation against Baruch, it is no easy matter to conceive; only we may suppose, that as Baruch was preserved, and taken care of by the Chaldeans, as well as his master, and was equally against maintaining the siege of Jerusalem, when Nebuchadnezzar came before it; and that as he had been some time at Babylon himself, (see Baruch i. 1, 3,) and was probably not so virulent in his speeches against the Chaldeans as the other Jews were; this, to a blind and malicious mob, was reason enough to suspect him of being engaged in the enemy's party.—Calmet's Commentary.

^e The places in which the Jews are said to have settled themselves in Egypt, were Migdol, Tahpanhes, Noph, and the country of Pathros, (Jer. xlii. 1.) Migdol is the same place in Egypt, which Moses makes mention of, (Exod. xiv. 2,) over against Baal-zephon, not far from the Red Sea. Tahpanhes is Daphne, not far from Pelusium, the first city in Egypt, in the road from Judea, and, as it were, its key. Noph is Memphis, situate above the parting of the Nile, or where the Delta begins, and not a little famous for its pyramids; and the country of Pathros is the same with Thebais, or the Upper Egypt, so called from the city Thebes, which was the first capital of it.

they gave themselves wholly up to idolatry, worshipping the queen ^a of heaven, and the other false deities of the land, whereupon Jeremiah made loud remonstrances; but all the effect which they had upon them, was only to make them more obstinate in their impiety: so that the prophet was obliged to denounce God's severest judgments against them in express terms, and at the same time to foretel, that the king of Egypt, under whose protection they lived secure, as they thought, should be delivered into the hands of Nebuchadnezzar, ^b God's agent for that purpose, in like manner as Zedekiah was; which, in the space of eighteen years afterwards, accordingly came to pass.

After this we have no more of the prophet Jeremiah, ^c and very little of his contemporary Ezekiel. ^d They both, no doubt, continued in their prophetic office until their death; but when or where that happened, or by whose means it was occasioned, the Scripture is silent, and tradition is uncertain. This however we may learn

^a By which is meant the moon at least, if not all the planets; for what we render queen, in the marginal note, is called the frame of heaven.

^b It is very observable, that in several places of Jeremiah's prophecy, namely, chap. xxv. 9, chap. xxvii. 6, and chap. xliii. 10, Nebuchadnezzar is called 'God's servant,' on purpose to show us, that as great a prince as he was, he was no more than the executioner of his commands; that he was the general of his troops, and that all the victories he gained, and the conquests he won, were by his direction and appointment: for no writers speak with so much deference of God, as do the prophets, because they only knew, by the inspiration of the divine Spirit, to express with a proper dignity what the greatest monarchs are in comparison with the divine majesty.—Cabnet's Commentary.

^c St Jerome, in the life of this prophet, and Dorotheus, in his Synopsis of the lives and deaths of the prophets and apostles, tell us, that he was stoned to death in Egypt by his own renegade countrymen the Jews, for preaching against their idolatry; and of this some interpret St Paul's ἐλέγχσαν, they were stoned, Heb. xi. 37. It appears indeed by the account we have of their behaviour, Jer. xlv. 16, that they were bent both against him and his reproofs; and therefore it was more likely that they were the authors of his death, than, as some say, the Egyptians were, for his prophesying against them, and their king Pharaoh-hophra. For the Egyptians, according to the same tradition, having by the prophet's prayers, been freed from the crocodiles, which very much infested them, had him in such great honour and esteem, that, in testimony thereof, they buried him in one of their royal sepulchres. The truth is, Jeremiah was, all his lifetime, exposed to the ill treatment of the Jews, whose irregularities, and sad apostasy, he was always reprovng; and therefore the author of the book of Ecclesiasticus, in the encomium which he gives of this prophet, seems to draw his character from the persecutions he endured: 'they intreated him evil, who nevertheless was a prophet, sanctified in his mother's womb,' Eccles. xlix. 7.

^d St Jerome, in his life of this prophet, tells us, that he was put to death by a prince of the children of Israel, whom he reprovved for his idolatry; but who this prince of the Jewish nation should be, upon the river Chebar, where Ezekiel, in the time of his captivity, lived, it is difficult to tell. He was buried, as some say, in the same cave wherein Schem and Arphaxad were deposited, upon the banks of the Euphrates; but Benjamin of Tudela, in his travels, tells us, that at some leagues from Bagdat, he saw a magnificent mausoleum, which was said to be this prophet's tomb, upon the top of which there was a famous library, wherein, as they say, was the original of the prophet's predictions, written with his own hand; that in the prophet's tomb there is a lamp continually burning, maintained at the expense of the captivity of Bagdat: that every year this tomb is frequented by the several heads of the captivity, who resort thither with a numerous retinue; and that not only the Jews, but the Persians, Medes, and many of the Mussulmen, made this a place of devotion, and came thither to make their presents, and perform their most sacred vows.—Cabnet's Dictionary, under the word Ezekiel.

from their own writings, that after they had discharged their duty to their own people the Jews, they were directed by God to address the rest of their predictions chiefly to the Gentiles. Accordingly we find Jeremiah prophesying against Egypt in the 46th chapter; against all the Philistines in the 47th; against the Moabites in the 48th; against Ammon, Edom, and other people in the 49th; and against Babylon in the 50th and 51st; with some promises here and there interspersed concerning the redemption of Israel. In like manner we find Ezekiel prophesying against the Ammonites in the 25th chapter; against the Tyrians, and those that traded with them, in the 26th and 27th; against the prince of Tyre, in the 28th; against Egypt, in the 29th, 30th, 31st, and 32d; against the shepherds of Israel, in the 34th; against the Edomites in the 35th; and against the enemies of the church of God, under the name of Gog and Magog, in the 38th and 39th; with promises of a restoration (especially in the 36th and 37th,) to his captive countrymen, and a long description of the rebuilding of the temple and city, wherewith he concludes, as a sure confirmation of it.

Daniel, who was descended from the royal family of David, in the first captivity of Judah, which happened under king Jehoiakim, together with his friends Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah, was carried to Babylon, when he was as yet but a youth. The custom among conquerors then was to change the names of their captives, especially when they were to serve in any capacity about the court; and therefore, by the order of Aspenaz, ^e master of the eunuchs, Daniel ^f was called Beltshazzar; Hananiah Shadrach; Mishael, Meshach; and Azariah, Abednego.

For three years they were instructed in all the learning of the Chaldeans, and had a daily allowance of meat and wine from the king's table; but Daniel, who was a devout observer of the religion of his country, desired of the chief eunuch, that they might be excused from that, and have only a sufficient quantity of water and pulse allowed them, which accordingly was granted; and, by the time that they had finished their studies, they were found to excel in the several parts of learning there in ^e What we render 'master of the eunuchs,' may very likely signify the chief minister of Nebuchadnezzar's court. Such officers, in the palaces of eastern princes, were usually called eunuchs; because they who had the control of the king's household, as we say, were ordinarily such, though many times it might be otherwise. The Jews have a notion, that Daniel and his three companions were, by the order of Nebuchadnezzar, made eunuchs, that the prophecy of Isaiah might be fulfilled: 'Thy sons, that shall issue from thee, shall they take away, and they shall be eunuchs in the palace of the king of Babylon,' (chap. xxxix. 7.) But that is no conclusive reason; because in that prophecy, as well as in the passage we are now upon, the name of eunuch might mean no more than any person who had an employment at court.—Cabnet's Commentary.

^f It is very remarkable, that, as all their former names related to the true God, so all the names which on this occasion were imposed upon these four Jewish youths, had some reference or other to Babylonish idols. Daniel, in Hebrew signifies, God is my judge; Beltshazzar, in Chaldee, is the treasure of Baal; Hananiah, in Hebrew, is well pleasing to God; Shadrach, in Chaldee, the inspiration of the sun; Mishael, in Hebrew, proceeding from God; Meshach, in Chaldee, belonging to the goddess Sheshach; Azariah, in Hebrew, God is my help; and Abednego, in Chaldee, the servant of Nego, that is, the sun, or the morning star, both deities among the Babylonians, and so called because of their brightness.—Cabnet's Commentary on Dan. i. 7.

A. M. 3417. A. C. 587; OR, ACCORDING TO HALES, A. M. 4825. A. C. 586. JER. xl. 7—xlv. DANIEL, AND EZRA i—v.

vogue, all the magicians in the country; ^a and especially Daniel was become very famous for his singular skill in the knowledge and interpretation of dreams.

It so happened one night, that king Nebuchadnezzar had a dream, which left strong impressions upon his spirits; but the thing which made him uneasy was, that he could not recollect the substance of it. To assist his memory in this respect, he summoned all his wise men together, those especially that pretended to divination, demanding of them what his dream was, but when they endeavoured to excuse themselves upon the presumed impossibility of the thing, he fell into such a passion, that he ordered all who professed magic ^b in his dominions to be instantly put to death.

Under this denomination and sentence were Daniel and his three friends included; and therefore, understanding the reason of this sudden decree, Daniel applied himself to Arioch, captain of the guard, desiring a short respite of its execution, in which time he did not in the least doubt but to give the king full satisfaction, both as to his dream, ^c and the interpretation of it: and so pro-

^a The prophet Daniel makes great mention of these sort of people, and ranks them under these four different kinds:—The Chartumim, the Asaphim, the Mecasphim, and the Chasdim, (chap. ii. 2.) Chartumim, according to the Septuagint, signifies sophists, but, according to St Jerome, diviners, fortune-tellers, casters of nativity, &c. Asaphim has no derivation from the Chaldee tongue, but no small resemblance to the Greek word σοφῆς, (whether the Greeks took this word from the Babylonians, or the Babylonians from them) and therefore the Seventy have rendered it by philosophers. Mecasphim is thought by some to be necromancers, such as pretended to raise the dead, to gain intelligence of things future: but the Seventy have rendered it by a word that denotes such enchanters as made use of noxious herbs and drugs, the blood of victims, and the bones of the dead for their superstitious operations. The other word Chasdim is the same with Chaldeans, and here signifies a sort of philosophers among the Babylonians, who dwelt in a separate part of the city, and were exempt from all public offices and employments. Their study was natural philosophy, astrology, divination, or the foretelling of future events by the observation of the stars, the interpretation of dreams, the science of auguries, the worship of their gods, &c., as Diodorus Siculus, (b. l.) give us an account of them.—Calmet's Dictionary under the word Magicians.

^b Magic is properly of three kinds, natural, artificial, and diabolical. The first of these is no other than natural philosophy, but highly improved and advanced; whereby the person that is well skilled in the power and operation of natural bodies, is able to produce many wonderful effects, mistaken by the illiterate for diabolical performances, but such as lie perfectly within the verge of nature. Artificial magic is what we call legerdemain or sleight of hand, the merry tricks of jugglers, as we corrupt the joculatores, far from exceeding the power of art, though many times they pass with the vulgar for diabolical likewise. Diabolical magic is that which is done by the help of the devil, who, having great skill in natural causes, may assist those who are in league and covenant with him, to do many strange and astonishing things. It seems, however, by the discourse which passed between Nebuchadnezzar and his magicians, that they had no knowledge in the sciences they pretended to; that the king himself looked upon them as no better than a pack of impostors; and that they had no familiarity with any wicked demon who might have helped them out at this dead lift; otherwise they would not have told the king, 'it is a rare thing which the king requireth, and there is none other that can show it before the king, except the gods whose dwelling is not with flesh,' (Dan. ii. 11.)—See Edwards' Body of Divinity, vol. i.

^c Some are of opinion, that Nebuchadnezzar's dream, and the interpretation thereof, were both revealed to Daniel while he was asleep; but others rather think that it was in a vision while he was awake, because the prayer and thanksgiving which he made to God seem to insinuate that he was awake; though we cannot see why he might not receive the revelation in his ceeding to his three friends, he acquainted them with what he had undertaken, and desired their joint prayer to God, that he would be pleased to reveal this great and important secret to him; which accordingly was done that very night.

The next morning, after he had returned praise and thanksgiving to God for this singular vouchsafement, he repaired to the palace, and, being introduced by the captain of the guard, was asked by the king, if he had found out his dream? "You saw," ^d says he, "O king, an image of a vast dimension, ^e excellent in brightness, but terrible in aspect. The head of this image was of fine gold, the breast and arms of silver, the belly and thighs of brass, the legs of iron, and the feet partly iron and partly clay. You saw, likewise, O King, a stone cut out of the mountain, but from whence it came you knew not. This stone, falling upon the feet of the image, brake them into pieces, and then the rest of the image mouldered into dust, which the wind dispersed, so that it was no more to be seen; but the stone which, in this manner, destroyed the image, increased to a great mountain, and filled the earth. This, O king, was the dream: and the interpretation ^f of it is this:—You, who sleep, and return God thanks for it as soon as he awoke.—Calmet's Commentary.

^d Josephus introduces Daniel as making this preamble to his discovery and explanation of the king's dream: "It is not any high conceit of my own wisdom, as if I understand more than the Chaldeans do, or any designed reproach upon them for not being able to resolve a question which I am able to unravel, that I engage in this matter; for I am not a person that pretends to more skill and knowledge than my neighbours; but it is purely the work of God, in pity to the miserable, and in mercy to my prayers, for the life and safety of myself and friends, that has now laid open this dream to me, and explained the meaning of it. Nor have I been so solicitous for the safety of myself and my companions under your displeasure, as for your honour and glory, lest you should tarnish them, by putting to death (contrary to all right and justice) so many worthy men, merely because they were not able to do a thing that is impossible for flesh and blood to perform." (Jewish Antiq. b. x. c. 11.) This is to be observed, however, that though a great part of the book of Daniel be in Hebrew, yet this speech of his to the king, as well as the dialogue which passed between the king and the magicians; the king's decree, wherein he orders the golden statue to be worshipped; and that other, wherein he declares his dream of the vast large tree, which Daniel explained; the history of the feast which Belshazzar made: of his profanation of the sacred vessels, and the terrible vision of the handwriting which he saw upon the wall; the beginning of the reign of Darius; the honours conferred on Daniel, and the vision of the four beasts, denoting the four monarchies; that all these, I say, (namely, from the fourth verse of the second chapter, to the beginning of the eighth chapter,) are wrote in the Chaldee or Syriac language, which, at that time, were both the same, and both as familiar to the prophet as was his mother tongue.—Calmet's Commentary on Dan. ii. 4.

^e Grotius accurately observes, that the image appeared with a glorious lustre in the imagination of Nebuchadnezzar, whose mind was wholly taken up with admiration of worldly pomp and splendour; whereas the same monarchies were represented to Daniel under the shape of fierce and wild beasts, (ch. vii.) as being the great supporters of idolatry and tyranny in the world.—Louth's Commentary on Dan. ii.

^f By these different emblems of metals and stone, God intended to signify to Nebuchadnezzar the several empires that were to be in the world. The Assyrian or Chaldean is represented by gold, because it was the first and the most magnificent, if not the most extensive, and Nebuchadnezzar being then upon the throne, is said to be head of it. That of silver is the Persian, founded by Cyrus, upon the ruins of the Chaldean, but inferior to the Chaldean in its duration at least, if not in its extent. That of brass is the Grecian, founded by Alexander, upon the ruins of the Persian, and its character is, that it 'should bear rule over are supreme above all other kings, and to whom the God of heaven hath given power, and strength, and glory, are signified by this head of gold. After you another kingdom shall arise, but as inferior to yours as silver is to gold. After that there shall arise a third kingdom, emblemed by brass, which shall govern the earth; but the fourth kingdom shall be as strong as iron, and vanquish all the rest. And whereas the feet were partly iron, and partly clay, this kingdom shall be divided; part of it shall be strong, and part of it weak, as clay and iron cannot be solidly mixed together; but in the times of these empires, the God of heaven shall set up another kingdom, signified by the stone, which shall prevail above all, and itself never be destroyed," &c.

Surprised at this wonderful discovery, the king fell prostrate before Daniel, ^a and was ready to pay him divine honours. He loaded him, however, with presents and rich gifts; set him at the head of his learned men; made him governor over the whole province of Babylon; and, at his request, put his three friends into places of the highest trust under him. But all this happened ^b before the siege of Jerusalem.

all the earth,' (Dan. ii. 39,) which was verified in its great founder; for, upon his return from India to Babylon, the ambassadors of almost all the known parts of the world resorted thither to pay their homage and acknowledgment of his dominion. That of iron is the Roman empire, which is distinguished by its 'breaking in pieces, and subduing all things,' (ver. 40.) For, whilst it was in its full strength and vigour, under its consuls and first emperors, it brought under its dominion all the kingdoms and states that were then subsisting in Europe, Africa, and a great part of Asia; but, from that time, it became a mixture of iron and clay. Its emperors proved most of them vicious and corrupt, either by their tyranny, making themselves hateful to their subjects, or by their follies and vices, contemptible. Lastly, that of the 'stone out of the mountain,' is the fifth monarchy, or the kingdom of the Messiah; which, against all the power and policy of the Roman empire, prevailed, not by an external force, but by the powerful preaching of the gospel, to the suppression and defeat of wickedness and impiety, idolatry, and superstition, and 'it shall stand for ever, and never be destroyed,' (Dan. ii. 44,) which can be said of no other kingdom but that of Jesus Christ, which, for these eighteen hundred years and upwards, has withstood the violence of persecutions, and all other contrivances formed against it, and has the sure promises of its almighty Founder on its side, that 'the gates of hell shall not prevail against it,' Mat. xvi. 18.—Calmet's Commentary.

^a Nebuchadnezzar seems, in a sudden transport, to have looked upon Daniel as having something more than human in him, just as the barbarians thought of St Paul, (Acts xxviii. 6:) and therefore it is said, that 'he fell on his face and worshipped him;' because the doing of reverence, by way of prostration, is not only an act of worship paid to God, but frequently given to kings and great men in the Old Testament, according to the custom of eastern countries, (2 Sam. ix. 6:) and sometimes even to prophets, on account of the sanctity of their office, (1 Kings xviii. 7:) nor was it usually refused by them, except such circumstances were added to it, as made it look like divine worship, and then it was always rejected, as in the case of St Peter, Acts x. 25.—Louth's Commentary on Dan. ii. 43.

^b Namely, in the seventh year of Jehoiakim, according to Prideaux. [This however seems to be a mistake. The most accurate chronologers suppose it to have happened not only after the destruction of Jerusalem, but even after Nebuchadnezzar's devastation of Egypt; and the arguments by which they support their opinion appear to be conclusive. 1. Daniel was old enough to be included, with his three friends, among the Magi condemned to death, for not telling to the king his dream, and not only so, but to be appointed Archimagus on his declaring and interpreting that dream. 2. He styles Nebuchadnezzar king of kings, invested with universal dominion over all the earth; but this could not be said even in the hyperbolical style of the east, till after the king's return from the conquest of Egypt. Jackson and Nebuchadnezzar being now returned home, out of the spoils which he had brought from Syria and Palestine, ordered a golden statue ^c to be made, thirty yards in height, and of proportionable bigness; and having set it up in the plains of Dura, near Babylon, he summoned all his subjects, of whatever order and degree, to be present at the dedication of it, and the moment they heard the music strike up, which was to be the signal, to fall prostrate on their faces, and adore it, upon pain of being thrown into a burning ^d furnace.

Among the captive Jews, the three friends of Daniel, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, were accused to the king as having violated his command; and when they were brought before him, persisted in their refusal to pay adoration to the image, with so much constancy, that the king, being incensed thereat, ordered those about him to have the furnace made seven times hotter than it was before; to bind these bold contemners of his will, and cast them immediately into it.

The furnace indeed was so intensely hot, that the persons who were ordered to throw them in, were scorched to death; but they themselves came to no manner of harm; for an angel ^e from heaven came, and,

Hales therefore place the discovery and interpretation of Nebuchadnezzar's first dream 569 years B. C., or seventeen years after the destruction of Jerusalem.—Hales's Analysis, vol. ii. pp. 455-6, second edition.]—Ed.

^c Grotius is of opinion that the image which Nebuchadnezzar set up was the figure of his father Nabopolassar, whom, by this means, he intended to deify; but others think that it was his own statue which he erected, to gain the adorations of his people in this form. We cannot, however, in what we find Nebuchadnezzar saying to Daniel's friends, perceive that he any where upbraids them with contempt offered either to his person, or his statue, but only that they 'would not serve his gods, nor worship the image which he had set up,' (Dan. iii. 14.) And therefore others have imagined, that this was neither his own nor his father's statue, but that of Jupiter, which was afterwards found in the temple of Belus, when Xerxes plundered it of its immense riches, among which were several images of massy gold, but one more especially forty feet high, which might be the same that Nebuchadnezzar consecrated in the plains of Dura. For though that is said to have been sixty cubits, that is, ninety feet high, yet we may suppose, that it stood upon a pedestal of fifty feet high, and so the image and the pedestal together, might make ninety, (see vol. i. p. 310. in the notes,) otherwise there would be no proportion between its height and its breadth, according to the description we have of it in Dan. iii. 1.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 573.—[That the image which Xerxes found in the temple of Belus was forty feet high, is indeed said by Diodorus Siculus (b. ii.); but according to Herodotus, (b. i. c. 183,) it was only twelve cubits or eighteen feet high, and this is surely the more probable account of the two. It may, however, have been the image set up by Nebuchadnezzar; for in the height of that image, as stated in the book of Daniel, the pedestal or pillar, on which it was placed in the plain of Dura, is probably included.]—Bishop Gleig.—Ed.

^d This kind of punishment was pretty common in these parts of the world, so that some will have it, that Abraham, before he departed from Chaldea, was made to undergo it, but escaped by a miraculous preservation, founding their opinion on Gen. xi. 31. Of this furnace, in particular, it is related, that the king's servants having received the command to heat it seven times hotter, 'ceased not to make the oven hot with rosin, pitch, tow, and small wood; so that the flame streamed forth above the furnace forty and nine cubits, and passed through and burned the Chaldeans it found about the furnace. The Song of the three holy Children, ver. 23, &c.—For an inquiry into the construction of this furnace or place of fire, see Taylor's Fragments to Calmet, and Calmet abridged, p. 409.—Ed.

^e Nebuchadnezzar's expression upon this occasion is, 'Lo! I see four men walking loose in the midst of the fire, and the form of the fourth is like the Son of God,' (Dan. iii. 25.) Wheresuspending the agency of the fire, walked in the midst of the furnace with them, blessing ^a and praising God; so that when the king, who staid to see the execution, perceived it, he started up on a sudden, and, coming nearer to the mouth of the furnace, called upon them to come forth, which they instantly did, in the presence of him and all his attendants, without ^b so much as an hair of their heads being singed, or the least smell of fire about them. Convinced by the greatness of this miracle, the king himself glorified the God of Israel, published an edict in favour of the Jewish religion, and gave these three glorious confessors still higher promotion in the province of Babylon.

Not long after this, the judgments which the prophet Jeremiah ¹ had denounced against his countrymen the Jews, when they rejected the counsel of God, and fled into Egypt for protection, (as they vainly thought,) be-upon some have thought that this prince, having little or no knowledge of the true religion, imagined that he saw some demigod, an Apollo, a Hercules, a Mercury for instance, the son of a superior god walking with the three Hebrew youths in the fiery furnace. The notion, it must be owned, agrees very well with the ancient theology of the Greeks, to which that of the Chaldeans had no small resemblance; but as angels are sometimes in Scripture called the 'sons of God,' (Job i. 6. and xxxviii. 7.) and most nations had not only a belief of their existence, but high conceptions likewise of their power, the king explains himself what he means by 'the son of God,' when, in joy for their deliverance, he cries out, 'blessed be the God of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, who hath sent his angel, and delivered his servants that trusted in him!' (Dan. iii. 28.) For, as it is in the song of the three holy children, "the angel of the Lord came down into the oven, together with Azariah and his fellows, and smote the flame of the oven, and made the midst of the furnace as it had been a moist and whistling wind, so that the fire touched them not at all, neither hurt nor troubled them." [Instead of 'the son of God,' as we have it in Dan. iii. 25, Dr Boothroyd translates 'a son of God,' and Dr A. Clarke has the following remarks on the passage:—"What notion could this idolatrous king have of the Lord Jesus Christ? for so the place is understood by thousands; bar elohim signifies a son of the gods, that is, a divine person or angel; and so the king calls him in ver. 28: 'God hath sent his angel, and delivered his servants.' And though even from this some still contend that it was the angel of the covenant, yet the Babylonish king knew just as much of the one as he did of the other. No other ministrations were necessary: a single angel from heaven was quite sufficient to answer this purpose, as that which stopped the mouths of the lions when Daniel was cast into their den."—Dr Clarke's Commentary on Dan. iii. 25.—Ed.

^a According to the vulgar Latin edition, in the third chapter of Daniel, between the 23d and 24th verses, is added the 'Song of the three children;' but being nowhere extant, either in the Hebrew or Chaldee language, and never received in the canon of holy writ by the Jewish church, or by the ancient Christians, our church has thought proper to place it among the apocryphal writings, where it stands next to the book of Baruch, though the church of Rome, by a decree of the council of Trent, (sess. 4.), has not only given it, but the history of Susanna likewise, and of Bel and the Dragon (which most of the ancients looked upon as mere fables,) a place among the canonical Scriptures. The Song itself consists of two parts: a prayer, and a thanksgiving. The prayer is a devout confession of the sins of the people, and acknowledgment of God's righteousness, in bringing their captivity, and other calamities, upon them. And the thanksgiving is a solemn excitation of all creatures whatever, but more especially of the three Hebrew children, who were thus 'saved from the hauds of death, to bless the Lord, praise him, and exalt him above all for ever.'

gan to operate; for, when Nebuchadnezzar understood, that the subjects of Pharaoh Hophra had revolted from him, and declared Amasis, an officer of his court, their king, he took the advantage of the intestine troubles ensuing thereupon, and having in a short time overrun the country from Migdol to Syene, ^d that is, from one end of Egypt to the other, he plundered and laid it waste; and of the Jews, who, after the murder of Gedaliah, had fled thither, some he slew, and others he carried away captive to Babylon; so that scarce any escaped but such as fled out of Egypt, and afterwards settled themselves in their own land, at the end of the captivity. ^e

Having thus reduced the king of Egypt, and constituted Amasis his viceroy, he returned to Babylon, where he had another dream, which gave him fresh disquiet. This dream he very well remembered; and therefore he sent for his own magicians first, in hopes that they could have interpreted it; but when he met with no satisfaction from them, he was forced to have recourse to Daniel again; and thus, upon his entrance, he accosted him:

"I saw ^f a tree of a prodigious bigness, which seemed to reach from earth to heaven. It was fair and full of fruit; yielded shelter to the beasts and fowls, and sustenance to all flesh. I saw ^g likewise an angel

^c The occasion of this revolt is to this effect related by Herodotus.—That Pharaoh Hophra, whom he calls Apries, having lost a great army in Libya, and, as some imagined, on purpose, that, being rid of them, he might with more ease and security govern the rest, fell under the resentment of his subjects to such a degree, that several of them joined together in a body, and revolted from him; that, to appease and reduce them to their duty, he sent Amasis, one of the officers of his court, to them, but, instead of his persuading them, they prevailed with him to be their king; that hereupon Hophra sent Paterbamis, a person of the first rank, to arrest Amasis, and bring him with him; but, when he returned without being able to execute his commission, he commanded his ears and his nose to be immediately cut off, which indignity, to a man of his worth and character, so exasperated the rest of his subjects, that they almost all forsook him; so that he was forced to hire an army of foreigners, wherewith he attempted to give Amasis battle not far from Memphis; but had the misfortune to be vanquished, taken prisoner, and carried to the city Sais, where he was strangled in his own palace.—Herod. b. i., and Diod. Sic., b. i. part 2.

^d This is a city in the southern frontiers of Egypt, between Thebes and the great cataracts of the Nile, of which the ancients speak frequently, as the farthest part in Egypt of any note towards Ethiopia.—Catmet's Dictionary, under the word.

^e These transactions probably took place before the erection of the golden image, and the miraculous deliverance of the three children. See previous note by Ed.

^f It is very observable, that in the writings of the prophets, princes are frequently compared to trees, (Ezek. xvii. 5, 6, and xxxi. 3. Jer. xxii. 15. Ps. xxxvii. 35.) and it is the notion of Grotius, that a tree seen in a dream, according to the principles of the Indians, Persians, and Egyptians, denotes some great and excellent personage; but nothing is more precarious than these principles, or more uncertain than these observations, because in the dreams which come from God, he may represent an eminent person under a thousand different types, as well as that of a stately tree.—Catmet's Commentary on Dan. iv. 7.

^g The words in our translation are, I saw 'a watcher,' which, as it came down from heaven, could be no other than an angel. The Chaldee word is nir, from whence St Jerome imagines, that the pagans derived their Iris, the messenger of the gods; and by some expressions in Dan. iv. 17, it looks as if the Chaldeans had a notion, for the king, we may suppose, speaks according to the common sentiments of the people, that these watchers, or holy ones in heaven, did constitute an assembly of judges, or were an order of blessed spirits, who took under their cognizance and decision the fate of men; for, by the decree of these watchers it was, that coming down from heaven, who cried with a loud voice, Hew down the tree, cut off the branches, shake off the leaves, scatter the fruit, and let all creatures depart from it; but let the stump remain in the earth, and bind it with a band of iron and brass, in the tender grass of the field, and let it be wet with the dew of heaven, and let his portion be with the beasts in the grass of the earth: let his heart be changed from that of a man, and a beast's heart be given him, ^a and let seven times pass over him."⁷

As soon as Daniel heard the dream, he was so affected with the dreadful judgments which it portended to the king, that he stood silent for the space of an hour; but being encouraged by the king to expound the thing to him, be it what it would, he addressed himself to him in these words:—"The tree, O king, which thou sawest in thy dream, is thyself; for thy greatness reacheth unto the heavens, and thy dominions to the end of the earth: but the angel which came from heaven with orders to cut down the tree, denotes the decree of the Most High, which is determined against thee, namely, that thou shalt be driven from men, and thy dwelling shall be with the beasts of the field; thou shalt eat grass with the oxen, and be wet with the dew of heaven; that seven years shall pass over thee, before thou comest to consider that God ruleth over the kingdoms of men; and that, after such a term, thou shalt be restored to thy kingdom again, which is the thing intimated by the stump of the tree that was ordered to be left. And now that thou hast heard the interpretation of this dream, permit me, O king, to advise thee to atone for thy sins by an holy life, and by acts of mercy to the poor, and to recommend thyself to the mercy of God, that he may prolong thy posterity."⁸ This was the advice of a faithful minister; but Nebuchadnezzar, it is to be feared, had ^b not the heart to pursue it.

the tree, in the vision, was ordered to be cut down.—Calmel's Commentary.

^a The ambiguity of this expression, which the prophet, in his exposition of the dream, still adheres to, has occasioned a great variety of opinions concerning it. Some maintain, that, as the Persians distinguished their years into two seasons, winter and summer, the seven years of Nebuchadnezzar must be reckoned in this manner, which will therefore reduce them to the space of three years and a half. Dorotheus, in his Synopsis of the lives of the prophets and apostles, tells us, that God did indeed condemn Nebuchadnezzar to seven years' habitation with brutes; but that, at the prayers and intercessions of Daniel, the seven years were reduced to seven months. The word time, according to others, denotes no more than the space of a month; so that the king's disorder, of course, lasted no longer than seven months: whereof, according to their computation, for the first forty days he continued in his frenzy as a madman; in the forty days following he beaviled his offences, and in the last forty days he recovered by degrees from his infirmity: but all these are idle conjectures. A year was a common measure of time among the Chaldeans, especially in the chronicles of their kings; and, therefore, in this particular, we need no other interpreter for Daniel than Daniel himself, who, in sundry places of this prophecy, particularly in chap. xii. 7, has set a time and times, and the dividing, or half of a time, for the space of three years and a half.—Calmel's Dictionary under the word Nebuchadnezzar.

^b God delayed the execution of his threats against this prince, and gave him a whole year's reprieve, (chap. iv. 29,) to see if he would repent, and turn unto him; but perceiving that he still persisted in his crimes, as soon as the measure of his iniquity was full, he smote and reduced him to the condition of a beast. This is Theodoret's notion of the matter; but St Jerome rather thinks, that this king being terrified with the threats, and touch-

His cessation from war, in which he had been long engaged, had by this time given an opportunity of finishing his stately buildings at Babylon; and upon the survey of these, as well as other monuments of his greatness, he became so intoxicated with pride and arrogance, that God, in punishment of his haughty mind, deprived him of his senses, and for exalting himself above the state of men reduced him to the condition of a beast.

For seven years he lived abroad in the fields, eating grass like an ox, and taking up his lodging on the ground in the open air. But at the expiration of this time, when he became sensible of God's superior power and dominion, his senses returned to him again. His kingdom was restored, and he re-instated in his former majesty; whereupon he made this solemn and grateful acknowledgment; ¹ 'And now I, Nebuchadnezzar, praise, and extol, and honour the King of heaven, all whose works are truth, and his ways judgment, and those that work in pride, he is able to abase, when he pleases.'

Upon the death of Nebuchadnezzar, ^c (for he lived not long after his restoration,) his son Evil-merodach succeeded to the throne of Babylon, and to make some amends for his father's hard usage of Jehoiachin, the captive king of Judah, he released him, as was said before, from an imprisonment that had lasted near thirty-seven years, and promoted him to great honour in his palace. His reign however was but short; for his lusts and wickednesses had, in the space of two years, made him so intolerable, that even his own relations conspired against him, and put him to death; whereupon Neriglissar, his sister's husband, who was at the head of the conspiracy, reigned in his stead; and as Jehoiachin ^d did not long survive him, Salathiel, his son, succeeded as nominal prince ^e of the Jews. Upon his accession to the ed with the exhortations of the prophet, began to set about his reformation, and by acts of charity and mercy, to reconcile himself to God, for which he obtained a delay of his punishment for a year's space; but that, instead of persevering in these good purposes, he suffered himself to fall into pride, upon the contemplation of the mighty works he had done, and so, by his vanity, lost what he had gained by his charity.—Calmel's Commentary.

^c This prince died in the year of the world 3442, and B. C. 562, according to Hales, A. M. 4850, and B. C. 561, after he had reigned from the death of his father, according to the Babylonish account, three and forty years. He was certainly one of the greatest princes that had appeared in the east for many years before him, and according to Megasthenes, (as he is cited by Josephus, Antiq. b. x. c. 11.) both for his enterprises and performances, far excelled even Hercules himself. The same historian (as he is quoted by Eusebius, Præp. b. ix. c. 41.) informs us, that, a little before his death, he foretold his subjects of the coming of the Persians, and their subduing the kingdom of Babylon; but this he might gather from the prophet Daniel, and especially from the interpretation of his dreams.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 562.

^d It is not unlikely that Jehoiachin, being a favourite, fell with him; for that best agrees with Jeremiah's prophecies concerning him, wherein it is denounced, (chap. xxii. 30,) that he 'should not prosper in his days;' which could not be so well verified of him, had he died in the full possession of all that prosperity to which Evil-merodach had advanced him.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 559.

^e Long after the loss of all authority, the Jews kept up the title of a king among them, and had a person descended of the house of David, who, by the name of 'the head of the captivity,' was acknowledged and honoured as a prince, and, as far as was consistent with the government they lived under, was invested with some sort of jurisdiction over them. Nay, to this very day, throne, Neriglissar made great preparations for war against the Medes, which obliged Cyaxares, their king, to call in the assistance of his nephew Cyrus ^a out of Persia, who, coming with a body of thirty thousand Persians, was by his uncle made general of the Medes likewise, and thereupon, with his joint forces, gave Neriglissar battle, slew him, and put his army to the rout.

The death of this prince proved a great loss to the Babylonians, especially considering that his son Laborosoarchod, who succeeded him, was in every thing the very reverse of his father, a man given to all manner of wickedness, ^b cruelty, and injustice, for which he became so odious to his own subjects, that they conspired against him, and slew him after he had reigned only nine months.

Belshazzar ^c (in all probability the grandson of the great Nebuchadnezzar) succeeded him; in the first year the same pageantry is said to be kept up among the Jews, and chiefly with this view, that they may be furnished from hence with an answer against the Christians, urging the prophecy of Jacob against them, namely, that 'the sceptre is departed from Judah': for thereupon their usual reply is, that the sceptre is still preserved among them in the head of the captivity; though some of them have modestly enough to give up this.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 559.

It is on all hands agreed, that Astyages king of the Medes had a son, whom profane history calls Cyaxares; and a daughter whose name was Mandana, married to Cambyses, a Persian, by whom she had Cyrus; but whether this Cambyses was king of the country, or only a private person, it is not so well agreed. The two chief historians who write of this matter, are Herodotus and Xenophon; but their relations in this regard are different; forasmuch as the latter makes his father king of Persia, the former a meaner man. The account of Herodotus indeed contains narratives that are much more strange and surprising, and consequently more diverting and acceptable to the reader; and for this reason, more have chosen to follow him than Xenophon; but though Xenophon (as being a great commander, as well as a great politician) had certainly grafted many maxims of war and policy into his history, yet where nothing of this appears, he must be allowed to be an historian of much more credit in matters of fact than Herodotus. Herodotus having travelled through Egypt, Syria, and several other countries, in order to the writing of his history, did, as travellers used to do, put down all matters upon trust, and in many, no doubt, was imposed on; but Xenophon was a man of another character. He wrote all things with great judgment, and due consideration; and having lived in the court of Cyrus the younger, a descendant of the Cyrus whom we now speak of, had opportunities of being better informed of what he wrote concerning this great prince than Herodotus had; and confining himself to this argument only, no doubt he examined all matters relating to it more thoroughly, and gave a more accurate and just account of them, than could be expected from the other, who wrote of all things at large, as they came in his way.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 563.

^b Two acts of his tyrannical violence towards two of his principal nobility, Gobrias and Gadates, are particularly mentioned by Xenophon, namely, that the only son of the former he slew at a hunting, to which he had invited him, for no other reason but his throwing a dart with success at a wild beast, when he himself had missed it; and that the other he caused to be castrated, merely because one of his concubines had commended him for a handsome man.—Cyropædia, b. v.

^c Great is the difference among historians, and others, who this Belshazzar (who is generally believed to be the same with the Nebonnedus in Berosus, and the Labynetus in Herodotus) was. Some will have him to be of the royal blood of Nebuchadnezzar, and others no way related to him. Some maintain that he was a Babylonian, and others affirm that he was a Mede; and of those who allow him to be of the royal family of Nebuchadnezzar, some will have it that he was his son, and others that he was his grandson; and, therefore, to clear this matter, we must observe, 1st, That Belshazzar, be he who he will, was cer-

of whose reign, ¹ Daniel had his dream of the four beasts, representing the four empires of the Chaldeans, Persians, Greeks, and Romans; and in the third, the famous vision of the ² ram and the he-goat, by the latter of which was signified Alexander the Great, and by the former Darius Codomannus, the last of the Persian kings, who were the successors of Cyrus. Cyrus, indeed, who was to lay the foundation of the Persian monarchy, had several conflicts with Belshazzar's armies; but at length, having overthrown him in a pitched battle, he shut him up in the city of Babylon, and there besieged him.

During the siege, Belshazzar having made a great feast for all his courtiers, ordered that the vessels of gold and silver, which his grandfather Nebuchadnezzar had taken out of the temple of Jerusalem, should be brought into the banqueting house, that he and his princes, together with his wives and concubines, might drink out of them; which accordingly was done; and, to add to their profaneness, in the midst of their cups, they sang songs in the praise of their several idols. But it was not long before God ^d put tainly of the seed of Nebuchadnezzar, because he is expressly called his son in several places of the 5th chapter of Daniel, and in 2 Chron. xxxvi. 20, it is said, that Nebuchadnezzar and his children, or offspring, reigned in Babylon until the kingdom of Persia commenced. 2dly, That, according to the prophecy of Jeremiah, (chap. xxvii. 7.) the nations of the east were to serve Nebuchadnezzar and his son, and his son's son; and therefore he must have had a son, and a son's son, successors to him in the throne of Babylon. 3dly, That as Evil-merodach was Nebuchadnezzar's son, of all the kings that reigned after him at Babylon, none but Belshazzar could be his son's son; for Neriglissar was only his daughter's husband, and Laborosoarchod was Neriglissar's son; so that neither of them was either son or grandson to Nebuchadnezzar. 4thly, That, according to Herodotus, (b. i.) the last king of Babylon, who, without doubt, was Belshazzar, because, immediately after his death, the kingdom was given to the Medes and Persians, (Dan. v. 28, 30, 31.) was son to the great queen Nitocris; but now Nitocris, to have a child that was grandson to Nebuchadnezzar, could be wife to no other than Evil-merodach; and therefore, putting all this together, it appears that Belshazzar, the last king of Babylon, was the son of Evil-merodach by Nitocris his queen, and consequently son's son to Nebuchadnezzar; nor must it seem strange, that we find him, in Dan. v. called 'Nebuchadnezzar's son,' and 'Nebuchadnezzar his father,' because it is the usual style of Scripture to call any ancestor upward, father, and any descendant downward, son.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 555. [It is not often safe to differ on a point of ancient history with Dr Prideaux; but the series of Nebuchadnezzar's successors on the throne of Babylon, as given by Dr Hales, seems more consistent than this, both with itself and with sacred Scripture. That Evil-merodach—the Ilverodam in Ptolemy's canon—was the son and immediate successor of Nebuchadnezzar, seems to be universally admitted. According to Hales, however, he was not cut off in a conspiracy of his own subjects, but slain in battle by Cyrus when commanding the armies of his uncle and father-in-law Cyaxares, whose territories Evil-merodach had prepared wantonly to attack. He was succeeded by his son Neriglissar, the Belshazzar of Daniel, and grandson of Nebuchadnezzar the great; and it was Belshazzar or Neriglissar, who so cruelly oppressed his own subjects, and exercised such acts of tyrannic violence on Gobrias and Gadates, as provoked them to excite a conspiracy against him, in which he was slain, according to Ptolemy's canon, seventeen years before the final overthrow of the kingdom of Babylon. Laborosoarchod, who is, by our author, called the predecessor of Belshazzar, we learn from Berosus to have been his son, and, though a mere boy (παις), to have succeeded him in the kingdom; but he was slain, in a conspiracy, nine months afterwards, and is therefore omitted in Ptolemy's canon.]—Hales's Analysis, &c. vol. ii. p. 503, &c. and vol. iii. p. 81, &c.—Ed.

^d Next to murder, no sin is so remarkably punished in this world as that of sacrilege. This appears from innumerable instances taken from all histories, both sacred and profane. But a damp to the king's mirth, by causing a hand to appear upon the wall, which, in three words, wrote the sentence of his condemnation. The king saw the hand that wrote; and being exceedingly affrighted and troubled at it, he commanded all his wise men, magicians, and astrologers to be immediately called, that they might read the writing, and explain its meaning; but when none ^a of them could do either, notwithstanding the great honours ^b and presents which he offered them, at the instance of the ^c queen-mother, Daniel was sent for.

As soon as he came into the king's presence, he ^d received him very courteously, and made him the same in the heathen story, remarkable examples of this kind are the miserable end of the Phocians, who robbed the temple of Delphos, and were the occasion of that war, which was called from thence 'the holy war;' the destruction of the Gauls in their attempt upon the same temple; and of Crassus, who plundered the temple of Jerusalem, and that of the Syrian goddess; as these two last stories are related by Prideaux, part 2.—Louth's Commentary on Dan. v. 5.

a The writing very probably might be in a character unknown to the Chaldeans, as the old Hebrew, Phœnician, and Samaritan were; or if they were acquainted with the character, yet such is the genius of most of the oriental languages, where so little use is made of vowels, and where the pronunciation and sequel of the discourse generally determine the signification of the letters, that a man may be a perfect master of a language, and yet not able to read and comprehend a word, when it stands alone, and without any context, as it is in the case of Mene, Tekel, Upharsin. A man, for instance, that understands the Hebrew tongue never so well, were he to meet dir standing alone, would have much ado to read them, because, according to the manner that we pronounce them, the letters will admit of many different significations; and it is much the same in the Chaldee language, wherein the words we are now speaking of were wrote.—Calmet's Commentary on Dan. v. 7.

b The king's words are these:—'Whosoever shall read this writing, and show me the interpretation thereof, shall be clothed with scarlet, and have a chain of gold about his neck, and shall be the third ruler in the kingdom;' (Dan. v. 7.) From whence it appears, that the kings of Babylon wore the same ornaments, and, in rewarding their favourites, gave the same marks of honours that the kings of Persia and their successors did. For purple, we find in several Greek authors, was the ordinary habit of the kings of Persia, and of the princes of their court that were in the highest posts of honour. The chain or collar of gold was one of the greatest marks of distinction that the Persian kings could bestow upon their subjects; and 'to be the third ruler of the kingdom,' was the same sublime office that Darius the Mede put Daniel in, (ch. vi. 1, 2,) when he constituted him one of the presidents over the hundred and twenty princes that he had made governors over provinces.—Xenophon's Cyropædia, b. 8; Diodorus, b. xviii; Josephus's Antiquities, b. xi. c. 6; Brisson on the kingdom of the Persians, b. i.

c In the 2d verse of the fifth chapter of Daniel, we read, 'that the king, his princes, his wives, and his concubines' were all at the feast, which he made for them; and yet in the 10th verse it follows, that the queen, upon hearing of the news of the handwriting, 'came into the banquet house;' but then it must be observed, that this queen was not one of his wives, but Nitocris, his mother, and she seems there to be called the queen by way of eminence, because she had the regency of the kingdom under her son, for which her great wisdom duly qualified her. For this reason Herodotus speaks of her, as if she had been sovereign of the kingdom, in the same manner as Semiramis is said to have been, and attributes to her all those works about Babylon which other authors ascribe to her son.—Prideaux's Connect. anno 547.

d And yet it is observable, that when he came into his presence, he asked him, 'art thou that Daniel?' which seems to imply, though he was one of the chief ministers of state, (Dan. v. 13,) the king did not know him; but this only shows, that Belshazzar was a man who minded nothing but his pleasures, and left all things else to the management of others; a conduct too often followed by such princes as think kingdoms made for nothing else but to serve their pleasures, and gratify their lusts! —Prideaux's Connection, anno 547.

offer of honours and presents, that he had done to his own magicians, if he would but explain the writing. Daniel modestly refused the offers he made him; but having undertaken to perform what he required of him, he first reproved him, with some freedom, for his ingratitude to God, who had advanced him to the rank of a sovereign, and for the profanation of the vessels which were consecrated to his service; and then proceeded to the interpretation of the words, which were these, Mene, Tekel, Upharsin. "Mene," says he "which signifies number, intimates, that the days, both of your life and of your reign, are numbered, or that you have but a short time to live. Tekel, which signifies weight, intimates, that you have been weighed in the balance of God's justice, and found too light; and Upharsin, ^e which signifies fragment, intimates, that your kingdom shall be divided, and given to the Medes and Persians;" which accordingly came to pass; for that very night, in the midst of their feasting and revelling, the city ^f was taken by sur^e Daniel, in repeating the words, instead of Upharsin, puts in Peres; but they both signify the same thing.

^f Cyrus had lain before the town to little or no purpose for the space of two years, when, understanding that a great annual feast was approaching, wherein the Babylonians, in honour of their idol Sheshach, were wont to spend the whole night in revelling and drunkenness, he thought this no improper time to attempt to surprise them. To this purpose, having posted one part of his men at the place where the river ran into the city, and another where it came out, with orders to enter by way of the channel, as soon as they found the river fordable: about the close of the evening he fell to work, broke down the dams, and turned aside the stream; so that, by the middle of the night, the river was so drained, that the parties according to their orders, entered the channel, and finding the gates leading down to the river open, by them they ascended into the city, and made directly to the palace, where they slew the king, and all those that were about him. By this stratagem Cyrus became master of Babylon, but he took no care to repair the breach in the banks of the river; so that all the country on that side was overflowed, and the current which went to Babylon grew afterwards so shallow, as to become unfit for the smallest navigation. So fully verified were all these prophecies concerning Babylon: 'Behold I will stir up the Medes against her,' (Isa. xiii. 7.) 'I will dry up her sea, and make her springs dry,' (Jer. li. 36.) 'Babylon, the glory of kingdoms, the beauty of the Chaldees' excellency, shall be like Sodom and Gomorrah,' (Is. xlii. 19.) 'For I will make it a possession for the bitter, and pools of water,' (Is. xiv. 23.) 'saith the King, whose name is the Lord of hosts.'—Prideaux's Connection, anno 547. [According to Dr Hales, the taking of Babylon by Cyrus was long after this, on the revolt of Nabonadius from the dominion of the Medes; and it is certainly not said in the book of Daniel, that on the night of Belshazzar's murder the city was 'taken by Cyrus,' or by 'any man.' "The great feast, on the night of which Belshazzar was slain, appears to have been at a season of profound peace and tranquillity, when 'a thousand of his lords' could freely come from all parts of his empire without molestation or interruption from a besieging enemy, and when the king would be most apt 'to forget God, after he had eaten and was full.'" In the book of Daniel it is not said how or by whom Belshazzar was slain; but it may be collected, says Dr Hales, from Xenophon, that he was slain by conspirators, at the head of whom were Gobrias and Gadates. This is certainly not said by Xenophon, who seems to have confounded the time at which Belshazzar was slain, when the gods punished the impious king, with the taking of Babylon when it had revolted from the Midian yoke; for it is much more probable that Xenophon confounded dates and events, than that there should be any mistake in the canon of Ptolemy, or in the Chaldee records as quoted by Berosus. The family of Nebuchadnezzar being now extinct, our author thinks that Cyaxares or Darius the Mede, who was the brother of Nebuchadnezzar's queen, took possession of the throne by the voluntary offer of the Babylonians.]—Bishop Gleig.—Ed.

prise, ^a Belshazzar slain, and the kingdom translated to Cyaxares, whom the Scripture calls 'Darius the Mede.'

Darius, from his very first accession to the throne, had a great esteem for Daniel, as knowing him to be a person of extraordinary parts and learning, and long versed in affairs of state; and therefore having divided the whole empire into an hundred and twenty provinces, over which he set governors, and over these three presidents, as the king's chief ministers, he made Daniel the first of these; ^b but it happened to him, as it usually does to all favourites, to be maligned, and envied by others.

His administration of public affairs, however, was so just, that in that capacity he gave them no room for any accusation against him, and therefore they laid their plot another way. He, they knew, was a strict observer of the religion of his country, and a constant resorter to God in prayer; and therefore they applied themselves to Darius, in the name of his whole council and officers of state, that he would be pleased so far to indulge his people, as to pass a decree, only for thirty days, that whoever ^c should ask any petition either of God or man, except of the king only, for that space of time, should be thrown to the lions; which the king, taking it for a great testimony of their affection and loyalty to him, at his first accession to the throne, without any manner of

^a Of the manner wherein this was done, we find Xenophon (Cyropædia, b. vii.) thus relating the story, namely, "That two deserters, Gadates and Gobryas, having assisted some of the Persian army to kill the guards and seize upon the palace, they entered into the room where the king was, whom they found standing up in a posture of defence, but that they soon dispatched him, and those that were with him, and thereby fulfilled the prophecy of Jeremiah; 'I will make drunk her princes, and her wise men, her captains and rulers, and her mighty men; and they shall sleep a perpetual sleep, and not awake, saith the King, whose name is the Lord of hosts,'" (chap. li. 57.)—Lowth's Commentary on Dan. v. 30.

^b For though the whole power of the army, and the chief conduct of other affairs were in the hands of Cyrus (and therefore we find him, in Ptolemy's canon, set down as immediate successor to Belshazzar, who is there called Nabonadius,) yet as long as his uncle lived, Cyrus allowed him a joint title with him in the empire, and out of deference to him, yielded him the first place of honour in it; though, in reality, he had no more than the name and shadow of sovereignty, except in Media, which was his own proper dominion before any conquests were made.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 538. [This is certainly not correct. That Nabonadius was a very different man from Belshazzar has been already shown; and it seems evident from Ptolemy's canon, and from Berosus as quoted by Dr Hales, that Darius, whilst he lived, was the sole monarch of Babylon and Medea, though, being of an indolent disposition, as has been already observed, he left the burden of military affairs and the care of the government to Cyrus, who was at once his nephew, his son-in-law, and his destined heir. This may have led Zenophon, and after him Prideaux, to suppose Cyrus joint sovereign with his uncle of the Babylonian empire, especially as Darius appears to have lived only two years after he succeeded to that throne.]—Bishop Gleditsch,—En.

^c It may seem a little strange, that Darius should so readily accept of an honour which was due to God alone. But we see what a pitch of vanity and arrogance these eastern princes were arrived at, when we find Nebuchadnezzar, in Daniel, asking the three Hebrew youths, 'Who is that God that shall deliver you out of my hands?' (Dan. iii. 15.) when we find it said of another of that name, in the book of Judith, 'Who is God but Nabuchodonosor? He will send his power, and destroy them from the face of the earth,' (chap. vi. 2, 3.) and more especially, when we find the Persians making it a matter of state policy to have the persons of their kings in the same veneration as they had their gods.—Quint. Curt. b. viii.

hesitation, passed into an act, and issued out his proclamation to that purpose.

Daniel was not ignorant that this wicked contrivance was designed to ensnare him; but nevertheless he continued his usual course of paying his adorations to God, three times every day, and that not in any clandestine manner, but with his chamber window open towards Jerusalem. ^d His enemies, who had laid this snare for him, were not forgetful to watch him diligently; and therefore having taken him in the act of prayer, they immediately went to the king, accused Daniel of a contempt of his decree, and desired that the sentence might instantly be executed upon him.

The king too late perceived, that his easy compliance with a fallacious offer had betrayed him into a mistake that was likely to prove fatal to his servant Daniel, and therefore he laboured what he could to reverse the decree; but the grandees, on the other hand, represented to him, that the royal decrees, according to the laws of the Medes and Persians ^e were unalterable, and consequently the penalty which Daniel had incurred, irreversible; so that what through the impertinency of those wicked men, and a false notion of honour in adhering to his word, the king delivered up Daniel to their mercy, but not without some glimmering hopes, that the God whom he served continually would by some means or other preserve him.

No sooner was Daniel delivered into their hands, but they hurried him away to the lions' den; and having thrown him in, they not only rolled a large stone to the mouth of it, but had it sealed likewise ^f with their own, as well as the king's signet, that thereby they might prevent all possibility of his making an escape. The king, in the mean time, went pensive home; and having passed the night in much uneasiness and anxiety of mind, he rose early next morning, and repaired to the den, where, to his great and surprising joy, he found Daniel alive; and having caused him to be taken out, he ordered, that his accusers, ^g their wives and their children, should be all

^d It was a constant custom among the Jews, for those that were in the country, or in any distant land, to turn themselves towards Jerusalem; and for those that were at Jerusalem, to turn towards the temple, when they prayed; and the probable reason of this might be, the words of Solomon, in his prayer to God, at the consecration of the temple: 'If thy people, when led away captive, pray unto thee toward their land which thou gavest unto their fathers, the city, which thou hast chosen, and the house, which I have built for thy name; then hear thou their prayers, and their supplication, in heaven, thy dwelling-place, and maintain their cause,' (1 Kings viii. 48, 49.)

^e So Diodorus Siculus tells us (b. iv.) of Darius the last king of Persia, that he would have pardoned Charidemus after he was condemned to death, but could not reverse the law that had passed against him. What made these laws thus unalterable, we are at a loss to know, unless we suppose, that when they passed, either the king had confirmed them by an oath, and then they became immutable; or that they were sealed not only by the king, but by all the princes then in council, as one would be apt to guess from Dan. vi. 8, and xii. 9.—Lowth's Commentary on Dan. vi.; and Patrick's Commentary on Esther i.

^f By this it seems, as if the Persian government, at this time, was a kind of mixed monarchy, consisting of a king and nobles; forasmuch that we find the king could do nothing of importance without his counsellors, nor had he power to alter any thing that was determined in council.—Catmel's Commentary.

^g The Lex Taliouis condemned all calculators to the same sort of punishment which they intended to have brought upon others; and in this case, among the Persians, it was a frequent cast into it, where the lions fell upon them, and instantly destroyed them; while the king, in grateful acknowledgment of a wonderful providence in Daniel's preservation, made public proclamation, that in all the parts of his dominions, the God, whom Daniel worshipped, should be revered.

The term of seventy years, which the prophet Jeremiah^a had prefixed for the continuance of Judah's captivity, being now drawing toward a conclusion, Daniel¹ thought it his duty to humble himself before God, and to make his ardent supplications to him that he would remember his people, and grant a restoration to Jerusalem, and make his face again to shine upon his holy city, and his sanctuary, which was desolate; whereupon he had in a vision assurance given him by the angel Gabriel, not only of the deliverance of Judah from their temporal captivity under the Babylonians, but also of a much greater redemption which God would give his church, by delivering them from their spiritual captivity under sin and Satan, to be accomplished at the end of seventy weeks after the going forth of the commandment to rebuild Jerusalem, that is, at the expiration of 490 years, as we shall have occasion to explain that remarkable passage² hereafter.

Upon the reduction of Babylon,³ which put an end to the Chaldean empire, after it had continued from the reign of Nabonassar, who founded it, 209 years, Cyrus went into Persia to make a visit to his father and mother, who were yet living; and, on his return through Media, married the daughter and only child of his uncle Darius, and had, in dower with her, the reversion of the kingdom of Media, after her father's death; so that, in a short time, he succeeded, not only to the Babylonish empire, but to the two additional kingdoms of Persia and Media likewise, and from hence the whole extent of his dominions took the name of the Persian empire.^b thing to include all the family in the penalty inflicted on the father; but "abominable laws," says Ammianus Marcellinus, "by which, on account of the guilt of one person, death was inflicted on the whole of the kindred."—Calmel's Commentary.

^a The particular prophecies to which Daniel alludes, might probably be these: "Thus saith the Lord of hosts, because ye have not heard my words, behold, I will send and take all the families of the north, and Nebuchadnezzar, the king of Babylon, my servant, and will bring them against this land and the inhabitants thereof: and this whole land shall be a desolation, and an astonishment, and these nations shall serve the king of Babylon seventy years; and it shall come to pass, when seventy years are accomplished, I will punish the king of Babylon, and that nation, saith the Lord, for their iniquity: but I will visit you, and perform my good word towards you, in causing you to return to this place. For I know my thought that I think towards you, saith the Lord, thoughts of peace and not of evil, to give you an expected end," (Jer. xxv. 8, &c., and xxix. 10, 11.) But prophecies, he knew very well, were but conditional, and, for their accomplishment, depended, in a great measure, upon the behaviour of those to whom they were made. One part of this prediction he had seen executed, in the punishment of the king of Babylon, and the translation of his kingdom to the Medes and Persians; but good reason he had to fear, lest the sins of his countrymen the Jews should retard the completion of the other part, namely, their return from captivity, beyond the compass of seventy years: and this was both the cause of his grief and the motive of his prayer.—Calmel's Commentary.

^b There seems to be in this paragraph many mistakes. It cannot be true that Cyrus did not marry the daughter of Darius or Cyaxares II. till after the conquest of Babylon; for Xenophon, who relates this, says likewise that the princess and he were about the same age; and it seems indisputable that at the conquest of Babylon Cyrus was sixty-three years of age. But he had two children by the daughter of Darius, who were both grown to man's estate at his death, when he was seventy years of age; and therefore he must have married at a much earlier period than the conquest of Babylon. His father likewise, and probably his mother, must have been dead before that period, as will appear from the following account of the birth, successions to different kingdoms, and death of this illustrious prince, collected by Dr Hales with the utmost care and accuracy. "The reign of Cyrus over Persia began, according to Diodorus, Thallus, Castor, Polybius, and Phlegon cited by Eusebius, (Præp. Evang. l. 19.) in the first year of the fifty-fifth olympiad, corresponding to the Julian years, B. C. 560, and 559. He reigned, in all, thirty years, according to Ctesias, Justin, Clemens Alexandrinus, and Eusebius: twenty-nine according to Herodotus; and thirty-one years according to Sulpitius. The year of his death is ascertained to have been B. C. 529, by a lunar eclipse recorded by Ptolemy to have happened in the seventh year of his son and successor Cambyses, B. C. 523. This determines the birth of Cyrus to have been B. C. 599, two years after his grandfather, Astyages, succeeded to the crown of Media, B. C. 601. Cyrus succeeded to the crown of Persia, on the demise of his father, B. C. 559, as hath been already observed, and is determined by the thirty years of his whole reign. This corrects an error of Xenophon, who represents Cambyses, (father of Cyrus) as still alive after the capture of Babylon, B. C. 536; an error into which he was led, perhaps, by confounding this capture with the death of Belshazzar, that 'impious king,' as he calls him, who was slain seventeen years before, B. C. 553, when Cyaxares, or Darius the Mede, took possession of the kingdom of Babylon. Cyrus peaceably succeeded his uncle two years after," as the author completely proves, in opposition to Herodotus, and the general current of ancient and modern historians, by the united testimony of Æschylus, Xenophon, Josephus, and the Persian historians, supported by the authority of Scripture, and common sense. "And when Nabonadius, who had been appointed viceroy of Babylon by Darius the Mede, at length rebelled and joined Croesus the sovereign of Lydia, he was defeated, B. C. 538, and Babylon was taken by Cyrus, B. C. 536, which was, of course, the era of the actual commencement of his full sovereignty.—Hales's Analysis, &c., vol. ii. p. 465, and vol. iv. p. 88, second edition.—Ed.

^c It is a good deal more than probable, that this decree in favour of the Jews was, in a great measure, owing to Daniel's good offices. Cyrus, at his first coming to Babylon, after he had taken the city, found him there an old minister of state, famed for his great wisdom over all the east, and, in many things, for a knowledge superior to the rest of mankind; and accordingly we find, that he not only employed him as such, but, upon the settling of the government of the whole empire, made him first superintendent or prime minister of state over all the provinces of it. In this station of life, Daniel must have been a person of great authority at court, and highly in the esteem of his prince: and therefore, as we find him earnest in his prayer to God for the restoration of his people, (Dan. ix.) we cannot but think, that he would be equally warm in his intercessions for it with the king. To which purpose, it is not improbable, that he might show him those passages in Isaiah, which speak of him by name, 150 years before he was born, as a great prince and conqueror, the ruler of many nations, and the restorer of his people, by causing his temple to be built, and the city of Jerusalem re-inhabited. For, that Cyrus had seen those prophecies, the thing is plain, not only from the testimony of Josephus, (Antiq. b. xi. c. 1.) but from the recital that is made of them in the decree itself, (Ezra i. 2:) and if so, who should be so proper to show them to him, and to recommend the accomplishment of them to his princely care, as Daniel, who had so great credit with him, and so passionate a concern for the restoration of Zion.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 538.

^d Some are of opinion that among the sacred things which

^a which Nebuchadnezzar had taken out of the former house, brought to Babylon, and placed in the temple of his god Bel, he ordered his treasurer to restore; and wrote letters ^b recommendatory to the governors of several provinces to assist the Jews in their undertaking.

The encouragement which was given them by virtue of this decree, made the Jews soon gather together out of the several parts of the kingdom of Babylon, to the number of 42,360, which, together with their servants, who were 7337 more, amounted in all to 49,697 persons. For, not only those of Judah and Benjamin, but several also of the other tribes that had been carried away by Tiglath-Pileser and Esarhaddon, yet still retained the true worship of God in a strange land, took the benefit of this decree, to return to their own country.

The chief leaders of these returning captives were Zerubbabel and Joshua. Zerubbabel, ^c whose Babylonish name was Sheshbazzar, was the son of Salathiel, the son of Jehoiakim king of Judah, who was kept so long captive in Babylon; and Joshua was the son of Jozadach, the son of Seraiah, who was high priest when Jerusalem was destroyed, and put to death by Nebuchadnezzar at Riblah, in Syria; so that the former of them was descended from the regal, and the latter from the pontifical family in a direct line. Zerubbabel was made governor of the land by a commission from Cyrus; Joshua, of course, succeeded to the chief priesthood; and with them were joined several others, as assistants, for the settling all affairs both in church and state.

On the first month of the Jewish sacred year, which is called Nisan, and answers to part of March and part of April in our calendar, the people arrived in Judea; and, having dispersed themselves, according to their tribes and families, in their several cities, they set about the rebuilding of their houses, and the cultivation of their lands, after they had lain desolate, from the murder of Gedaliah, two and fifty years. On the seventh month, which is called Tizra, and answers in part to our September and October, all the people from their several cities, met together at Jerusalem, and on the first day of that month, there celebrated the ^d feast of the trumpets. On the tenth was the great day of expiation, ^e when the

Cyrus ordered to be restored, the ark of the covenant was one; but it nowhere appears that this ark was carried from Jerusalem to Babylon. They tell us, indeed, that in the second temple sacrifices were offered, as in the first, and all solemn days observed, especially the great day of expiation, when the law ordained, that the blood should be sprinkled before the mercy-seat; and the mercy-seat, say they, was part of the ark; but besides that, the ark, without the sheehinah, or divine glory, (which was then withdrawn,) would have been of no great significance, the Jews universally acknowledged, that the ark was one of the five things that were wanting in the second temple.

^a The sum total of the vessels, as they are named in Ezra, i. 9, 10, do not amount to half this number; and therefore some have thought, that there must be a numerical error either in the one place or the other; whilst others suppose, that as in 2 Chron. xxxvi. 18, Nebuchadnezzar is said to have carried away all the vessels, both great and small, in this detail the larger vessels only, and such as were of great value, are mentioned, but that the gross sum comprehends all, and amounts to the number specified. — Patrick's Commentary on Ezra i. 11.

^b Josephus has recorded one, which is directed to the governors of Syria, in the following manner:—"Cyrus the king, to Sysina and Sarabasan sendeth greeting. Be it known unto you, that I have given leave to all the Jews that are in my dominions to return to their own country, and there to rebuild their capital city, with the holy temple at Jerusalem, in the same place where it stood before. I have likewise sent my treasurer, Mithridates, and Zerubbabel the governor of Judea, to superintend the building, and to see it raised sixty cubits upward from the ground, and as many over; the walls to be three rows of polished stone, and one of the wood of the country, together with an altar for sacrifices, and all this to be done at my charge.—It is my further pleasure, that they receive entire to themselves all the profits and revenues that were formerly enjoyed by their predecessors, and that they have an allowance paid them of 250,500 drachmas, in consideration of beasts for sacrifices, wine, and oil, and 2500 measures of wheat, in lieu of fine flour, and all this to be raised upon the tribute of Samaria; that the priests may offer up sacrifices, according to the laws and ceremonies of Moses, and pray daily for the king and royal family, and for the welfare and happiness of the Persian empire; and let no man presume to do anything contrary to the tenor of this my royal will and proclamation, upon pain of forfeiting life and estate."—Jewish Antiq. b. xi. c. 1.

^c In the time of the captivity, it was a common thing for the great men of Judah to have two names; one of their own country, which was domestic, and another of the Chaldeans, which was used at court. Zerubbabel was born in Babylon; and his name, which signifies an exile, or stranger in Babylon, imports the misery of the people of Israel at that time; but Sheshbazzar, which is a compound of two words, signifying, fine linen and gold, seems to be a name of a better omen, and to denote their future more flourishing condition.—Patrick's Commentary.

^d The first day of the month Tizri was the beginning of the Jewish civil year, and on it was the feast of trumpets, so called, because it was proclaimed by sound of trumpet; but, upon what occasion it was at first instituted, the Scripture is silent. Theodoret (Quest. xxxii. in Lev.) is of opinion, that it was in memory of the thunder and lightning upon Mount Sinai, when God gave his law from thence. The ancient rabbins will have it, that it was in remembrance of the deliverance of Isaac, in whose stead Abraham sacrificed a ram; but some modern Jews maintain that it was in memory of the world's creation, which they accordingly assert was in the beginning of autumn, and, as they hold it by tradition, that on this day God particularly judges all the actions of the foregoing year, and disposes all the events of the year following, for this reason they generally apply themselves, for the whole eight days preceding this feast, to the works of penance and mortification. On the feast itself, which lasts for two days, all labour and business are suspended, and, while sacrifices were in use, the Jews offered, in the name of the whole nation, a solemn holocaust of a calf, two rams, and seven lambs, all of the same year, together with the flour and wine, that usually went along with such sacrifices; but, instead of that, they now go to the synagogue, where they repeat several prayers and benedictions, and having taken the Pentateuch very solemnly out of the chest, and read to five persons the service that used to be performed on that day, they sound twenty times upon a horn, sometimes very low, sometimes very loud; and this, they say, makes them think of the judgments of God, to intimidate sinners, and put them upon repentance.—Cabnet's Dictionary under the word Trumpet.

^e This was one of the principal solemnities of the Jews, and the ceremonies to be observed hereon were such as these.—The high priest, after he had washed not only his hands and feet, as usual in common sacrifices, but his body likewise, dressed himself in a plain linen garment like one of the priests, and had neither his purple robe, his ephod, nor his pectoral on, because he was going to expiate his own as well as the people's sins. He first of all offered a bullock and a ram for his own sins, and those of the other priests, putting his hand upon their heads, and confessing his own sins, and the sins of his house; then he received from the princes of the people two goats for a sin-offering, and a ram for a burnt-offering, to be offered in the name of all the people. By lots it was determined which of the two goats should be sacrificed, and which be set at liberty; and therefore, after that he had perfumed the sanctuary with some burning incense, he took of the blood of the bullock which he had sacrificed, and dipping his finger in it, sprinkled it seven times between the ark and the veil, which separated between the holy of holies, and the body of the tabernacle or temple. After this he came out again, and having sacrificed the goat upon which the lot was fallen, he returned with some of its blood into the sanctuary, and there sprinkled it as he had done before; then coming out again, he sprinkled both sides of the court with the blood of the goat, and so proceeding to the altar of the burnt-offerings, he wet the four high priest made atonement for all the people; and on the fifteenth began the feast of tabernacles, ^a which lasted till the twenty-third. During all which solemnities, the people staid at Jerusalem; and to promote the restoration of God's worship in that place, the free-will offerings, which they made upon that occasion, besides an hundred vestments for the priests, amounted to sixty-one thousand drachms of gold, and five thousand minæ of silver, which, in all, comes to about ^b seventy-five thou-horns of it with the blood of the goat and the bullock, and sprinkled it seven times with the same. After all these ceremonies were finished, the goat that was to be set at liberty, which was commonly called the scape-goat, was brought to the high priest, who put both his hands upon its head, and having confessed all his own sins, and the sins of the people, delivered it to persons appointed to that office, who carried it into the wilderness, and left it upon the brink of a precipice, at twelve miles' distance from Jerusalem. After all which, the high priest washed himself all over again in the tabernacle or temple, and putting on his pontifical dress, sacrificed two rams for a burnt-offering, one for himself and the other for the people; and so concluded the day, with reading the law, and giving the blessing to the people, who all, upon this occasion, behaved with great devotion, fasted punctually, and returned home with a full persuasion and assurance that their sins were entirely done away, and expiated. The modern Jews, who have no sacrifices, content themselves with reading in Leviticus what relates to the solemn service of this day, and the ceremonies concerning the scape-goat. They, in like manner, fast very strictly, and pray very devoutly, until the conclusion of the day, when having received the Rabbins' blessing, they go home, fully satisfied that all their iniquities are pardoned; for their standing maxim is, that repentance, though accompanied with a resolution of living well, does but suspend sins; whereas the least of expiation does absolutely abolish them. The reader that is desirous to know more of this, may consult Basnage's History of the Jews, and Culmet's Dictionary under the word Expiação.

^a This was one of the great solemnities of the Jews, wherein all the males were obliged to present themselves before the Lord. In Hebrew it is called chag hassuchoth, the feast of tents; because it was kept under green tents, and arbours, in memory of their dwelling in tents in their passage through the wilderness, and immediately after the harvest, in grateful acknowledgment to God for the fruits of the earth which they had lately gathered in. It was observed for seven days; and of the several sacrifices which were appointed for each day, we have a punctual account in the book of Numbers, (chap. xxix. 12, &c.) The modern Jews not having now an opportunity of going to the temple and performing all the ceremonies prescribed by Moses, make, each for himself, in some open place, a bower, or arbour of the branches of trees of such a determinate height, hung round about, and adorned, as much as they can, where they eat and drink, and pass at least as much time in their houses, for all the days of the festival; but such as are old, or sick, are excused, and when it rains very hard, they are permitted to retire to their houses. On the first day of the feast, they take one branch of palm, three of myrtle, and one of willow, bound together, which they carry in their right hand, and having a branch of citron, with its fruit, in their left, thus they make four turns about the reading desk, in their synagogues. On the seventh day, which is accounted more holy than the rest, they rise with the sun, and going to the synagogue, sing abundance of prayers, which they repeat all the feast, with prodigious rapidity, as supposing, that during their journey they were obliged to make haste even in the service of God. On the eighth, (for they have added two days to what Moses at first prescribed) they get their friends together, and give them an entertainment; and on the ninth, which they call 'the joy of the law,' they complete the reading of the Pentateuch, according to the order of its sections.—Basnage's Hist. of the Jews, and Culmet's Dict. under the word Tabernacles.

^b For every draclm of gold is worth ten shillings of our money, and every mina of silver nine pounds; for it contained sixty shekels, and every shekel of silver is worth three shillings of our money.—From whence it appears, that the Jews were not made such poor slaves in Babylon, as wrought for their lords and masters, but had some of them very considerable offices at court, and an liberty to trade, and get riches for themselves; and consequently that there may not be all the truth imaginable in that common saying among them, namely, that they were the only bran, that is, the dregs of the people, who returned to Jerusalem, after the end of the captivity, and that all the fine flour staid behind at Babylon.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 536.

To this purpose, having employed the first year in preparing materials and providing workmen, in the second month of the second year, (which answers in part to our April and May), they laid the foundation of it with great joy and solemnity; only the old men, who had seen the glory of the first temple, and had no expectation that this, which was now abuilding by a few poor exiles, lately returned from their captivity, would ever equal that which had all the riches of David and Solomon (two of the wealthiest princes of the east) expended on it, wept at the remembrance of the old, whilst the others rejoiced at the laying the foundations of the new temple.

Whilst the Jews were going on with this work, the Samaritans, who were planted in several cities of Israel in the room of the Israelites whom Sannassar, king of Assyria, had long before carried away captive, hearing that they were about rebuilding their temple, came to the governor Zerubbabel, and desired to join with them in the work, alleging, that they worshipped the same God that the people of Judah did. The governor, however, and the chiefs of the families of Israel, would by no means allow them to have any share in the work, being apprehensive that they, who were no better than idolaters, ^c notwithstanding they pretended to worship the God of Israel, might have some evil design in the offer of their service; and therefore they absolutely refused them; which so exasperated the other, that, from that very moment, they made it their endeavour, as much as in them lay, to obstruct the work: and though they could not alter the decree which Cyrus had made in favour of it; yet by bribes, and underhand dealings with his ministers, they in a great measure defeated its effects. So that for several years the building went but slowly on, and, upon the death of the prophet ^d Daniel, quently that there may not be all the truth imaginable in that common saying among them, namely, that they were the only bran, that is, the dregs of the people, who returned to Jerusalem, after the end of the captivity, and that all the fine flour staid behind at Babylon.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 536.

^c For although, from the time that they had been infested with lions, in the days of Esarhaddon, they had worshipped the God of Israel, yet it was only in conjunction with their other gods whom they worshipped before; and therefore, notwithstanding their worship of the true God, since they worshipped false gods too at the same time, they were, in this respect, idolaters, which was reason enough for the true worshippers of God to have no communion with them.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 534.

^d We do not find that Daniel took the advantage of the edict which Cyrus made in favour of the Jews; and therefore we may suppose, that, as he did not return with them to Jerusalem, the king might require his continuance with him, and Daniel might the rather consent to it, as having thereby a better opportunity to befriend his countrymen upon any exigence. To this purpose it is highly probable, that he attended the Persian court, which, after the taking and defacing of Babylon, resided in summer at Shushan or Susa, and in winter at Ecbatan. In the palace of Shushan, Daniel, as himself tells us, (chap. viii. 1, &c.) had several visions. In this city, as Josephus himself informs us, (Antiq. b. x. c. 12.) where, instead of Ecbatan, St Jerome reads Sasa, he built a famous edifice, finished with such exquisite art, that it continued fresh and beautiful in his days; and in this city the common tradition is, that he died in the third or fourth year of Cyrus, and about the ninety-first year of his age; for even to this day, as we learn from Benjamin's Itinerarium, the inhabitants of the place, at present called Taster, show his monument. But the most valuable monument left behind him is in his writings, whereof the Jewish historian gives us this character:—

A. M. 3417. A. C. 587; OR, ACCORDING TO HALES, A. M. 4825. A. C. 586. JER. XL, 7—XLV. DANIEL, AND EZRA I—V.

“ ‘Tis this peculiar blessing attending him, that he lived in great reputation both with prince and people, and when he died, left an immortal memory behind him. His writings, which are still extant, and in common use, we keep as a sure pledge that he had an intimacy and conversation with God: for, whereas other prophets were more employed in foreboding calamities and ill news, which drew upon them disgrace from princes, and hatred from the people, Daniel, on the contrary, foretold nothing but happy events, and what was agreeable; so that the nature of his predictions was such, as gained him the good will of all, and such the certainty of them, as gained him a ready credence with all; which, as the historian remarks, may serve not only to establish a veneration for the memory of a man whom God so signally honoured, but to confound likewise the impious doctrines of the Epicureans, which will not allow of any overruling providence interposing in the government and preservation of the universe, but will have the whole course of sublunary things to be nothing more than one grand riddle of contingencies. For when I consider the prophecies of Daniel, says he, I cannot but blame the ignorance or irreverence of those who make it their profession to deny providence, as if God took no care of us, since it is impossible to conceive how there should be such a correspondence between the things foretold at one time and fulfilled so many ages after, if, according to their opinion, every thing were left to run at random, and fall out at hap-hazard.”—Jewish Antiquities, b. x. c. 12. [Mr Bell, in his edition of Rollin, has an able and elaborate inquiry into the situation of Shushan, which he identifies, with the ruins called Sus or Shush, 100 miles distant from the banks of the Shat-ul-Arab, and 50 miles N.W. of Sluster, the Taster mentioned above. From this article we extract the following interesting account of the tomb of Daniel:—Amongst the ruins of Sus, two mounds stand pre-eminent, and of enormous dimensions, the one being a mile in circumference, and the other two; their height measuring nearly 150 feet. They are composed of huge masses of sun-dried brick, and courses of burnt brick and mortar, and stand not very far from the banks of the Kerah or Karasu; from whose eastern shore the vestiges of this once famous capital are yet traceable nearly to the banks of the Ab-zal, approaching the town of Dezful. The people of the country distinguish these two great mounds by the name of the Castle and the Palace; and at the foot of the latter or largest appears a little dome-like building, under which travellers are shown the tomb of Daniel the prophet. A dervise resides there, impressed with a belief of its peculiar sanctity, and who points to the grave of the ‘man greatly beloved,’ the most inspired of Judah’s prophetic sons, with as much homage as if it belonged to the pretended prophet of Mecca himself, or to the Imaum Hosein. Though covered by this modern structure, no doubt is held by Jew, Arab, or Mussulman, of the great antiquity of the tomb beneath—all bearing the same tradition, that it does in very deed contain the remains of the prophet. The exact era of his death is not known; but it is probable that he died in Susa, a few years after the taking of Babylon by Cyrus. Josephus mentions a famous edifice built by Daniel at Susa, in the form of a castle, which, he adds, was still standing; and had been finished with such wonderful art, that even then it appeared as fresh and beautiful as if only newly founded. “Within this edifice,” Josephus says, “was the place where the Persian and Parthian kings were usually buried; and for the sake of the founder, the keeping of it was committed to one of the Jewish nation, even at that day.” Some copies of Josephus, now extant, place this building at Eabatan, or Hamadan, in Media; but St Jerome, who also gives an account of it, and professedly does so verbatim from Josephus, places it at Susa, which shows that it was so in his copy of that historian. We no where read in Scripture that Daniel was at Eabatan. Susa was formerly a city of the Babylonian empire, and Daniel sometimes at least resided there before the taking of Babylon; and it has since then been the constant tradition, that there Daniel died, and there they still show his monument. It must also be remarked, that Josephus calls this edifice Baris, the same name by which Daniel himself distinguishes the castle or palace of Shu-shan. For what is translated at Shushan in the palace, (Dan. viii. 2.) is in the original Bish Shushan Ha Birah. Here, undoubtedly, the Birah of Daniel is the same with the Baris of Josephus, and both signify the palace or castle built at Shushan by Daniel while governor of that province. The site of this once famous metropolis of the east is now a mere wilderness, given up to beasts of prey, no human being disputing their reign save the poor dervise who keeps watch over the tomb of the prophet. The chambers of royalty where Ahasuerus showed the riches of his glorious kingdom, and the honour of his excellent majesty, for 180 days, unto all his princes and servants, the power of Media and Persia, with the nobles and princes of the 127 provinces that stretched from India even to Ethiopia, are now the abodes of the lion, the wolf, and the hyanna; and the voice of festive song that once filled the joyous halls is now exchanged for the frightful howlings of these beasts of prey. The earliest notice of Daniel’s tomb published in Europe, seems to have been given by Benjamin of Tudela, a Spanish Jew, who visited Asia, towards the latter part of the thirteenth century. The account of his travels was first printed in Hebrew, in 1545, and has gone through several editions and translations into different languages. The tomb of Daniel is also mentioned by another Jewish traveller, whose Hebrew work, with a Latin translation by the learned Hottinger, was published at Heidelberg, in 1659, under the title of ‘Cippi Hebraici.’ But in this notices the Tigris is confounded with the Euphrates, and Babylon with Susa. “The local tradition which fixes Daniel’s tomb at Susa,” says Sir William Ouseley, “seems worthy of investigation. Through the more modern authors of some oriental works, mostly geographical, I have pursued the tradition to Hamdalla, Cazvini, of the fourteenth century, and from him through Rabbi Benjamin above-mentioned, to Ebn Hawkel, who travelled in the tenth century.”—Oriental Geog. p. 70, of Ebn Hawkel, translated by Sir William Ouseley. This is probably the oldest authority furnished by printed books on the subject; but a venerable historian, Aasim of Cufah, who preceded Ebn Hawkel by two centuries, (for he died in 735) mentions the discovery of Daniel’s coffin at Sus, in a MS. chronicle, from which Sir William Ouseley promised an extract, which is given in Walpole’s memoirs of Asiatic Turkey, p. 422. The passage in Ebn Hawkel respecting Daniel’s tomb is as follows:—“In the city of Sus there is a river; and I have heard, that in the time of Abou Mousa al Ashari, a coffin was found there, and it is said the bones of Daniel the prophet, to whom he peace, were in that coffin, these the people held in great veneration, and, in time of distress or famine from drought, they brought them out and prayed for rain. Abou Mousa al Ashari ordered this coffin to be brought, and three coverings or lids to be made for it; the first or outside one of which was of boards, exceedingly strong, and caused it to be buried, so that it could not be viewed. A bay or gulf of the river comes over this grave, which may be seen by any one who dives to the bottom of the water.” Now follows Sir William Ouseley’s own relation, with the extract from Aasim of Cufah: “I was finally driven by the heat to the tomb of Daniel, or, as he is called in the east, Danyall, which is situated in a most beautiful spot, washed by a clear running stream, and shaded by planes, and other trees of ample foliage. The building is of Mahomedan date, and inhabited by a solitary dervise, who shows the spot where the prophet is buried, beneath a small and simple square brick mausoleum, said to be, without all probability, coeval with his death. It has, however, neither date nor inscription, to prove the truth or falsehood of the dervise’s assertion. The small river running at the foot of this building, which is called the Belleran, flows, it has been said, immediately over the prophet’s tomb, and, by the transparency of the water, his coffin was to be seen at the bottom. But the dervise and the natives whom I questioned, remembered no tradition corroborating such a fact. On the contrary, it has at all times been customary with the people of the country to resort hither on certain days of the month, when they offer up their prayers at the tomb I have mentioned, in supplication to the prophet’s shade; and, by becoming his guests for the night, exact remission from all present grievances, and an insurance against those to come.” The following is the tradition from the Persian MS. of Aasim of Cufah, communicated by our author:—In the 18th year of the Hegira, A. D. 640, whilst Omar was Khalif, an Arabian army, under Abou Mousa al Ashari, invaded Susiana. In the ancient capital Su (Sus) that general found, besides considerable treasures of various kinds, an extraordinary sepulchral monument, which, according to local tradition, contained the body of the prophet Daniel. Of this discovered monument, the most circumstantial account is given by Abou Mohammed Ahmed, whose father, Aasim of Cufah, flourished so shortly after the conquest of Susiana, that he might, when young, have conversed with several of the veteran warriors, whose valour had contributed to that event, for he died in A. D. 735, as we learn from Casiri, Ebn Aasim’s Book of Victories, in the original Arabic, is a work very rare; but it was translated into Persian by Ahmed al Mastouzi, about the year 1200, A. D. and copies in this language

are sufficiently numerous. I have extracted what relates to the tomb of Daniel. "Abou Mousa, having pillaged the territory of Ahwaz, proceeded to Susa, where he slew the governor, a Persian prince, named Shapora, the son of Azurmahan. Then he entered the castle and palace of that prince, and seized all the treasure there, deposited in different places, until he came to a certain chamber, the door of which was strongly fastened, a leaden seal being affixed to the lock. Abou Mousa inquired of the people of Sus what precious article was guarded with such care in this chamber. They assured him, that he would not regard it as a desirable object of plunder; but his curiosity was roused, and he caused the lock to be broken, and the door to be opened. In the chamber he beheld a stone of considerable dimensions hollowed out into the form of a coffin, and in that the body of a dead man, wrapped in a shroud or winding-sheet of gold brocade. The head was uncovered. Abou Mousa and his attendants were astonished; for having measured the nose, they found that proportionally he must have exceeded the common size of men. The people now informed Abou Mousa, that this was the body of an ancient sage who formerly lived in Irak, (Chaldea or Babylonia) and that whenever the want of rain occasioned a famine or scarcity, the inhabitants applied to this holy man, and through the efficacy of his prayers, obtained copious showers of rain from heaven. It happened afterwards that Sus also suffered from excessive drought; and the people in distress requested that their neighbours would allow this venerable personage to reside a few days among them, expecting to derive the blessing of rain from his intercession with the Almighty; but the Irakians would not grant this request. Fifty men then went, deputed by the people of Sus, who again petitioned the ruler of Irak, saying, 'Let the holy person visit our country, and detain the fifty men until his return.' These terms were accepted, and the holy person came to Sus, where, through the influence of his prayers, rain fell in great abundance, and saved the land from famine; but the people would not permit him to return, and the fifty men were detained as hostages in Irak. Such, said those who accompanied Abou Mousa, is the history of the dead man. The Arabian general then asked them, 'by what name this extraordinary personage had been known among them?' They replied, 'the people of Irak called him Daniel Hakim, or Daniel the Sage.' After this Abou Mousa remained some time in Sus, and despatched a messenger to Omar the Commander of the Faithful, with an account of all his conquests in Khuzistan, and of the various treasures that had fallen into his possession. He related also the discovery of Daniel's body. When Omar had received this account, he demanded from his chief officers some information concerning Daniel, but all were silent, except Ali, on whom he the blessing of God. He declared, that Daniel had been a prophet, though not of the highest order; that in ages long since he had dwelt with Bakht al Nassar, (Nebuchadnezzar), and the kings who had succeeded him; and Ali related the whole of Daniel's history from the beginning to the end. Omar then, by the advice of his counsellor Ali, caused letters to be directed to Abou Mousa to remove with due respect and veneration the body of Daniel to some place where the people of Sus could no longer enjoy the possession of it. Abou Mousa, immediately on the receipt of this order, obliged the people of Sus to turn the stream which supplied them with water from its natural course. Then he brought forth the body of Daniel, and having wrapped it in another shroud of gold brocade, he commanded a grave to be made in the dry channel of the river, and therein deposited the venerable remains of the prophet. The grave was then firmly secured and covered with stones of considerable size; the river was restored to its wonted channel, and the waters of Sus now flow over the body of Daniel. The venerable dervise who watches the tomb of Daniel, showed major Monteith several blocks of stone curiously sculptured, and of evident antiquity, two of which he sketched hastily. The first of these was a green granite, so dark as to be almost black, finely polished, and in height twenty-two inches, and twelve in width. One of its sides was completely covered with hieroglyphical figures, roughly carved in relief, and occupying five rows. The first row contains forms supposed to denote the sun, moon, and one of the stars; the second, animals resembling a hare, a dog, and a bird; the third, a figure with the head and lower extremities of a tiger, the arms of a man, and the tail of a goat. Three symbolical instruments divide this monster from a second, who is Cyrus, ^a which happened not long after, it was quite intermitted, until the second year of the reign of Darius the son of Hystaspes, wherein it was re-assumed.

CHAP. II.—Difficulties Obviated and Objections Answered.

THAT there was such a person as Daniel, of the Jewish captivity in Babylon, famous for his discovery of future events, and for his great piety and devotion towards God, can hardly be denied; that the discourses and predictions of a person so highly in favour with God should be put in writing, either by himself or some other, and when committed to writing, should be carefully preserved, is reasonable to believe; and that the book which has descended to us contains the revelations, and other accounts of things, which God was pleased to communicate to him, will sufficiently appear by the sequel.

The character which the prophet Ezekiel gives his contemporary, Daniel, ¹ is, his singular prevalence with God in prayer; and whoever looks into the book that goes under his name, will find its author verifying ² this also half brute, half man, with a staff in his hand, and crowned with a flat cap; the fourth row contains an animal like an antelope, a serpent, a scorpion, and something resembling the ornamented top of a staff or sceptre; the fifth exhibits a trident, two spears, a hawk, and another bird, finishing the group with a regularly formed Greek cross. Besides these hieroglyphics, two sides of the stone are occupied by inscriptions in the cuneiform character. At the head of one of them was a double row of natural objects resembling birds. The second relic of Susa, which drew the particular attention of major Monteith, was a white marble stone found, as the dervise told him, in the great mound of the palace, near to the tomb of the prophet. It does not exceed ten inches in width and depth, and measures twenty in length, and is hollow internally. Three of its sides are cut in bas relief, two of them with similar representations of a man apparently naked, excepting a sash round his waste, and a sort of cap on his head: his hands are bound behind him. The corner of the stone holds the neck of the figure, so that his head forms part of one of its ends. Two lions in sitting postures, appear on either side at the top, each having a paw on the head of the man. The execution resembles the style of the other on the dark stone; but there are no traces of letters on this. Both major Monteith and captain Lockett attempted to get the dark stone by means of negotiating with the people, but in vain—the inhabitants viewing it in the light of a sacred talisman.]—Bell's Rollin, vol. 1, pp. 195-6.—ED.

^a It is generally agreed by historians, that Cyrus was much about seventy years old when he died; but then they widely differ among themselves as to the manner of his death. Some say that he was taken in an engagement, and hanged; others, that he died of a wound which he received in his thigh; and others that he was killed in a battle with the people of Samos. Herodotus, Justin, and Valerius Maximus relate, that, in his war against the Scythians, falling into an ambush which queen Tomyris had laid for him, he was taken prisoner, and, with insult enough, had his head cut off by her order: but Xenophon's account is,—that he died peaceably in his bed, amidst his friends, and in his own country; as, indeed there is little reason to think either that so wise a man as Cyrus should, in his advanced years, engage in so desperate an undertaking as this Scythian expedition is represented on all hands, or that had he died in Scythia, his mangled body could have ever been got out of the hands of these barbarians to be buried at Pasargada in Persia, as most authors agree it was, and where his monument was to be seen in the time of Alexander the Great.—Calmel's Dictionary under the word Cyrus; and Prideaux's Connection, anno 530.

character, and his success in this particular exemplified in several instances. ¹ His deliverance out of the den of lions, and that of his companions out of the fiery furnace, facts that are recorded in the present book, are expressly mentioned in the prayer of ² old Eleazar in Egypt, under the rage of Ptolemy Philopater against the Jews, and ³ of Mattathias, the father of the Maccabees, in Judea, under the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes, and their examples, among other Scripture instances, are proposed as motives to confidence in God, and constancy in their religion: ⁴ so that the Jews in those times, took this book to be written by Daniel himself, and accordingly made use of it. Nay, long before these times, ⁵ we find Nehemiah beginning his solemn prayer to God in Daniel's own words, almost with no variation. 'O Lord, the great and dreadful God, keeping the covenant and mercy to them that love him and keep his commandments,' which is a plain proof, not only that he looked upon this book of Daniel as true and authentic, but that he esteemed his manner of praying likewise not unworthy his imitation.

Josephus, we know, was a priest well versed in the law, and in the sacred writings, whose authority he professes to follow through all his Antiquities; and yet he seems to prefer Daniel above other writers of that kind, and to give us a more particular account of his than of all the other prophecies of the Old Testament put together: for he informs us, ⁶ "That Daniel not only foretold future things (which was common to him with other prophets), but that he set the time likewise for their coming to pass; ⁷ that this book therefore was held among the sacred writings, and ⁸ read in public assemblies (which is the peculiar privilege of canonical books) in his days, because the completion of the events he foretold gained him belief with all mankind." Nay, if we will give credit to this same Josephus, this book of Daniel was looked upon as genuine, and of divine authority, even in the days of Alexander the Great; otherwise the high-priest had put a banter upon him, when, ⁹ at his coming to Jerusalem, and going into the temple, he showed him a passage in it, wherein it was foretold, under the emblem of a he-goat with one horn, overcoming a ram with two, that a certain king of Greece would conquer the Persians; which Alexander took to himself, and perhaps, upon that very account might treat the Jewish nation with more clemency than he did their neighbours.

But however this be, it is certain, that in and before the time of our blessed Saviour, the Jews received the book of Daniel as authentic Scripture, without any suspicion to the contrary. For, whereas the name of the Messias, and of 'the Son of man,' which they applied to the Deliverer whom they expected, the title of the 'kingdom of God,' and of 'heaven,' used for the state of things under that Deliverer, his coming in the 'clouds of heaven,' his taking 'all judgment upon himself, and the resurrection of the dead,' pursuant upon that his coming, are expressions manifestly borrowed from Daniel: these expressions were, at that time, the current language of the Jews, insomuch, that we find none of them surprised when they heard the Baptist telling them that 'the kingdom of heaven was at hand,' or our Saviour calling himself so frequently 'the Son of man,' and citing Daniel the prophet by name; which they certainly would have been, and thereupon raised no small clamour, had they perceived that he was obtruding a spurious book upon them for canonical.

Upon the whole, therefore, we may conclude, that, since there confessedly was such a person as Daniel, whose character in the prophet Ezekiel agrees with what we find in our present Daniel; since this book of his has the testimony of Josephus (no incompetent judge in a matter of this nature), was commonly cited in the times of our Saviour, was referred to before the times of the Maccabees; nay, was thought genuine in the times of Alexander, and has received no small confirmation from the use and application which Nehemiah makes of it; either we may suppose, that all these persons, in their different generations, were mistaken, or else we must allow, that our present book of Daniel is no fictitious piece of later date, but the work of the prophet whose name it bears, and who lived in the age which the sacred records have assigned him.

It is no valid objection, either against his personal or prophetic character, that he was educated in the learning of the Chaldeans, and became a remarkable proficient therein. The learning of the Chaldeans consisted chiefly in what they call astrology, or the knowledge of the celestial motions, the art of building, and the art of war. Some curious and superstitious arts that were abhorrent to the law of Moses, they were famous for practising; but there is no necessity for us to infer from thence, that Daniel and his friends were ever initiated in these; on the contrary, we may be allowed to argue thus:—That, had there been anything criminal in the method of their education, they who refused to defile themselves with the king's meat, would never have complied with it. They refused the king's provisions, not only because he might probably have such things served up at his table as were prohibited by their law, but because it was customary likewise in most nations, before their meals, to make an oblation of some part of what they ate or drank, to their gods, as a thankful acknowledgment, that whatever they enjoyed proceeded from their bounty: so that every entertainment had in it the nature of a sacrifice; and therefore Daniel and his friends looked upon the provisions which came from the king's table as meats offered to idols, and upon that account esteemed them unclean. But the same principle that moved them to this, would have restrained them from the study of the Chaldean learning, had any of their impious or unwarrantable sciences been imposed upon them.

The king indeed is said ¹⁰ 'to have found them ten times better than all the magicians and astrologers that were in his realm.' But these words, in ancient times, were not appropriated to the evil sense which they now bear, but signified, in the general, men of wisdom and learning, skilled in the knowledge of things natural and divine. ¹ Those who in St Matthew are called μαροί, our translation has rendered 'wise men,' because the evangelist seems to have given them that name, not as a note of infamy, but as an honourable title. And in like manner, why may not the words be here understood of such persons as employed themselves in the lawful search of natural causes and effects, of the curious products of the earth, and the regular motions of heavenly bodies? For when Daniel made intercession to the captain of the guard, that ² the 'wise men of Babylon might not be slain,' we can hardly suppose that all of these were such as studied unlawful arts and sciences, since he himself was afterwards made master and president over them.

Nay, even supposing that these wise men of Babylon made profession of some sciences, whose only foundation were superstition and deceit, yet why must their Hebrew disciples be obliged to pursue the same? Might they not follow such studies as best suited their genius, and the principles of their religion? The same indulgence which they obtained from the master of the eunuchs with regard to their provisions, may well be supposed to have been granted them in relation to their studies, in case any difficulty of this kind had been imposed upon them. But there is no occasion for our imagining this. The masters of these occult sciences (as they call them) had many good reasons for not obtruding them upon their disciples; and Daniel and his companions, who were designed to attend in the king's presence, were more properly to be educated in another way, viz. in the knowledge and purity of the Chaldee tongue, of the arts of war and policy, of the state and revenues of the kingdom, and such other lighter and more polite accomplishments, as would make their persons and services more acceptable at court, than any proficiency in these abstruse matters could do. But put the case, that they were at any time called to lectures in any of the sciences that were not so strictly warrantable, we cannot see why they might not be permitted to attend to them with the same spirit that ³ 'Moses was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians,' namely, ⁴ not with a purpose to follow them, or to square their lives or sentiments according to them, but purely to put themselves into a capacity, upon a proper occasion to confute them, and with more advantage to expose their falseness and absurdity.

It was not for any more excellent proficiency therefore in those black arts, which were prohibited by the law of God, that Daniel obtained an exemption from the punishment of the fiery furnace, but either because he was absent upon some pretence or other, as most of the Jews might choose to be absent upon this occasion, or because he was not accused to the king, at this time, for refusing to worship the idol which he had set up, though he might be present at the dedication.

Nebuchadnezzar, ⁵ we read, had summoned all his princes, counsellors, governors, captains, and all his other officers and ministers, to be present and assisting at the solemnity of this dedication; and therefore it is not likely that Daniel, who was one of the chief of them, should be allowed to be absent; but his enemies thought it more advisable not to begin with him, because of the great authority he had with the king, but rather to fall first upon his three friends, whose promotion in the province of Babylon raised their envy, that thereby they might more successfully pave the way to his ruin: but the miraculous interposition of providence in behalf of his friends quashed all farther accusations against him; and for this reason it is, that no mention is made of him in this whole transaction.

It is said indeed of him, ⁶ 'that he had understanding in all visions and dreams,' and dreams, we know, among the eastern people, were held in great regard. They observed them much, and applied to such persons as pretended to explain them, for their interpretation: nor can it be denied, that in the earliest ages of the world, it was the received opinion, that such dreams as were attended with unusual circumstances, did portend and signify some future event; that they were frequently sent from God, ⁷ 'who in a dream, in a vision of the night, speaks once, yea twice, to men,' as Elihu affirms in Job. Now, if dreams be significative, and often sent from God, it can hardly be thought, that in all cases the interpretation of them should be unlawful; and therefore we may observe, that in that very place where Moses forbids the Hebrews to consult magicians and interpreters of dreams, he nevertheless tells them, ⁸ 'that the Lord their God would raise up to them, from among their brethren, a prophet like unto him, whom they should consult and hearken to.' So that, though the Israelites were forbidden to make use of soothsayers or diviners, as the custom of the nations was, to whose possessions they succeeded; yet they were permitted to address themselves to God and his prophets, in order to learn the explanations of their dreams, and the prediction of future events; consequently there could be no crime in Daniel's applying himself to this kind of knowledge, since whatever excellency he had in this way, the Scripture takes care to ascribe it to the peculiar gift of God ^a

^a That he was taught—even by the astrologers, much useful knowledge, can hardly be doubted: for those men could not have pretended to foretell future events from the conjunctions and oppositions of the stars or planets, without acquiring great knowledge in the useful and sublime science of astronomy, which the agricultural life of the Jews, and the perfection of their law, deprived them of almost every inducement to study. No Chaldean astrologer can have employed himself in more frivolous pursuits than were those of the alchemists, in the dark ages of modern Europe, in quest of the Philosopher's stone; and yet to the alchemists we are in a great measure indebted for the origin of the science of chemistry, which has within these thirty years been carried to such perfection, and contributed so much to the comfort and elegance of civil society. Even in the interpretation of dreams something might be learned from the Chaldean wise men. Neither the gods of Babylon, indeed, nor the conjunctions of the stars, could reveal any thing to the astrologers or soothsayers, but no man who admits the Divine origin of any part of the Scriptures, can doubt, but that the true God occasionally revealed his will to the prophets in dreams and visions; and when he did so, he must have made use of such symbols or such language as was generally employed to denote the things intended. The narrowness of original languages, and the practice of hieroglyphical writing which seems to have prevailed in most nations—especially in the east—during some period of their existence, rendered it almost necessary to express occasionally one thing by another, to which it was supposed to have some resemblance or analogy.

In visions or dreams, whether sent by God or not, some symbols or language must have been employed; and the business of the Oneirocritic or interpreter was to ascertain the import of such symbols. The interpreter who practised by art could only guess at that import, and in nine instances out of ten was likely to guess erroneously; but he who interpreted by inspiration was in no danger of falling into error, though each symbol, or word, taken by itself, must have had some meaning generally understood by those among whom such symbols and words were in general use, as well as by the prophet. "The early interpreters of dreams," says Bishop Warburton, (Divine Legation of Moses, b. iv. s. 4.) "were not juggling impostors; but, like the early judicial astrologers, more superstitious than their neighbours, and so the first that fell into their own delusions. However, suppose them to have been as arrant cheats as any of their successors, yet, at their first setting up, they must have had materials proper for their trade; which could never be the wild workings of each man's private fancy. Their customers would look to find a known analogy, become venerable by long application to mysterious wisdom, for the groundwork of their deciphering; and the decipherers themselves would as naturally fly to some confessed authority to support their pretended science. But what ground or authority could this be, if not the mysterious learning of symbolical characters? The Egyptian priests, the first interpreters of dreams, took their rules for this species of divination, from their symbolic riddling, in which they were so deeply read;—a ground of interpretation which would give the strongest credit to the art, and equally satisfy the diviner and the consulter; for it being generally believed that their gods had given them hieroglyphic writing, nothing was more natural than to imagine, that those gods, who, in their opinion, gave dreams likewise, had employed the same mode of writing in both revelations." When the true God gave revelations by dreams, he, of course, made use of the symbols that were most likely to arrest the dreamer's attention, and at the same time were generally understood; and in different countries he would make use of different symbols according to the practice of the people, for whose information the dream was sent. Thus in Pharaoh's two dreams, the symbols made use of were, in one, 'seven kine,' and, in the other, 'seven ears of corn.' In the hieroglyphics of Egypt the ears of corn denoted its fertility, and the kine its great tutelary patroness Isis. Thus far Pharaoh seems to have understood the dream without an interpreter; and hence arose his anxiety to understand the rest, as a matter that concerned the public. "Accordingly, when Joseph comes to decipher the dream, he does not tell the king that the two sevens denoted seven years, in Egypt, but simply seven years;—the scene of the famine needing no deciphering." In Nebuchadnezzar's second dream, he saw 'a fair and high tree,' of which the height reached to heaven; and this being the symbol of majesty in general, very naturally made the proud monarch anxious to know what particular monarch it signified; and therefore the prophet Daniel begins his interpretation with saying—'The tree that thou sawest—is THOU, O king! But if Daniel was intended by God, as he certainly was, to be an interpreter of the dreams sent by him to the king of Babylon—the scourge by whom he chastised sinful nations—it is obvious that a knowledge of the symbols by which events were supposed to be represented in Chaldea, was a species of preparatory knowledge absolutely necessary to him. The symbols employed for this purpose by the Chaldean magi may have been different from those in use among the priests of Egypt; but whether they were or not, it seems evident that hieroglyphical writing, and all kinds of symbolical representations of God and his attributes, were absolutely prohibited by the Mosaic Law. Daniel, therefore, must have been taught the import of the Chaldean symbols, to fit him for an important part of the office which he was destined to fill; and as God appears not on any occasion to work miracles for an object which can be attained by natural means, it is to be hoped that the deist will permit Christians to believe that Daniel might without sin be taught the meaning of the mysterious symbols of Chaldea by those wise men of that empire, among whom they were best understood. The sciences of astronomy and chemistry furnish many illustrious proofs of the power, wisdom, and good-thing of them that is not true, this we allow will have a suspicious aspect upon the authority of his writings: but when it is considered how common a thing it was for the princes of the east, upon one occasion or other, to multiply their names, and not only by foreigners, but even by their own people, to be called sometimes by one name, and sometimes by another; how usual it was for them to continue the titles of honour which were conferred in consideration of those great exploits, whereby the dignity of their family was originally raised, and to adopt them into the number of their own; how customary it was, upon their accession to the kingdom, for them to change their names, and yet the first and private name be still retained by most other people, while the imperial name appeared in public acts, and was used at home only: whoever considers this, I say, will cease his wonder, when, amidst such a variety of appellations for one and the same person, he finds this historian making use of one, and that of another, according as his fancy, his pronunciation, or the custom of the country where he lived, led him. Daniel, in all probability, calls the same person Darius Medus, whom the Greek historians call Cyaxares the Second: but when it is observed, that these historians agree with Daniel as to the main points of his narration, namely, ¹ that Babylon was taken by an army of Medes and Persians, whereof the Medes being the superior, were, at that time, named first; that Cyaxares, king of Media, assisted at the siege, and was treated by Cyrus as his chief; that after a day of riot and revelling the city was taken in the night time, by diverting the course of the river Euphrates, and the king of Babylon slain in his palace; that Cyaxares being old, and naturally inactive, chose rather to live at Ecbatan, the capital of Media, while Cyrus attended the affairs of the government of Babylon; and that Cyrus, upon his death, succeeded to the whole empire: if we observe, I say, the exact agreement between these historians, as to the chief matters of fact, we may easily dispense with some small difference in point of names; especially considering that the authors lived at no less a distance than Babylon is from Greece, and that the Greeks consequently might make use of the name which he went by in Media, as best known to them, which the Babylonians, after he had taken their city, changed into Darius Medus, or the victorious Mede, and which Daniel, being a captive in the place, might, in conformity, call him.

It ² may happen, indeed, that there is now and then a word or two, in the book of Daniel, which may seem to have some analogy to the Greek tongue, and with some little variation, may be derived from it; but then it is to be observed, that the words of this kind are, for the most part, technical terms, such as might slip into any language, without being perceived, and such a writer might properly enough use, without understanding any more of the tongue from whence they are borrowed. Architects and mechanics, we know, use to this day several Greek and Arabic terms of art in their respective professions, and yet they do not pretend to understand the language from whence they came: and why might not Daniel, speaking in terms of art, as he certainly does, when he ^a names the musical instruments, very probably of the Grecian make, which were used at the consecration of Nebuchadnezzar's golden image; why might not he, I say, make use of words of a foreign extract, and, at the same time, be supposed a stranger to the other parts of the language? This I think is the common privilege of most writers: nor is the mixture of some Greek terms in the Chaldee language so difficult a matter to account for, if we will but allow what Grotius, upon the place, observes, namely, "That before Daniel's age, many colonies both of the Ionians and Æolians, having settled themselves in Asia Minor, which lies contiguous to some provinces of the eastern kingdoms, might that way communicate the names of what they invented, or improved, even as far as Babylon itself."

The translation of the Septuagint has been held in such esteem, that to have any part of Scripture omitted in it would give a just suspicion, as if it had not been extant, or not known at the time when those learned men undertook the work: but this is so far from being true in the case of Daniel, that we find the Septuagint version of him read publicly in our Saviour's time; that we find Justin Martyr, ¹ and Clemens Romanus, ² who both wrote before Theodotion's version was made, both citing passages out of it; that we find St Jerome ³ giving us several various readings, different from those in Theodotion, and sometimes from those of Aquila and Symmachus, out of it; and, at the same time, telling us, why this translation of Daniel was repudiated, and that of Theodotion substituted in its room by the doctors of the church.

It was Origin indeed who first brought it into discredit, by comparing it with that of Theodotion from the original, in his Hexapla, which showed its imperfections a little too plainly; but then its degradation proves, that before this happened to it, it was all along used in the Christian church.

The omission of Daniel's name in the enumeration of the prophets which we meet with in Ecclesiasticus, ⁴ is of no great moment, because we find no mention made of Job or Ezra, and yet they both had books that were under their names, as well as he. The truth is, the history of the book itself may give us some grounds to think, that Daniel's character might possibly have been in it at first, though upon some occasion or other, it afterwards came to be dropped. Jesus the grandfather, as we read in the prologue, wrote it in several volumes, and left it behind him unfinished: the original fell into such hands as carried it into Egypt, where Jesus the grandson met with it, and having compiled it all orderly into one volume, upon account of the pains which he had taken with it, he joined his own name with that of his grandfather in the titlepage: ⁵ but it fared with this as it does with other books, to lose in translation, and to suffer by copyists; insomuch, that whoever will be at the trouble to compare the Greek editions with one another, and with the various translations, will discover words, parts of sentences, and whole periods, to be so frequently omitted, altered, contracted, explained, or enlarged, as to abate his wonder, that the mention of any person, though never so considerable, should be omitted in a book that is delivered to us so variously and imperfectly. But there may be another reason assigned for this omission: most part of the Old Testament was written in Hebrew, which was the common language of Judea, and in it did Jesus the son of Sirach write this book of Ecclesiasticus. Now, as a great part of the books of Ezra and Daniel was written in Chaldee, which was a tongue not so well known in Judea, it may reasonably be supposed, that the author's ignorance of that tongue might be the true reason why he omitted these two great men, and all account of their writings, in his catalogue of the prophets.

There are sundry reasons likewise to be given, why we have no Chaldee paraphrase upon Daniel, as well as the rest of the prophets: for, besides that a good part of Daniel is in the Chaldee tongue, and, upon that account, might less need one; it is a general complaint among the Jews themselves, that a great many of their ancient Targums have been lost, and an acknowledged case, that some of their sacred writers (such as Ezra and Nehemiah for instance, men famous in the Jewish story, and the latter of them highly celebrated by the son of Sirach) never had any. The truth is, the frequent calamities which befell the Jewish nation, and dispersed them into other countries, made them negligent of their books; left them no leisure to transcribe long paraphrasts; and when, by mixing among other people, they had lost the knowledge of the language, left them no ability to do it; so that, amidst this ignorance and confusion, it is no wonder if many valuable copies were lost, some of which ^b have since come to light; but there is reason to apprehend, that the Targum upon Daniel never will. For so much does this prophet speak of the Messiah, describe the signs, and define the time of his coming so precisely, that the Jews, perceiving the advantage which their adversaries the Christians might make of it, were under strong temptations, either to omit or suppress the paraphrase of a prophet so diametrically opposite to them. And accordingly, we have a story from ⁶ one of ^a Our learned Bishop Chandler is fully of opinion that the names of the instruments mentioned in Dan. iii. 5, are not Greek, but eastern derivations, that from thence they did pass to the Greeks, who, with a little alteration, adapted them to their pronunciation, or termination of words. "For," as he argues, "that their names were at first given them in the country where the instruments themselves were invented, can hardly be doubted; if therefore such instruments as are here specified were used in the east; if their names be proved to be barbarous; and if an eastern root can be assigned for their derivation, which no Greek theme will suit so well," all which he endeavours to prove in several instances, then may we be well allowed to infer that the names of these instruments, whatever affinity they may seem to have to the Greek language, were originally oriental; which opinion is confirmed by the testimony of Strabo, (h. x.) who assures us, that the names of musical instruments, such as nablia, sambuca, and barbitos, were derived from barbarous languages, by which the Greeks denote the eastern tongues.—See Vindication of the Defence of Christianity; and Louth's Commentary on Dan. iii.

their rabbins, that savours not a little of some such practice, namely, "that when Jonathan had finished his Targum on Job, Proverbs, and the Psalms, and was going on to Daniel, he was restrained by a voice, which bade him give over there, lest the sons of men should learn from Daniel the time of the Messias."

However this be, ¹ since Daniel is so far from being passed by in any dishonourable manner, that even Jonathan himself, in his Targum on the other prophets, expresses a great regard to him, by applying predictions found only in his book, to texts in other prophets that he was then interpreting; since, in doing this, he follows Daniel in his ideas, phrases, and words, and explains passages in other prophets by such as were plainer and fuller, in his opinion, in him; it certainly follows, that (however his paraphrase be lost) Daniel was in his esteem a prophet of equal, if not superior, credit to the prophets he was then commenting upon.

Whether the Jews were more than other nations addicted to the publishing of spurious tracts, under the names of their great authors, and particularly under Daniel's name, it concerns us not to inquire; since the very supposition implies thus much, that with the Jewish church, at that time, the writings of Daniel were held in high esteem, (for, in such a case, who would choose an inglorious father?) when these base pieces came out in his name. The having impostures fathered on him therefore is so far from being any prejudice to Daniel's genuine writings, that it rather redounds to the confirmation of their authority; since what was spurious did no sooner appear in the light, but it was despised, rejected, and condemned. The prayer of the three children was not read in all the copies of the Septuagint; the story of Susanna, in some manuscripts, stood apart from the book of Daniel, in others after it; and as for the fable of Bel and the Dragon, it was not intended by its first inventor to pass under the name of Daniel, but of one Habakkuk, the son of Jesus, of the tribe of Levi, till Theodotion, in his Greek edition of the Bible, thought proper to change its title.

The truth is, the Jewish church always looked upon these pieces as spurious, and therefore allowed them much the same place in their Scriptures that the apocryphal books have in our English Bibles; but the genuine book of Daniel they held always in the greatest veneration, esteeming the author of it as one of the chief of their prophets, until Maimonides, a learned Jew of the twelfth century, in order to bar all proofs that might be drawn from him in favour of Christianity, thought fit to degrade him from his prophetic character, and place him in the number of a hagiographical writers only.

a It is much to be questioned, whether such a distinction, as hagiographical books was known in our Saviour's time. All the partition that we read of is, the law and the prophets, and the rest of the books (Proleg. to Eclus.) which in Luke xxiv. 44, are called 'the Psalms;' and according to Philo (de Vit. Const.) "are hymns and other books, conducing to the promotion of piety and knowledge." This threefold distribution of the books of Scripture is taken from the nature and subjects of the books themselves, and not from any supposed degrees of sacredness between them; and, if the word Cethubim, or Hagiographa, was then, or rather in the next century, made use of, it was applied only as a general name for the poetical and moral books of Scripture, to which class neither Daniel nor any historical book was reducible.—Bishop Chandler's Vindication, &c.

Hard is the fate of a prophet, when the very clearness as well as obscurity of his writings must be imputed as an objection against his authority; but certainly we must allow, that it is as easy for an all-knowing God to foretell all circumstances of an event, or to reveal the whole series of events, in their proper connexion and succession, as to declare one single occurrence. Such knowledge and such wisdom are essential attributes of God: nor can there be any absurdity in his imparting his knowledge of future events, with more or less reserve to one man rather than another; only one would think, that the freer such communications were, and the more conspicuous the revelation, the more excellent should the prophet whom God pleased to honour in this manner be accounted. So unreasonable are the prejudices of those who make the clearness of prophecies an argument against them, and endeavour to exclude Daniel from the number of prophets, for a reason that best entitled him to that character!

"But what shall we say ² to his dark and abstruse way of writing in other places, his figurative and parabolical, his enigmatical and emblematical style, his uncouth images and symbols, entirely unlike the writings of the other prophets, but vastly agreeable to that turn which the Jews took up, when they came to be formed in the schools of the Greeks?" All the Greek authors that we are acquainted with, are strangers to this manner of writing; they abound, indeed, in figures and allegories; but the symbolical and emblematical form was purely oriental, and what other prophets as well as Daniel, as occasion requires, pursue.

For, doth not Isaiah foretell the destruction of the Egyptians under the image of God's ³ striking with a great and strong sword the Leviathan (or crocodile), and slaying the great dragon that is in the sea? Does not Jeremiah ⁴ speak of the Assyrians under the name of a dove, because ⁵ Semiramis had made that bird the symbol of her nation? Does not Ezekiel prophesy of Pharaoh under the figure of ⁶ a great dragon that lives in the midst of the rivers; of the king of Babylon, under the emblem of a ⁷ large eagle with great wings; and of the Assyrian, under the similitude of ⁸ a tall cedar in Lebanon, exalted above all trees, and reaching the clouds with its top, &c., the very same figure ⁹ whereby the kingdom of Nebuchadnezzar was represented? It is the genius of the eastern people to be delighted with fiction and imagery, and, as Sir John Chardin, in his description of Persepolis, tells us, nothing is more common among their authors, than to call countries by the names of their emblems, which are, as it were, the arms of that nation; and, in forming these emblems, to make use not only of natural animals, but of such as are chimerical and fabulous likewise, beasts with wings, and birds with four feet and long ears.

Persia," says he, "there are some very monstrous for figure and size. A winged lion with a crown on his head; a winged lion flying on the back of a bull; the body of a horse with wings on his back; and a man's head covered with a high bonnet crowned, &c. In images and hieroglyphics," continues he, "here one may see the wars of princes and countries, and their successes expressed. The beasts represent the people or land in war; their running at each other, their engagement; and the crown on the head of one of them, or his taking the other by the hair of the head, and stabbing him, points out his victory."

Now, since this method of describing things by images was so customary in the age and place where Daniel was captive, it is reasonable to suppose, that he conformed himself to it, and that the fictitious animals which he makes mention of, were no improper emblems of the several empires whereof he writes. The ram, for instance, was the royal ensign of the Persians,¹ as Ammianus Marcellinus observes; the goat, since their king Carinus, was the arms of Macedon; and therefore, how aptly does Daniel see a goat with a notable horn (for a horn² is always an emblem of power and dominion), to which he gives wings, because of the quickness of his success, to³ run against a ram with unequal horns, and cast him to the ground,⁴ when he foretells what the Mede and Persian empire should do, and suffer from the Macedonian Greeks? Upon 'the breaking of the great horn,' on Alexander's dying in the height of his triumphs and prosperity, how properly do⁴ 'four others come up towards the four winds of heaven,' to denote the division^a of his empire among four kings, whereof Ptolemy had Egypt, and the adjoining countries to the south; Antigonus had Asia to the north; Seleucus had Syria to the east; and Antipater Greece and Macedonia to the west.

⁵ A little horn coming out of one of these, and waxing exceeding great towards the south, and east, and pleasant land, nay, waxing so great as to cast down some of the host of heaven, and of the stars to the ground, and so trample upon them, may seem a wild extravagant rant: but when it is considered, that all this is meant of Antiochus, who was afterwards called by his flatterers Epiphanes, though himself a vile person, and usurper of the kingdom; that it is to represent him, as soon as he got possession of the Syrian kingdom, taking advantage of the youth of Ptolemy Philometer, and invading Egypt to the south, Armenia and Persia to the east; and Judea, which is here styled 'the pleasant land,' and frequently described as a land flowing with milk and honey, that it is to represent him persecuting the Jewish church and nation, here styled 'the host of heaven;' murdering the principal men of both, here called 'the stars;' deposing their high priest, whose title is 'the prince of the host;' profaning their temple, polluting their altar, abolishing their law, and establishing idolatry by a solemn edict,⁶ as whoever has read of the mad and impious actions of Antiochus^b must know: when this is considered, I say, a small allowance for the oriental manner of pompous writing will reduce these images to a tolerable size.

The plain truth is, princes and states were in old times painted by their symbols, which are therefore called their συμβόλαια, and, in after ages, came to be distinguished by writers under the name of such symbols, as well as by their proper appellations; and therefore 'the lion with eagle's wings,' signifying the strength of the Assyrian empire, and the celerity of its conquests; 'the beast with three ribs in his mouth,' intimating the reduction which Cyrus made of Babylon, Lydia, and Egypt, to the Persian monarchy; the 'leopard with four wings and heads;' denoting Alexander and his four successors; and the 'other beast with iron feet and ten horns,' representing the Roman empire, and the ten vited their mistresses likewise to accompany them; among whom was one Thais, a famous Athenian courtesan, who was then mistress to Ptolemy, afterwards king of Egypt. This woman, in the heat of her carousals, proposed to Alexander the burning down of the city and palace of Persepolis, in revenge to the Persians; especially for their burning of Athens under Xerxes; and, as the whole company was drunk, the proposal was received with a general applause, so that every man took a torch, and (with Alexander at the head of them) setting fire to the city and palace, in a short time, burnt them both to the ground. Thus, at the motion of a drunken strumpet, was destroyed, by this drunken king, one of the finest palaces in the world; for that this at Persepolis was such, the ruins of it sufficiently show, which are still remaining at a place near Shiras, named Chebelninar, which, in the Persian language, signifies forty pillars; and is so called, because such a number of pillars, as well as other stately ruins of this palace, are there still remaining even to this day.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 330.

^a Dr Prideaux is of opinion, that this partition of Alexander's empire, to which the prophecy has relation, did not happen till after the battle at Ipsus, where Antigonus was slain, and whereupon the four surviving princes divided the conqueror's dominions into four distinct kingdoms, whereof Ptolemy had Egypt, Lybia, Arabia, Cælo-Syria, and Palestine; Cassander, Macedonia and Greece; Lysimachus, Thrace, Bithynia, and some other provinces beyond the Hellespont and the Bosphorus; and Seleucus all the rest; Prideaux's Connection, anno 301. But others have made the division of his empire easuant immediately upon his death.—Cabal's Commentary on Dan. vii.

^b Many of the heathen writers give us this account of him, namely, that he would frequently get out of the palace, and ramble about the streets of Antioch with two or three persons only accompanying him; that, in his rambles, he would drink with strangers and foreigners, and even with the meanest and vilest of them; that, when he heard of any young company met together to make merry, he would intrude himself among them, and revel away the time with them in cups, and songs, and other frolics, without any regard to common decency, or his own royal character; that, in these frolics, he would often go out in the streets, and there scatter his money by handfuls, for the rabble to scramble for; that, at other times, he would go about with a crown of roses upon his head, and, in a Roman gown, would walk the streets alone, carrying a parcel of stones in his lap, to throw at those that should follow after; that he was much addicted to drunkenness and lasciviousness; was frequently found in the company of patibics, and common prostitutes, on whom he would gratify his lust publicly, and in the sight of the people; and that, having for his catamites two vile persons, called Timarchus and Heraclides, who were brothers, he made the former of them governor of Babylon, and the other his treasurer in that province. The short is, his freaks, follies, and vices were so many, that men were in a doubt whether he were a madman or a fool, though the former of these was generally thought his truest character; and, therefore, instead of Epiphanes the Illustrious, they commonly called him Epimanes, the Madman.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 175.

kingdoms, ^a or principalities, into which it was divided, was a language as well known to skilful readers at that time, as are the arms, the colours, and the field of escutcheons, in these latter days, to heralds.

^b Porphyry, no doubt, was well acquainted with this hieroglyphic way of writing, because all the objection which he makes to these prophecies of Daniel, concerning the four empires, is, that they were too plain and perspicuous, and more like historical narratives of facts already done, than prophetic predictions of things to come. But however this enemy of Christianity might urge the plainness of the prophet's predictions, in order to invalidate the authority of his book, it must not be denied, but that God, in his great wisdom, has so ordered the matter, for the exercise of our faith and industry, and so framed the prophetic style, that there should be still some shade and remains of obscurity, abiding upon the face of almost every prophecy, even after the time of its completion; and, therefore, instead of being surprised at the great variety of computations, which chronologers, and other learned men have put upon the 'seventy weeks' mentioned in Daniel, we may much rather wonder, how, at this distance of time, they have been able to come to any tolerable exactness.

The words of the prophecy are these:—'seventy weeks are determined upon thy people, and upon thy

^a Bishop Lloyd hath given us the following list of the ten kingdoms which arose out of the dissolution of the Roman empire, and the time of their rise. 1. Hunns erected their kingdom in that part of Pannonia and Dacia, which from them was called Hungary, about A. D. 336. 2. Ostrogoths settled themselves in the countries that reach from Rhetia to Masia, even as far as Thrace, about 377, and afterwards came into Italy under Alaricus in 410. 3. Wisigoths settled in the south parts of France, and in Catalonia, about 378. 4. Franks seized upon part of Germany and Gaul, A. D. 420. 5. Vandals settled in Spain, and afterwards set their kingdom in Africa, A. D. 407. 6. Suevians and Alans seized the western parts of Spain, A. D. 407, and invaded Italy 457. 7. Burgundians came out of Germany into that part of Gaul, called from them Burgundy, 407. 8. Rugians, and Thuringians settled in Italy under Odoacer, about 476. 9. Saxons made themselves masters of Great Britain, about the same time, 476. And 10. Longobards settled first in Germany, A. D. 383, and afterwards succeeded the Heruli and Thuringi in Hungary.—Louth's Commentary on Dan. vii. 24.

^b This Porphyry was a learned heathen, born at Tyre, in the year of Christ about 230, and there called Malchus; but upon his going among the Greeks, he changed it to Porphyry, which is much of the same signification; for Malchus in the Phœnician language, which was then spoken at Tyre, signifies a king, as μαρξάρχης, in the Greek denotes one that wore purple, which none but kings, and royal persons were then permitted to do. He was a bitter enemy to the Christian religion; and therefore wrote a large volume against it, containing fifteen books, whereof the twelfth was wholly levelled against the prophecies of Daniel; but because the predictions of this prophet, concerning the several empires, were acknowledged, on all hands, to have been fulfilled, he did not go about to disprove it; on the contrary, he endeavoured to maintain, by the testimony of the best Greek historians then extant, that they were fulfilled so exactly, and so minutely, that it was impossible for them to be the predictions of the Daniel who belonged to the Babylonish captivity, and must therefore be the spurious composition of some later author. But this argument St Jerome, in his comment upon Daniel, fully turns upon him. It is much to be lamented, however, that not only this whole work of Porphyry is lost, but that also the books of Eusebius Apollinarius, and Methodius, which were wrote in answer to this heathen adversary, (to the great damage both of divine and human knowledge,) have all undergone the same fate.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 161.

holy city, to finish the transgression, and to make an end of sins, and to make reconciliation for iniquity, and to bring in an everlasting righteousness, and to anoint the Most Holy. Know therefore and understand, that from the going forth of the commandment to restore, and to build Jerusalem unto the Messiah the prince ^c shall be seven weeks, and threescore and two weeks, and the street shall be built again, and the wall, even in troublous times; and after threescore and two weeks, shall Messiah be cut off, but not for himself: and the people of the prince that shall come, shall destroy the city, and the sanctuary, and the end thereof shall be with a flood; and at the end of the war, desolations are determined; and he shall confirm the covenant with many, for a week; and, in the midst of the week, he shall cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease; and for the overspreading of abominations, he shall make it desolate, even until the consummation, and that determined shall be poured upon the desolate.⁷

Now, to set these words in a right light, we must consider, 1st, That the main design and intendment of them is, to foretel the coming of the Messiah, his abolishing the Jewish, and setting up a new and more perfect religion; which is so manifest to every common reader, that later Jews (to avoid the force of this one prophecy) have even adventured to exclude the whole book of Daniel from the number of inspired writings, and to pronounce a curse upon any that shall pretend to compute the time of the Messiah's coming. 2dly, It is agreed by most interpreters, that the seventy weeks here spoken of (according to the prophetic style) are to be taken for weeks of years, every one of which contained seven years, and so the seventy weeks will amount to 490 years, at the expiration of which term, the matters contained in this prophecy were to have their accomplishment. But then the question is, at what point of time these seventy weeks, or what is all one, the 490 years, either began or expired? For if we can but find out one of these periods, there will be less difficulty in stating the other. Now, 3dly, It seems pretty plain, that the several events specified in the beginning of this prophecy, viz. 'to finish' or restrain transgressions; 2. 'To make an end of sin'; 3. 'To make expiation, or reconciliation for iniquity'; 4. 'To bring in everlasting righteousness'; 5. 'To seal up,' or complete, and 'fulfil vision and prophecy'; and 6. 'To anoint,' or consecrate 'the Most Holy,' were all accomplished in the great work of our salvation, by the death and passion, and by the doctrine and resurrection, of our Saviour Christ. For being born without original, and having lived without actual sin, he truly was the most holy of all that ever bore our nature, and being thereby fully fitted for this great work, 'he was anointed with the Holy Ghost, and with power,' to be our priest, our prophet, and our king.

As our priest, he offered himself a sacrifice upon the cross, and thereby made atonement for our sins, which is 'making an end of them,' by taking away their guilt; and in so doing, working reconciliation for us with God.

^c The colon, which, in our English Bibles, is placed after 'seven weeks,' in the middle of this sentence, should be placed after 'two weeks,' at the end of it, which wrong punctuation may possibly lead some people into an error in their computation.

A. M. 3417. A. C. 587; OR, ACCORDING TO HALES, A. M. 4825. A. C. 586. JER. xl. 7—xiv. DANIEL, AND EZRA i—v.

As our prophet, he gave us his gospel, a law of 'everlasting righteousness,' and the only revelation we are to expect. And as our king, he sent his Holy Spirit into our hearts, to guide and influence us according to this law; whereby he has taken an effectual method to restrain, and extinguish in us, all manner of transgression; and in doing all this, he has sealed up, that is, fulfilled, and thoroughly finished all, that by visions and prophecies had been before revealed concerning him.

Since¹ therefore all these events were brought to pass, and accomplished at the time of Christ's death, this must determine us where to fix the end of the weeks wherein these events were to be accomplished. And if the end of these weeks is to be fixed at the death of Christ, then, 4thly, This will determine us where to place the beginning of them, namely, 490 years before,^a which is the very year and month,^b wherein Ezra had his commission from Artaxerxes Longimanus, king of Persia, for his returning to Jerusalem, and there to restore the church and state of the Jews.

The only objection against this computation is,—That the words of the prophecy seem to denote a real building of the city, since it makes mention of its streets and walls; whereas that work was executed upon the decree by Cyrus, several years before Ezra was in commission. But this objection will appear of little force, if once it be considered, that figurative expressions are, in a

^a Most learned men agree, that the death of Christ happened in the year of the Julian period 4746, and in the Jewish month Nisan: and therefore, if we reckon 490 years backward, this will lead us to the month Nisan, and in the year of the Julian period 4256; which, according to Ptolemy's canon, was the seventh year of Artaxerxes' reign, in which the Scripture tells us (Ezra vii. 7), that this commission was granted.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 578.

^b Others are of opinion, that the commission here intended was not that which was given to Ezra, but that which Nehemiah had from Artaxerxes, in the twentieth year of his reign, at which period they place the commencement of these seventy weeks; which, being reduced to 490 lunar years, bring us down to the time when our Saviour Christ was put to death. There are some variations, indeed, concerning the calculation of these years. Chronologers differ among themselves a little; but the greatest difference does not exceed nine or ten years; and yet even this, Petavius, who has treated of the subject, in his twelfth book de Doctrina Temporum, has endeavoured to accommodate, by showing that the words of the prophecy of Daniel, concerning the going forth of the command to restore and rebuild Jerusalem, ought to be understood of the complete execution of that order, which was performed by Nehemiah only; and that the twentieth year of Artaxerxes mentioned in Nehemiah i. 1, ought to be explained, not of the twentieth year of Artaxerxes alone, but of the twentieth from the time that his father made him his associate in the throne, which was ten years before his death; which ten years being deducted from the number of years that elapsed from the decree of Artaxerxes in favour of Nehemiah, to the death of Jesus Christ, deliver the chronologers out of all their perplexities, and dispel all the difficulties that the few supernumerary years occasioned; Calmet's Dissertation on the Seventy Weeks, &c. What the learned Bishop Lynd's manner of computing these weeks is, the reader will find fully explained and illustrated by Mr Bedford, in his Scripture Chronology, (b. 7. c. 1); and if he would have still farther satisfaction herein, he may consult Pererius upon Daniel; M. Basnage's Dissert. upon the seventy weeks; F. Hardouin's Dissert. on the same subject; and that of F. Frischmuth, in his Thesaurus Dissertationum, at the end of the great critics.—[Dr Hales's Analysis of Ancient Chronology is also worthy of being consulted on the Prophecies of Daniel, though the worthy author is too eager to launch into futurity: see also Mr Bell's Dissertation on Dan. xi.; Rollin, vol. 2. p. 510.]—Ed.

manner, necessary in prophecies, and that nothing is more common in Scripture, than by Jerusalem, in particular, to mean the whole political and ecclesiastical state of the Jews.

There is another difficulty observable in this prophecy, which deserves our attention, and that is, the division of the seventy weeks into three distinct periods, that is, into seven weeks, sixty-two weeks, and one week, to each of which a different event is assigned. In the seven weeks, or forty-nine years, from the going forth of the commandment, the streets and walls of Jerusalem, that is, the restoration and establishment of the church and state of the Jews, is to be accomplished. In the sixty-two weeks, or 434 years more, the Messiah is to come, and make his appearance in the world; and in one week, or seven years after this, he is to 'confirm a covenant with many, and cause the sacrifice and oblation to cease:' all which were literally fulfilled. For, in the space of forty-nine years, which answers to seven weeks, the reformation and establishment of the Jewish church and state was carried on, and completed, first by Ezra, in virtue of a decree granted in the seventh year of Artaxerxes, and afterwards by Nehemiah, in virtue of another granted him by the same prince, in the twentieth year of his reign. From that time, in the space of 434 years, which answers to sixty-two weeks, our blessed Saviour appeared in the world as the Messiah; and for seven years after that (which answers to the one week in the prophecy), first, by his forerunner John the Baptist, for the space of three years and a half more, he confirmed the covenant of the gospel with as many of the Jews as were converted, and embraced these laws of everlasting righteousness which he published; and at length by the sacrifice of his most precious blood, made all other victims and oblations (which were but types and emblems of his) for ever cease and be abolished. As to the other part of the prophecy, it relates so evidently to the destruction of Jerusalem, that it needs no explanation. Whoever has read Josephus cannot but observe, that, by the destruction of the city and sanctuary, by the people of the prince that was to come, who, with their armies and desolating abominations, should invade Judea as with a flood, and, by a terrible and consuming war, bring utter ruin and destruction upon it, and upon all the people of the Jews that should dwell therein, can be meant nothing but Titus at the head of the Roman army, executing the wrath of God for the murder of his Son, our Saviour, upon that devoted city and people, in such a terrible and tragical manner as their historian has related.

Ezekiel, indeed, according to the sentiment of some rabbins, was a prophet of more obscurity than Daniel, and, especially in the description of the chariot, as they call the first chapter, so very intricate and abstruse, that they would not permit it to be read by any until they were arrived at the age of thirty. The design of the prophet in that chapter is, to represent the great and glorious appearance of God coming to give him instructions in the management of his prophetic office; and, to this purpose, he makes use of images foreign indeed to our manner of writing, but which are all significant and full of majesty. He seats himself on a radiant throne, supported by cherubim moved by wheels of an uncommon make, covered with the canopy of heaven, and encircled with the rainbow; and though, in the description of the cherubim and wheels, there may be something not so agreeable to our way of thinking, yet we are not to suppose, but that, in the whole, it was adapted to the age wherein the prophet wrote, and in each part perhaps did include an excellent moral. Angels, of what rank or denomination soever, are all ministering spirits, and the instruments of God's providence in the government of the world; and therefore are represented here as supporting his throne, and in allusion, ¹ very likely, to the triumphal chariots of eastern princes, which are drawn by several sorts of beasts, they are said ² every one to have four faces. Their wings denote their readiness and alacrity; their eyes, their sagacity and vigilance; their hands, their prudence and dexterity; their feet, their steadiness and resolution in performing the divine commands; and ³ the noise of their wings, when they went, expressed the terribleness of the judgments which they were to execute upon Jerusalem and all the Jewish nation.

And, in like manner, ⁴ the make and fashion of the wheels which these cherubim actuate, shows, that all the ways of providence are uniform, and subservient to each other; as ⁵ their going perpetually forward intimates, that providence does nothing in vain, but always accomplishes its designs. ⁶ The largeness of the rings or circumference of the wheels, denotes the vast compass of providence, ⁷ 'which reacheth from one end to another mightily.' ⁸ Their being full of eyes implies, that the motions of providence are directed by unerring wisdom; and ⁹ their moving, when the cherubs moved, seems to demonstrate, with what readiness and alacrity all the instruments of providence do concur in carrying on his great designs. ⁴ Thus, full of instruction is every little symbol in this description! And therefore it is doing injustice to the character of the prophet, to find fault with his images, because they agree not with the present mode, or to censure his writings before we understand them.

His prophecy ¹⁰ concerning Gog and Magog is perhaps deservedly thought one of the most difficult passages that occur in the Old Testament; and accordingly, the conjectures about it have been various. It is generally agreed, however, that the words ^b Gog and Magog are not real but fictitious names; and therefore their wars with the people of God, some have applied to the cruelties of Antiochus Epiphanes against the Jews; others to the persecutions of the Gentiles against the Christians; some to the irruption of the Goths, and other barbarous nations, into the Roman empire; others to the ravages which the Turks made in Asia, and some parts of Europe; and others again, to those, as is prophesied elsewhere, oppressions which, in the latter days, Antichrist shall bring upon the true professors of our most holy religion.

¹¹ The main current of interpreters will have the Gog in Ezekiel to be Antiochus; but then there are some exceptions to this opinion, that may be gathered from Ezekiel himself. For whereas the Gog in Ezekiel ¹² 'was to fall upon the mountains of Israel;' ¹³ 'was to be buried in the east of the Mediterranean sea;' was to have an army destroyed, ¹⁴ 'by their turning their swords upon one another;' and ¹⁵ the Israelites were to gather the 'spoils, and burn their arms for several years:' whoever looks into the history of Antiochus, will see that he died at a little town called Taba, in the confines of Persia occasion of turning the whole machine. The cherubim having the conducting of this throne, it is obvious to remark how well adapted their figure was to their service; their faces looking every way, so that there was no occasion for turning, as a horse must, in obedience to directions, to proceed to the right, or to the left, instead of going straight forward. As much misapprehension respecting these appearances, has arisen from the idea of the wheels and the cherubim being full of eyes, (Ezek. i.) Mr Taylor next endeavours to correct that mistake. It is surprising, he remarks, that when the same Hebrew word עין ayin, had been rendered colour, in verses 4, 7, 16, 22, 27, it should in verse 18 be rendered eyes. It means the glittering splendid hues—the fugitive reflected tints, those accidental coruscations of colours, such as we see vibrate in some precious stones, which, seen in some lights, show certain colours, but seen in other lights, show other colours. This sense of the word is confirmed by the use of it in Numb. xi. 7: 'the manna was like coriander seed, itself; but the eye of it—the reflected glistening tint which vibrated from it—was like to the eye—the glistening tint—of the bdellium.' It would not be far from the truth, to say, that these eyes were of the nature of those we call eyes in a peacock's feather: that is, that they were spots peculiarly embellished with colours, or streaks like those of the golden pheasant of China.—Calmet's Dict.—Ed.

^b Magog was the son of Japhet, (Gen. x. 2.) from whom the Scythians were generally supposed to be derived; a people well known in the east for their frequent irruptions and devastations therein made, and who, for their rapine and violence, cruelties and barbarities of all kinds, for some time passed into a proverb; and therefore, whether we suppose Cambyzes or Antiochus, as we shall see hereafter, to be the Gog in Ezekiel, the prophet's calling him by the name of a 'wild Scythian' can be no objection, because scarce ever were any two men more cruel, more savage, and brutal in their passions, than they; insomuch, that we may truly say, that, as the Scythians were the terror of all the east, so Cambyzes and Antiochus were the horror and abomination of mankind.—Calmet's Commentary on Gog and Magog.

^a Each cherub had four faces: (1.) that of a man; (2.) that of a lion; (3.) that of an ox; (4.) that of an eagle. These four faces were probably attached to one head, and seen by the beholder in union, being joined, each by its back part, to the others. Their body, from the neck downwards, was human; 'the likeness of a man.' This human part first meeting the spectator's eye, had he seen nothing else, he might from thence have supposed the whole form to be human. Ezekiel describes the cherub as having four wings;—Isaiah describes the seraph as having six wings; say, two on his head, two on his shoulders, two on his flanks. Their arms, rendered in our translation hands, were four, one on each side of the creature. The remainder, or lower part of their figure, was, from the rim of the belly downwards, either (1.) human thighs, legs, and feet, to which were appended, at the posteriors, the body and hind legs of an ox; or rather, (2.) the body and the fore legs of an ox, out of which the human part seemed to rise, so that all below the rim of the belly was ox-like, and all above that division was human. From which formation a spectator paying most attention to their lower parts, might have been inclined to think them oxen; or at least bestial. With regard to their services, or what they appeared to do, Mr Taylor asks, was the vision seen by the prophet Ezekiel, as well as that by the prophet Isaiah, the resemblance of a movable throne or chariot, of prodigious dimensions, on which the sovereign was understood to sit; and to which the wheels were annexed in much the same manner as to the royal travelling, or military thrones of the Persian kings; while the four cherubim occupied the places of four horses to draw this magnificent machine? This he thinks probable, and illustrates the idea at some length. The wheels described in Ezek. i. 15—21. in connexion with the cherubim, Mr Taylor conceives to have been representative of the throne of the Deity; the construction—wheel within wheel—being for the purpose of their rolling every way with perfect readiness, and without any and Babylonia; that, upon his death, his army suffered no defeat, neither did the Jews reap any advantage by it, because his son Antiochus Eupater continued to oppress and harass them with wars as much as ever.

But if Antiochus was not the Gog in Ezekiel, the question is, Who was? And to resolve this question, we may observe, that (be the person who he will) the prophet speaks of him as a powerful prince, who should come from the north,¹ with a numerous army,² made up of different nations, exasperated against the Jews, and with full intent³ to plunder and ravage their country; but that he should be disappointed in his design, and⁴ his army miraculously destroyed.

We may observe farther, that this event was to happen after the return from the captivity; because the prophet mentions it as a thing future: ⁵ 'thou shalt come into a land (speaking of Gog) that is brought back from the sword, and against a people who have lately returned from amidst the nations where they had been dispersed; which can be meant of none but the Jews; but⁶ that it could not happen after the time of the Maccabees, because the Jewish history is, from thence, so very well known, that a transaction of this nature could not well escape us; and therefore we may conclude that it was between the return from the captivity, and the first appearing of the Maccabees, a very obscure interval as to the Jewish affairs, that what the prophet relates of Gog and his adventures, came to pass; and if so, we can see no prince or potentate to whom the characters which the inspired writers give of him, can so properly belong, as to Cambyses the son of Cyrus.

According to the accounts of all history, he was cruel and barbarous, excessively impious, and insatiably covetous. His indignation against the Jews he expressed⁷ by a revocation of a grant which his father gave for the rebuilding of their city and temple. He led a large army into Egypt, composed of all the different nations⁸ that Ezekiel mentions, who were overwhelmed (a great many of them at least) by the driven sands of the deserts. In his return from Egypt,⁹ he died at Ecbatan in Palestine, at the foot of Mount Carmel, which faces the Mediterranean sea, of a wound which he received by his sword's falling accidentally out of the scabbard; so that a great many lines of the picture which the prophet draws of Gog, meet in Cambyses, though it must be acknowledged that all do not.

¹⁰ What bids fair for this opinion, however, is the order and series of events which Ezekiel seems to have observed in his prophecies; for having first foretold the taking of Jerusalem, the captivity of Babylon, and the desolation of Tyre, Egypt, and some other countries neighbouring upon Judea, he proceeds, in the next place, to the dissolution of the Chaldean monarchy, and the return of the Jews from their captivity: but before they are well settled in their native country, Gog and his numerous army are introduced to trouble their repose, and threaten their ruin; but that God interposes to rid them of this fierce enemy, who is said to have fallen in the mountains of Israel, he, and all his army. It must be owned, indeed, that the writers of the life of Cambyses make mention of no intention in this prince to fall foul upon the Jews, nor do they say any thing of the destruction of his army, ensuant upon his death; but upon the supposition, that the prophecy relates to him, God, who knew the evil disposition of that prince's heart towards the Jews, (which no profane author could penetrate,) has given us this part of his history: ¹¹ 'Thus saith the Lord, it shall also come to pass, that at the same time, thou shalt think an evil thought, and shalt say, I will go up to the land of unwall'd villages; I will go to them that are at rest, that dwell safely, all of them dwelling without walls, and having neither bars nor gates, to take a spoil, and to take a prey, to turn my hand upon the desolate places that are now inhabited, and upon the people that are now gathered out of the nations.' What became of his army, after he was dead, we cannot tell. Herodotus, who gives us the largest accounts of him, immediately after his decease, passes to the history of the Magian, who usurped his throne; and therefore we may suppose,¹² that as they consisted of so many different nations, and followed him only by compulsion, when once their head was gone, they crumbled into parties, quarrell'd, and, as¹³ the prophet had foretold, turned their arms upon one another; which was no more than what¹⁴ the Philistines did in the time of Saul, and¹⁵ the Midianites, when Gideon judged Israel. ^a

^a The following is Rosenmuller's account of Gog and Magog. It seems to rest upon a much better foundation than that given above:—'The word Magog, which in the ethnographic table in Genesis, is the name of Japhet's second son, appears in Ezek. xxxviii. 2, as the name of a country, whose ruler was called Gog, and who, at the same time, was prince of Meshech and Tubal, that is of the Moschi and Tibareni. It is said, that after the people of God should be delivered from all their enemies and oppressors, and enjoy a long season of repose, this powerful monarch would collect a numerous and formidable host of the tribes of the distant north, and overrun the Holy Land, where, however, he would meet a signal overthrow, and be buried in a valley on the east side of the lake of Genesareth, (chap. xxxix. 11.) In the Revelation of St John, (chap. xx. 8.) Gog and Magog are not spoken of as lands or their rulers, but as two great nations, comprising the heathen at the four ends of the earth, who, after the millennial reign, shall be stirred up by Satan to encamp against the holy city, and shall be destroyed by fire from heaven. Among the Arabs and Persians the nations of Yajooj and Majooj correspond to the Gog and Magog of the Hebrews. They are supposed to have descended from Japhet, and to dwell in the distant north. Alexander the Great is said to have erected a wall, in order to prevent the inroads of these plundering tribes into the countries of the south. From the accounts found in Arabian and Persian geographers of Yajooj and Majooj, we conclude that they comprehend, under this designation, all the less known barbarous people of the north-east and north-west of Asia; the same who were described among the Greeks and Romans by the name of Scythians, and among the later Europeans by the name of Tatars, (corrupted into Tartars.) Yet though the Gog and Magog of the Hebrews may have had an equally vague acceptance, it nevertheless seems to have pointed more precisely to the northern tribes of Caucasus, between the Euxine and Caspian Seas. This idea is countenanced, not only by the fact of the names being connected in Ezekiel with Ararat (Armenia,) Meshech (the Moschi,) and Tubal (the Tibareni); but also by the circumstance that the famous Caucasian wall, anciently erected by a Persian monarch as a defence against the incursions of the northern barbarians, and which extended from Derbend, on the western shore of the Caspian to near the Black Sea, was called the wall (against) Yajooj and Majooj, that is, Gog and Magog, a name which the remains still bear. We have been so large in our answers to some of the last objections, that we have less room left for the reconciliation of some seeming inconsistencies that are alleged in this period of history; but a little will suffice for this.

For, 1. Whereas the number of the people, returning from the captivity, is much larger in the general sum than it is in the particulars, it is to be remembered, that not only those of Judah and Benjamin, but several also of the other tribes, took the benefit of the decree which Cyrus granted in favour of the Jews, to return again into their own land. That they did so, is plain from the tenor of the decree itself, which extends ¹ 'to all the people of the God of Israel,' whereof (as Josephus informs us) Zerubbabel sent a copy into Media, to the rest of the ten tribes, who, 'together with the rest of the fathers of Judah and Benjamin,' are supposed to be those, ² 'whose spirit God had raised up to go?' and therefore the difference between the gross and the particular sums arises from hence, ³ that in the latter, the tribes of Judah, Benjamin, and Levi, only are reckoned by their families; whereas in the former, all those of the other tribes that accompanied them in their return to Jerusalem are added.

This accounts for the difference between the general and particular sums in Ezra; and then why the particulars in Ezra differ from the particulars in Nehemiah, the matter (according to a very competent ⁴ judge) is to be the terms Gog and Magog are evidently used allegorically, as names of the enemies of Christianity, who will endeavour to extirpate it from the earth, but shall thereby bring upon themselves signal destruction."—(Bib. Cabinet, No. xi. Rosenmüller, Bib. Geog. vol. i. pp. 121—123.) With regard to the wall of Gog and Magog mentioned by Rosenmüller, Ker Porter (Travels, vol. ii. p. 520.) thus writes,—“The name Daghestan implies a land of mountains, and it contains some of the most inaccessible of this branch of the Caucasian range, which runs directly through the heart of this country. The eastern side, towards the sea, commands the most level ground; and on that shore we find the district and city of Derbent. It possesses a picturesque citadel, though situated at rather an unserviceable distance from the town and harbour; but I am told that part of the ancient wall, named Gog and Magog, is very traceable near this old stronghold, and that its foundations may be tracked thence, running in a westerly direction over even the highest mountains. This place, and its adjacent district, a position deemed of the greatest importance by all conquerors, whether Persians, Greeks, Arabs, &c. who could acquire its possession, is now the property of Russia.” This wall was really built by the famous Noushirvan, king of Persia, as a barrier against the invasions of the Khazars. That Gog and Magog were to be sought for in the Caucasus, was the idea of Borchart. “He observes,” says Wells, (Geog. of the Old Testament, vol. i. p. 121.) that these words גֹּג־מַגּוּג, denote in the neighbouring oriental tongues as much as Gog's Fort, and from Gog-chasan the Greeks framed the name Καύκασος, Caucasus.” And besides finding the word Gog preserved in Gogarene, a district of Iberia, he believes Prometheus, chained to the Caucasus by Jupiter, to have been none other than Gog.

The Scherif-el-Edrisi, in his geographical work called “The Diversion of the Curious,” gives a singular account of Yajooj and Majooj, taken from the travels of one Salam the interpreter. This person, says he, was sent about the beginning of the ninth century, by the Calif Mohammed Ameen Billah, to discover the mountain Kokaiya, with the bank or rampart of Yajooj and Majooj, who dwelt on the north of it, and who were confined within by a great gate of iron, fifty cubit high, supported by great buttresses, with an iron bulwark reaching to the summit of conceived and apprehended thus,—“That Nehemiah found the list and catalogue of those that came up in the first of Cyrus, as it was then taken, and that he called over the names of the families, as they lay in order there; that he observed the order of the old list, in calling them over, and lifting them, but took the real number of them, as they were at the time, when he numbered them, that some families were now more in number than they were when the first list was made, and some fewer; and some that were in that list were not to be found now; for some more of the same stock had come up from Babylon, since the first numbering, and others, who had come up at first, and were then numbered, were now gone back again.”

2. Whereas it is said of the fourscore Israelites, that they were ⁵ ‘carrying their offerings to the house of the Lord,’ when the house of the Lord at Jerusalem had, for some time before, been destroyed by the Babylonians; ⁶ why may we not suppose, that the place where the temple stood, even after its destruction, was held in such veneration, that the people who were left in the country, after the general captivity, chose to offer their sacrifices and oblations there, as long as they remained in the land; and that having no priests at Jerusalem, they might go to Mizpeh (where these servants of the Lord had, very probably, put themselves under the governor's protection) to fetch one from thence, in order to assist them in their religious offices?

⁷ Samaria, indeed, and the other parts from whence these devout persons came, lay to the north, and Mizpeh to the south of Jerusalem, a little too far distant for them to go for a priest; and therefore others have imagined, that after the destruction of the temple, Gedaliah, by the advice of the prophet Jeremiah, and the priests that were with him, had established a tabernacle, and built an altar at Mizpeh, where the people, for the present, might resort to pay their devotions, and present their oblations, until by some happy turn of affairs, their temple might come to be built again; and that this tabernacle and altar might with propriety enough, be called ‘the house of the Lord.’

We can hardly believe, indeed, that after the temple was gone, the people were to live without any place of religious worship; and, therefore, considering that Mizpeh was all along esteemed a place of more than ordinary sanctity; that after the return of the ark, there ⁸ ‘Samuel gathered together all Israel before the Lord;’ that there he built an altar, and ⁹ ‘offered a sacrifice;’ and that in the time of the Maccabees, when the Jews were in the same case as now, without a temple, and without an altar, they here ¹⁰ ‘assembled themselves together;’ for Mizpeh, as the author of that history tells us, ‘was the place where they prayed aforesaid in Israel;’ we cannot but think, that there is something of reality in the supposition, and that these eighty pious mourners were going to Mizpeh, and not to Jerusalem, 'the bloody and perfidious Ishmael circumvented them.

3. Once more: whereas it is said, ² 'that the priests and Levites, and elders of the fathers,' who had seen the first temple, wept when the foundation of the second was laid, though it is manifest, that the latter temple was ³ forty cubits larger than the former; it must be remembered, that the reason of their weeping was, not so much because it was like to prove far inferior to that of Solomon as to its outward structure, but because it was to want those extraordinary marks of the divine favour, wherewith the other temple was honoured. The second temple was built upon the same foundations with the first: and therefore the different measures that we find of them in the books of Kings and Ezra, are to be understood in respect of the different distances between which the said measures were taken. The twenty cubits' breadth, which is said of Solomon's temple, was from the inside of the wall on the one side, to the inside of the wall on the other; but the sixty cubits' breadth of that to be built by Zerubbabel, was the breadth of the whole building, from the inside of the outer wall of it on the one side, to the inside of the outer wall on the other. So that the difference of the said twenty cubits' breadth, and of the said sixty cubits' breadth, is no more than this.—That the one is meant of the temple strictly so called, the other of the temple and its appertaining buildings. Both the temples then, without all doubt, were of the same dimensions; but then here was the difference, the sad difference, which drew tears from the eyes of the elders, viz. that, in all appearance, there were little or no hopes, that the poor beginnings of the latter temple would ever be raised to the grandeur and magnificence of the former, since the one had been built by the wisest and richest king, and constantly adorned by some one or other of his posterity; the other now begun by a small company of exiles, just returned from their captivity; the one in a time of profound peace, and the greatest opulence, the other in a time of common calamity and distress; the one finished with the most costly stones and timber, wrought with exquisite art, and overlaid with vast quantities of gold, the other to be raised out of no better materials than what could be dug from the ruinous foundation of the old one. But the occasion of their grief was not only this, that the materials and ornaments of the second temple, ⁴ were even as nothing 'in comparison of the first;' but the ark of the covenant ^a and the mercy-seat, which was upon it, ^b the holy fire ^c upon the altar, the Urim and Thummim, ^d the spirit of prophecy, ^e the Shechinah, ^f or divine presence, the five great things for which the former temple was so renowned, were lost and gone, and never to be recovered to this other.

never more be seen; and this, though a fiction, is designed to inform us, that, in the destruction of Jerusalem, this sacred piece of furniture was lost. The Jews, indeed, upon the building of the second temple, made an ark of the same shape and dimensions with the first, and put it in the same place; but it had none of its honours and prerogatives; no tables of the law, no Aaron's rod, no pot of manna in it, no appearance of the divine glory over it, no oracles given from it; the only use that was made of it was, to be a representative of the former on the great day of expiation, and to be a repository of the Holy Scriptures, that is, of the original copy of that collection which was made of them after the captivity, by Ezra, and the men of the great synagogue.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 535.

^b This was the cover of the ark of the covenant. It was made of solid gold, and at the two ends of it were fixed two cherubim of the same metal, which, by their wings extended forwards, seemed to form a throne for the majesty of God, who, in Scripture, is represented to us as sitting between the cherubim, and the ark itself was, as it were, his footstool. The Hebrew word caporeth, by being translated propitiatory, seems to imply, that from thence the Lord heard the vows and prayers of his people, and pardoned them their sins; and by its being, at other times, translated oracle, seems farther to imply, that from thence he manifested his will and pleasure, and gave responses to Moses.—Cabnet's Dictionary, under the word.

^c This fire came down from heaven, first upon the altar in the tabernacle, at the consecration of Aaron and his sons to the priesthood, (Lev. ix. 24.) and, afterwards, it descended anew upon the altar in the temple of Solomon, at its consecration, (2 Chron. vii. 1.) and there it was constantly fed and maintained by the priests, day and night, in the same manner as it had been in the tabernacle. The Jews have a tradition, that Jeremiah, foreseeing the destruction of the temple, took this fire, and hid it in a pit, but that, at the rebuilding of the temple, being brought again from thence, it revived upon the altar; but this is all a fiction: for the generality of them allow, that, at the destruction of the temple, it was extinguished; and, in the time of the second temple, nothing was made use of for all their burnt-offerings but common fire only.—Prideaux's Connection.

^d Whether the Urim and Thummim lay in the high priest's breastplate itself, or only in the clearness and perfection of those oracular answers which he received from God, when he went to consult him upon any important matter, so it was, that, having put on all his pontifical robes, and presented himself in the sanctuary before the holy of holies, he knew, by one means or other, most probably by an audible voice from the mercy-seat (which was within behind the veil), what the divine pleasure was concerning the affair wherein he came to consult him. This was a singular privilege vouchsafed to the Jews; but it does not appear from the sacred history, that there are any footsteps of consulting the Lord in this manner after the building of Solomon's temple to the time of its destruction; and, after its destruction, all are agreed, that this was never restored; so that there seems to be some reason for that maxim among the Jews, namely, that the Holy Spirit spake to the children of Israel, during the tabernacle, by Urim and Thummim; under the first temple, by the prophets; and under the second by Bath-col, or a voice sent from heaven, such as was heard at the baptism of Jesus Christ, and at his transfiguration.—Patrick's Commentary; and Cabnet's Dictionary.

^e This, it must be owned, was not wholly withdrawn from the Jewish church, in the time of the second temple. The prophets Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi lived in this time and prophesied: but, after their death (which the Rabbins say happened in one year), the prophetic spirit wholly ceased from among the Jews.—Prideaux's Connection.

^f The Shechinah was a sensible token of God's presence among the Jews, which consisted of a visible cloud, resting over the mercy-seat, or cover of the ark of the covenant, just above the two cherubim, that overshadowed it, (Lev. xvi. 2.) It there first appeared when Moses consecrated the tabernacle, and afterwards, at the consecration of the temple by Solomon, was trans-

In it were put the two tables of the law, the broken ones as well as the whole ones (say the Rabbins), and nothing else was put therein when it was brought into Solomon's temple, 1 Kings viii. 9; but in process of time, Aaron's rod, the pot of manna, and the original volume of the law, written by Moses' own hand, came to be likewise put into it, Heb. ix. 4. The Jews have a tradition, which Epihanus (in Vita Jerem. Prophete) takes notice of, that Jeremiah foreseeing the approaching ruin of the temple, carried the ark of the covenant into a cave, and by his prayers prevailed that it might be sunk, and swallowed up in the rock, so that it might

This was a just matter of lamentation to those that had seen these singular tokens of the divine favour in the former temple, and a discouragement of their proceeding with the building of the present; and therefore the prophet Haggai was sent to inform them, that all these wants and defects should be abundantly repaired by the coming of the Messiah, the true Shechinah of the Divine Majesty, in the time of the second temple: 'I will shake all nations, and the desire of all nations shall come, and I will fill this house with glory; the glory of this latter house shall be greater than of the former, saith the Lord of hosts.'

CHAP. III.—On the History of Cyrus, and the Taking of Babylon.

SUPPLEMENTAL BY THE EDITOR.

As the taking of Babylon is one of the greatest events in ancient history, and as the principal circumstances with which it was attended were foretold in the Holy Scriptures many years before it happened, it may not be improper that, by the insertion of a few observations, we enable the reader more fully to compare the predictions and the accomplishment of them together.

The pride, the cruelty, and the impiety of Babylon, provoked the wrath of God against her. With regard to her pride, she believed herself to be invincible. 'She said in her heart, I am the queen of nations, and I shall remain so for ever. I am, and none else beside me; I shall not sit as a widow, neither shall I know the loss of children.' As to her cruelty, God himself complains of it: 'I was wroth with my people, and have given them into thine hand: thou didst show them no mercy; upon the ancient hast thou very heavily laid thy yoke.' And as to her impiety, her monarch not only preferred his false divinities to the true and only God, but fancied that he had vanquished his power, because he was possessed of the vessels which had belonged to his worship; and as if he meant to affront him, he affected to apply those holy vessels to profane uses.

If ever there was a city, as Dr Keith observes, that seemed to bid defiance to any predictions of its fall, that city was Babylon. Its walls, which were reckoned among the wonders of the world, appeared rather like the bulwark of nature, than the workmanship of man. The temple of Belus, half a mile in circumference, and a furlong in height,—the hanging gardens, which, piled in successive terraces, towered as high as the walls—the embankments which restrained the Euphrates—the hundred brazen gates—and the adjoining artificial lake,—all displayed many of the mightiest works of mortals concentrated in a single spot. Yet, while in the plenitude of its power, and, according to the most accurate chronologers, 160 years before the foot of an enemy had lated thither; (See vol. 2, 437) and there continued, in the same visible manner, while the ark was in its own proper place, either in the tabernacle or temple (but not while it was in movement, as it often was during the time of the tabernacle), till the Babylonians destroyed the temple, after which it never appeared more.—Prideaux's Connection.

entered it, the voice of prophecy pronounced the doom of the mighty and unconquered Babylon. A succession of ages brought it gradually to the dust; and the gradation of its fall is marked till it sink at last into utter desolation. At a time when nothing but magnificence was around Babylon the great, fallen Babylon was delineated exactly as every traveller now describes its ruins.

Chaldea, with its rich soil, and warm climate, and intersected by the Tigris and Euphrates, was one of the last countries in the world, of which the desolation could have been thought of by man. Yet the debasing idolatry, and brutifying wickedness of its inhabitants provoked, and brought down the vengeance of heaven.

'The burden of Babylon, which Isaiah the son of Amos did see. The noise of a multitude in the mountains, like as of a great people; a tumultuous noise of the kingdoms of nations gathered together; the Lord of hosts mustereth the host of the battle. They come from a far country, from the end of heaven, even the Lord, and the weapons of his indignation, to destroy the whole land. Behold the day of the Lord cometh, cruel both with wrath and fierce anger, to lay the land desolate; and he shall destroy the sinners thereof out of it. Babylon the glory of kingdoms, the beauty of the Chaldee's excellency, shall be as when God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah. It shall never be inhabited, neither shall it be dwelt in from generation to generation; neither shall the Arabian pitch tent there; neither shall the shepherds make their fold there. But wild beasts of the desert shall lie there; and their houses shall be full of doleful creatures; and owls shall dwell there, and satyrs shall dance there. And the wild beasts of the islands shall cry in their desolate houses, and dragons in their pleasant palaces.'

'I will cut off from Babylon, the name, and remnant, the son and nephew, saith the Lord. I will also make it a possession for the bittern and pools of water; and I will sweep it with the besom of destruction, saith the Lord of hosts. Thus saith the Lord, that saith unto the deep, be dry; and I will dry up thy rivers; that saith of Cyrus, he is my shepherd, and shall perform all my pleasure,—and I will lose the loins of kings, to open before him the two leaved gates; and the gates shall not be shut.—I will punish the land of the Chaldeans, and will make it perpetual desolations. And I will bring upon that land all my words which I have pronounced against it, even all that is written in this book which Jeremiah hath prophesied against all the nations. Declare ye among the nations, and publish, and set up a standard; publish and conceal not; say, Babylon is taken, Bel is confounded, Merodoch is broken in pieces; her idols are confounded, her images are broken in pieces. For out of the north there cometh up a nation against her, which shall make her land desolate, and none shall dwell therein; they shall remove, they shall depart, both man and beast. For, lo, I will raise, and cause to come up against Babylon, an assembly of great nations from the north country: and they shall set themselves in array against her; and from thence she shall be taken; their arrows shall be as of a mighty, expert man; none shall return in vain. And

A. M. 3117. A. C. 587; OR, ACCORDING TO HALES, A. M. 4825. A. C. 586. JER. xl. 7.—xlv. DANIEL AND EZRA i—v.

Chaldea shall be a spoil; and all that spoil her shall be satisfied, saith the Lord. Behold the hindermost of the nations a wilderness, a dry land and a desert. Because of the wrath of the Lord, it shall not be inhabited, but it shall be wholly desolate; every one that goeth by Babylon shall be astonished, and hiss at all her plagues. The Lord hath opened his armoury, and hath brought forth the weapons of his indignation; for this is the work of the Lord God of hosts in the land of the Chaldees. Come against her from the utmost border, open her storehouses; cast her up as heaps, and destroy her utterly, let nothing of her be left.—Therefore the wild beast of the desert, with the wild beasts of the islands shall dwell there, and the owls shall dwell therein: and it shall be no more inhabited for ever; neither shall it be dwelt in from generation to generation. As God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah, and the neighbouring cities thereof, saith the Lord; so shall man no more abide there, neither shall any son of man dwell therein.¹

‘Set up a standard in the land, blow the trumpet among the nations, prepare the nations against her, call together against her the kingdoms of Ararat, Minni, and Aschenas: Lo, I will raise and cause to come up against Babylon an assembly of great nations from the north country.’

Cyrus subdued the Armenians, who had revolted against Media, spared their king, bound them over anew to their allegiance, by kindness rather than by force, and incorporated their army with his own. He adopted the Hyrcanians who had rebelled against Babylon, as allies and confederates, with the Medes and Persians. He conquered the united forces of the Babylonians and Lydians, took Sardis, with Cræsus and all his wealth, spared his life after he was at the stake, restored to him his family and his household, received him into the number of his counsellors and friends, and thus prepared the Lydians, over whom he reigned, and who were formerly combined with Babylon, for coming up against it: he overthrew also the Phrygians and Cappadocians, and added their armies in like manner to his accumulating forces. And by successive alliances and conquests, by proclaiming liberty to the slaves, by a humane policy, consummate skill, a pure and noble disinterestedness, and a boundless generosity, he changed, within the space of twenty years, a confederacy which the king of Babylon had raised up against the Medes and Persians, whose junction he feared, into a confederacy even of the same nature against Babylon itself,—and thus a standard was set up against Babylon in many a land, kingdoms were summoned, prepared, and gathered together against her.

‘They shall hold the bow and the lance,—they shall ride upon horses,—let the archer bend his bow,—all ye that bend the bow shoot at her.’ Forty thousand Persian horsemen were armed from among the nations which Cyrus subdued; many horses of the captives were besides distributed among all the allies. And Cyrus came up against Babylon with a great multitude of horse; and also with a great multitude of archers and javelin men,—that held the bow and the lance.

No sooner had Cyrus reached Babylon, with the nations which he had prepared, and gathered against her, than in the hope of discovering some point not utterly impregnable, accompanied by his chief officers and friends, he rode around the walls, and examined them on every side, after having for that purpose stationed his whole army round the city. They camped against it round about. They put themselves in array against Babylon round about.

Frustrated in the attempt to discover, throughout the whole circumference, a single assailable point, and finding that it was not possible, by any attack, to make himself master of walls so strong and so high, and fearing that his army would be exposed to the assault of the Babylonians by a too extended, and consequently weakened line.—Cyrus standing in the middle of his army gave orders that the heavy armed men should move, in opposite directions, from each extremity towards the centre; and the horse and light armed men being nearer and advancing first, and the phalanx being redoubled and closed up, the bravest troops thus occupied alike the front and the rear, and the less effective were stationed in the middle.

A trench was dug round the city—towers were erected—Babylon was besieged—the army was divided into twelve parts, that each, monthly, by turn, might keep watch throughout the year;—and though the orders were given by Cyrus, the command of the Lord of hosts was unconsciously obeyed, ‘let none thereof escape.’

‘The mighty men of Babylon have forborne to fight. They have remained in their holds; they might hath failed; they became as women.’ Babylon had been the hammer of the whole earth, by which nations were broken in pieces, and kingdoms destroyed. Its mighty men carried the terror of their arms to distant regions, and led nations captive. But they were dismayed, according to the word of the God of Israel, whenever the nations which he had stirred up against them, stood in array before their walls. Their timidity, so clearly predicted, was the express complaint and accusation of their enemies, who in vain attempted to provoke them to the contest. Cyrus challenged their monarch to single combat, but also in vain;² for the hands of the king of Babylon waxed feeble. Courage had departed from both prince and people; and none attempted to save their country from spoliation, or to chase the assailants from their gates. They sallied not forth against the invaders and besiegers, nor did they attempt to disjoin and disperse them, even when drawn all round their walls, and comparatively weak along the extended line. Every gate was still shut; and they remained in their holds. Being as unable to rouse their courage, even by a close blockade, and to bring them to the field, as to scale or break down any portion of their stupendous walls, or to force their gates of solid brass, Cyrus reasoned, that the greater their number was, the more easily would they be starved into surrender, and yield to famine, since they would not contend with arms, nor come forth to fight. And hence arose, for the space of two years, his only hope of eventual success. So dispirited became its people, that Babylon, which had made the world as a wilderness, was long unresistingly a beleaguered town. But possessed of many fertile fields, and of provisions for twenty years, which in their timid caution they had plentifully stored, they derided

Cyrus from their impregnable walls within which they remained. Their profligacy, their wickedness and false confidence were unabated; they continued to live carelessly in pleasures, but their might did not return; and Babylon the great, unlike to many a small fortress and unwall'd town, made not one effort to regain its freedom or to be rid of the foe.

Much time having been lost, and no progress having been made in the siege, the anxiety of Cyrus was strongly excited, and he was reduced to great perplexity, when at last it was suggested, and immediately determined on, to turn the course of the Euphrates. But the task was not an easy one. The river was a quarter of a mile broad, and twelve feet deep, and in the opinion of one of the counsellors of Cyrus, the city was stronger by the river than by its walls. Diligent and laborious preparation was made for the execution of the scheme, yet so as to deceive the Babylonians. And the great trench, ostensibly formed for the purpose of blockade, which for the time it effectually secured, was dug around the walls on every side, in order to drain the Euphrates, and to leave its channel a straight passage into the city, through the midst of which it flowed. But, in the words of Herodotus, "if the besieged had either been aware of the designs of Cyrus, or had discovered the project before its actual accomplishment, they might have effected the total destruction of their troops. They had only to secure the little gates which led to the river, and to man the embankment on either side, and they might have enclosed the Persians as in a net, from which they could never have escaped."¹ Guarding as much as possibly they could against such a catastrophe, Cyrus purposely chose, for the execution of his plan, the time of a great annual Babylonish festival, during which, according to their practice, "the Babylonians drank and revelled the whole night." And while the unconscious and reckless citizens "were engaged in dancing and merriment," the river was suddenly turned into the lake, the trench and the canals; and the watchful Persians, both foot and horse, so soon as the subsiding of the water permitted, entered by its channel, and were followed by the allies in array, on the dry part of the river. "I will dry up thy sea, and make thy springs dry; that saith to the deep be dry, I will dry up thy rivers."

One detachment, says Herodotus, was placed where the river first enters the city, and another where it leaves it.² And one post did run to meet another, and one messenger to meet another, to show the king of Babylon that his city is taken at the end, and that the passages are short. They were taken by surprise, according to the historian just mentioned; and such was the extent of the city, that they who lived in the extremities were made prisoners before any alarm was communicated to the centre of the place where the palace stood. Not a gate of the city wall was opened; not a brick of it had fallen. But 'a snare was laid for Babylon—it was taken, and it was not aware; it was found and also caught, for it had sinned against the Lord. How is the praise of the whole earth surprised! For thou hast treated in thy wickedness, and thy wisdom, and thy knowledge, it hath perverted thee, therefore shall evil come upon thee, and thou shalt not know from whence it riseth, and mischief shall come upon thee, and thou shalt not be able to put it off?"

'In their heat I will make their feasts, and I will make them drunken, that they may sleep a perpetual sleep and not wake, saith the Lord. I will bring them down like lambs to the slaughter.' Cyrus, as the night drew on, stimulated his assembled troops to enter the city, because in that night of general revel within the walls, many of them were asleep, many drunk, and confusion universally prevailed. On passing, without obstruction or hinderance, to the city, the Persians, slaying some, putting others to flight, and joining with the revellers, as if slaughter had been merriment, hastened by the shortest way to the palace, and reached it, before a messenger had told the king that his city was taken. The gates of the palace, which was strongly fortified, were shut. The guards stationed before them were drinking beside a blazing light, when the Persians rushed impetuously upon them. The louder and altered clamour, no longer joyous, caught the ear of the inmates of the palace, and the bright light showed them the work of destruction, without revealing its cause. And, not aware of the presence of an enemy in the midst of Babylon, the king himself (who had been roused from his revelry by the handwriting on the wall), excited by the warlike tumult at the gates, commanded those within to examine from whence it arose; and according to the same word by which the gates leading from the river to the city were not shut, the loins of kings were loosed to open before Cyrus the two-leaved gates. At the first sight of the opened gates of the palace of Babylon, the eager Persians sprang in. "The king of Babylon heard the report of them; anguish took hold of him." He and all who were about him perished; God had numbered his kingdom and finished it: it was divided, and given to the Medes and Persians: the lives of the Babylonian princes, and lords, and rulers, and captains, closed with that night's festival; the drunken slept a perpetual sleep and did not wake.³

'Her young men shall fall in the streets, and all her men of war shall be cut off in that day.' Cyrus sent troops of horse throughout the streets, with orders to slay all who were found there. And he commanded proclamation to be made, in the Syrian language, that all who were in the houses should remain within; and that if any one were found abroad, he should be killed. These orders were obeyed.

'I will fill thee with men as with caterpillars.' Not only did the Persian army enter with ease as caterpillars, together with all the nations that had come up against Babylon, but they seemed also as numerous. Cyrus, after the capture of the city, made a great display of his cavalry in the presence of the Babylonians, and in the midst of Babylon. Four thousand guards stood before the palace gates, and two thousand on each side. These advanced as Cyrus approached; two thousand spearmen followed them. These were succeeded by four square masses of Persian cavalry, each consisting of ten thousand men: and to these again were added in their order, the Median, Armenian, Hyrcanian, Caducian, and Sacian horsemen,—all, as before, riding upon horses, every man in array, with lines of chariots.

four abreast, concluding the train of the numerous hosts. Cyrus afterwards reviewed at Babylon the whole of his army, consisting of one hundred and twenty thousand horse, two thousand chariots, and six hundred thousand foot. Babylon, which was taken when not aware, and within whose walls no enemy, except a captive, had ever been seen, was also filled with men as with caterpillars, as if there had not been a wall around it. There is in every particular a strict coincidence between the predictions of the prophets and the historical narratives, both of Herodotus and Xenophon. The prophecies of Isaiah were delivered above one hundred and sixty years before the taking of Babylon, two hundred and fifty years before Herodotus, and nearly three hundred and fifty before Xenophon.

On taking Babylon suddenly, and by surprise, Cyrus, as had been literally prophesied concerning him, and as the sign by which it was to be known that the Lord had called him by his name,¹ became suddenly possessed of the most secret treasures of Babylon. No enemy had ever dared to rise up against that great city. To take it seemed not a work for man to attempt; but it became the easy prey of him who was called the servant of the Lord. And as at this day, from the perfect representation given by the prophets, of every feature of fallen Babylon, now at last utterly desolate, man may know that God is the Lord, seeing that all who have visited and describe it, show that the predicted judgments against it have been literally fulfilled; so, at that time Cyrus, who, for two years, could only look on the outer side of the outer wall of Babylon, and who had begun to despair of reducing it by famine, was to know by the treasures of darkness and hidden riches of secret places being given into his hand, that the Lord which had called him by his name, was the God of Israel. When the appointed time had come, that the power of their oppressor was to be broken, Babylon was taken; and when the similarly prescribed period of the captivity of the Jews, for whose sake he was called, had expired, Cyrus was their deliverer.

‘Thus saith the Lord to his anointed, to Cyrus, whose right hand I have holden, to subdue nations, before him.’ Cyrus, commencing his career with a small army of Persians, not only succeeded to the kingdom of the Medes and Persians, first united under him, but the Hyrcanians yielded also voluntarily to his authority. He subdued the Syrians, Assyrians, Arabs, Cappadocians, both Phrygias, the Lydians, Carians, Phœnicians, and Babylonians. He governed the Bactrians, Indians, and Cilicians, and also the Sacians, and other nations. He likewise reduced to his authority the Greeks that were in Africa, and the Cyprians and Egyptians.

On taking Babylon suddenly, and by surprise, Cyrus became immediately possessed of the treasures of darkness, and hidden riches of secret places. On his first public appearing in Babylon, all the officers of his army, both of the Persians and allies, according to his command, wore very splendid robes, those belonging to the superior officers being of various colours, all of the finest and brightest dye, and richly embroidered with gold and silver; and thus the hidden riches of secret places were openly displayed. The past history of the land of the Chaldeans may be briefly closed in the language of prophecy; for the prophets, in their visions, saw it as it is; although historians knew not, even after its grandeur was partially gone, how to tell of its fertility which they witnessed, and hope to be believed. Those who recorded the word that the Lord spake against Babylon and against the land of the Chaldeans, had no such fear, though 2400 years have elapsed since they described what is now only at last to be seen.

Where astronomers first registered eclipses, and marked the motions of the planetary bodies, the natives, as in the deserts of Africa, or as the mariner without a compass on the pathless ocean, can now direct their course only by the stars, over the pathless desert of Chaldea. Where cultivation reached its utmost height, and where two hundred fold was stated as the common produce, there is now one wide and uncultivated waste; and the sower and reaper are cut off from the land of Babylon. Where abundant stores and treasures were laid up, and annually renewed and increased, fanners have fanned, and spoilers have spoiled them till they have emptied the land. Where labourers, shaded by palm trees 100 feet high, irrigated the fields till all was plentifully watered from numerous canals, the wanderer, without an object on which to fix his eye, but stunted and shortlived shrubs, can scarcely set his feet without pain, after the noonday heat, on the arid and parched ground, in plodding his weary way through a desert, a dry land, and a wilderness. Where there were crowded thoroughfares from city to city, there is now silence and solitude; for the ancient cities of Chaldea are desolations,—where no man dwelleth, neither doth any son of man pass thereby.

A chapter of sixty pages in length, of Mr Buckingham’s travels in Mesopotamia, is entitled, “Search after the Walls of Babylon.” After a long and fruitless search, he discovered on the eastern boundary of the ruins, on the summit of an oval mound, from seventy to eighty feet in height, and from three to four hundred feet in circumference, “a mass of solid wall, about thirty feet in length, by twelve or fifteen in thickness, yet evidently once of much greater dimensions each way, the work being, in its present state, broken and incomplete in every part;”² and this heap of ruin and fragment of wall he conjectured to be a part—the only part, if such it be, that can be discovered—of the walls of Babylon, ‘so utterly are they broken.’ Beyond this there is not even a pretension to the discovery of any part of them.

Captain Frederick, of whose journey it was the “principal object to search for the remains of the wall and ditch that had compassed Babylon,” states that, “neither of these have been seen by any modern traveller. All my inquiries among the Arabs,” he adds, “on this subject completely failed in producing the smallest effect. Within the space of twenty-one miles in length along the banks of the Euphrates, and twelve miles across it in breadth, I was unable to perceive any thing that could admit of my imagining that either a wall or a ditch had existed within this extensive area. If any remains do exist of the walls, they must have been of greater circumference than is allowed by modern geographers. I may possibly have been deceived; but I spared no pains to prevent it. I never was employed in riding and walking less than eight hours for six successive days, and upwards of twelve on the seventh." ¹

Major Keppel relates, that he and his party who accompanied him, in common with other travellers, had totally failed in discovering any trace of the city walls, and he adds, the divine predictions against Babylon have been so literally fulfilled in the appearance of the ruins, that I am disposed to give the fullest signification to the words of Jeremiah, ² "the broad walls of Babylon shall be utterly broken."

From palaces converted into broken hills, as Dr Keith observes,—from streets to long lines of heaps— from the throne of the world to sitting on the dust—from the hum of mighty Babylon to the death-like silence that rests upon the grave to which it is brought down;—from the great storehouse of the world, where treasures were gathered from every quarter, and the prison-house of the captive Jews, where they served in hard bondage to Babylon, the spoil of nations, itself taken from thence, and nothing left;—from a vast metropolis, the place of palaces, and the glory of kingdoms, whither multitudes ever flowed, to a dreaded and shunned spot, not inhabited nor dwelt in from generation to generation, where even the Arabian, though the son of the desert, pitches not his tent, and where the shepherds make not their folds;—from the treasures of darkness, and hidden riches of secret places, to the taking away of bricks, and to an uncovered nakedness;—from making the earth to tremble, and shaking kingdoms, to being cast out of the grave like an abominable branch;—in extremes like these, there is not a single fact that may not most appropriately be ranked under a prediction, and that does not tally entirely with its express and precise fulfilment, while, at the same time, they all united, show the destruction which has come from the Almighty upon Babylon.

"Who hath declared this from ancient time? Who hath told it from that time? Have not I the Lord? and there is no god beside me;—declaring the end from the beginning, and from ancient times, the things that are not yet done—saying, my counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure." Is it possible that there can be any attestation of the truth of prophecy, if it be not witnessed here? Is there any spot on earth which has undergone a more complete transformation? "The records of the human race," it has been said with truth, "do not present a contrast more striking, than that between the primeval magnificence of Babylon, and its long desolation."³ Could any prophecies respecting any single place have been more precise, or wonderful, or numerous, or true, or more perfectly accomplished throughout many generations? And when they look at what Babylon was, and what it is, and perceive the minute realization of them all,—may not nations learn wisdom—may not tyrants tremble,—may not sceptics think.⁴

Before concluding this chapter, it should be remarked, that the recording of the name of Cyrus in an inspired book, and showing beforehand that God had chosen him to overturn the Babylonian empire, is expressly mentioned as having respect to two great objects: first, the deliverance of Israel; and, second, the making known his supreme divinity among the nations of the earth.

'For the sake of my servant Jacob,
And of Israel my chosen,
I have even called thee by thy name,
I have surnamed thee, though thou knowest me not,
I am Jehovah and none else.
Beside me there is no God.
I will gird thee, though thou hast not known me
That they may know from the rising of the sun,
And from the west, that there is none beside me.'

It was therefore intended by this proceeding, on the part of Providence, to teach not only Cyrus, but the people of his vast empire, and surrounding nations, first, that he was Jehovah, the self-subsistent, the eternal God; second, that he was God alone, there being no Deity beside himself; and third, that good and evil represented by light and darkness, were neither independent nor eternal subsistences, but his great instruments, and under his control.

The Persians who had vastly extended their empire by the conquests of the countries formerly held by the monarchs of Babylon, were thus prepared for such a reformation of their religion as Zoroaster effected. If the Magi who came from the east to seek Christ were Persians, some true worshippers of God would appear to have remained in Persia to that day; and if, as is probable, the prophecies of Isaiah and Daniel were retained among them, they might be among those who waited for redemption, not at Jerusalem, but in a distant part of the world.

CHAP. IV.—Of the Pride and Punishment of Nebuchadnezzar.

WHOEVER looks back upon the actions of Nebuchadnezzar, will easily perceive that he was a great and successful warrior; that, during ⁵ his father's lifetime, and, while he commanded the army as general under him, he drove the Egyptians, the only nation that pretended, at this time, to rival the Babylonish monarchy, out of Syria and Palestine, took Jerusalem, and carried away the people captive; and that, upon his own accession to the throne, he overcame the Phœnicians and Tyrians, overran all Egypt, and made it tributary, and returned home in triumph loaded with rich spoils. The Scripture, however, does not impute the occasion of his pride to the number of his conquests, or the extent of his dominions, but to the state and magnificence of his royal city, in which, as it were at one view, he saw all the fruits of his martial toil, all the spoils of his many victories, and all the revenues of his vast empire comprised, and displayed in their utmost splendour. For while he was walking upon his palace at Babylon, very probably in his hanging gardens, and in the uppermost terrace of them, from whence he might have a full prospect of the whole city, ⁶ "Is not this Great Babylon," said he to himself, 'which I have built for the house of the kingdom, by the might of my power, and for the honour of my majesty?'

Babylon was one of the most ancient cities of the world. It was founded by Nimrod, not long after the building of the famous tower of Babel, and was enlarged and beautified by Semiramis; but Nebuchadnezzar was the person who put the finishing hand to it, to make it one of the great wonders of the world: and therefore it may not be amiss, to take a short survey of the works that are generally ascribed to him, in order to see what grounds he might have for this arrogant vaunt.

1. The whole city, which stood on a large flat, consisted properly of two parts, which were divided by the river Euphrates. That part of it which was on the east side of the river was the old city; the other, on the west side, was added by Nebuchadnezzar, and the whole was a square of 120 furlongs, or fifteen miles every way, which made the whole circumference of it to be 480 furlongs, or exactly threescore miles. Its walls, which were in thickness eighty-seven feet, ^a in height 350 feet, and in compass 480 furlongs, were all built of large bricks, cemented together with bitumen, a glutinous slime, which, issuing out of the earth in that country, binds stronger and firmer than lime, and, in a short time, grows harder than the very brick and stone which it cements.

The city was encompassed without the walls with a vast ditch, filled with water, and lined with bricks on both sides, after the manner of a counterescarp; and, as the earth which was dug out of it made the bricks wherewith the walls were built, we may judge of the depth and largeness of the ditch from the vast height and thickness of the walls. In the whole compass of the wall there were 100 gates, that is, five and twenty on each of the four sides, all made of solid brass; and, between every two of these gates, at proper distances, were three towers, that is, at the four corners of this great square, there were four towers, ^b between each of these corners and the next gate on either side three towers; and every one of these towers was ten feet higher than the walls.

Answering to every one of these gates, there was a street which led from gate to gate; so that there were fifty in all, each fifteen miles long; whereof twenty-five going one way, and twenty-five another, they crossed each other at right angles, and so cut the whole city out into 676 squares, each of which was four furlongs and an half on every side, that is, two miles and a quarter in compass; and round these, on every side towards the street, stood the houses, all built three or four stories high, with fronts adorned with all manner of embellishments, and with yards and gardens thrown backwards. Besides these, there were four other streets, built only on one side, because they had the wall on the other, which went round the four sides of the city, and were all of them 200 feet broad, though the other streets were but 150. ^c

Quite cross the city ran a branch of the river Euphrates, which entered in on the north, and went out on the south side; and over it, in the very middle of the city, was a bridge of a furlong in length, and thirty feet in breadth, built with wonderful art, to supply the defect of a foundation in the bottom of the river, which was all sandy. By this bridge a communication was kept up between the two parts of the city; and, at the two extremities of it, stood two palaces, the old one on the east, and new one on the west side of the river. The former of these took up four of the squares abovementioned, the other nine; and the temple of Belus, which stood near the old palace, took up another.

2. The temple of Belus, which was one of the most wonderful works in the world, was a square of a furlong on each side, that is, half a mile in the whole compass; and consisted of eight towers, or what seemed like towers, built one above another. Herodotus tells us, that the way to go up it was by stairs on the outside round it; from whence it seems most likely, that the whole ascent to it was by the benching-in, drawn in a sloping line, from the bottom to the top, eight times round it, and that this made the appearance of eight towers one above another. The eight towers, as they are called, being like so many stories, were each of them ^d seventy-five feet high, and in them were many great rooms, with arched roofs, supported with pillars, which, after that the place was consecrated to an idolatrous use, were all made parts of the temple; but the most sacred parts of all, and where the chiefest devotions were performed, was the uppermost story, over which, on the top of the tower, was an observatory, by the benefit of which the Babylonians advanced their knowledge in astronomy beyond ^e all other nations.

^c For an interesting inquiry into the extent and population of Babylon, we refer the reader to Bell's Rollin, vol. i. pp. 186, 187, note.—ED.

^d Some, following the mistake of the Latin version of Herodotus, wherein the lowest of these towers is said to be a furlong thick and a furlong high, will have each of these towers to be a furlong high, which amounting to a mile in the whole, is enough to shock any one's belief. But the Greek of Herodotus, which is the authentic text of that historian, says no such thing, but only that it was a furlong long and a furlong broad, without mentioning any thing of its height at all. And therefore Strabo, in his description of it, calling it a pyramid, because of its decreasing and benching-in at every tower, says of the whole, that it was a furlong high and a furlong on every side, which, without any farther addition makes it exceed the greatest of the pyramids of Egypt, I mean for its height. For, whereas the height of the tallest pyramid was no more than 481 feet, that of the temple of Belus was 600, that is, higher by 119 feet, which is one quarter of the whole.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 570.

^e The Babylonians made great boasts of the antiquity of their knowledge in this kind of learning. They reckoned 473,000 years, from the observations of their first astrologers to the arrival of Alexander the Great; but Aristotle, who was curious in inquiring into the truth of what was related of these observations, desired of Calisthenes, his scholar, who accompanied Alexander to Babylon, to send him the most certain and exact account that

^a Some authors indeed will have them to have been no more than fifty cubits; but then they speak of them only as they were after the time of Darius Hystaspes; for the Babylonians having revolted from him, and, in confidence of their strong walls, stood out against him in a long siege, after he had taken the place, in order to prevent their rebellion for the future, he took away their gates, and beat down their walls to the height abovementioned, and beyond this they were never after raised.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 570.

^b This is to be understood only of those parts of the walls where there was need of towers; for some parts of them lying against morasses always full of water, where they could not be approached by any enemy, had no need of any towers at all for their defence; and therefore in them there were none built; for, whereas the whole number of them amounted to no more than 200, had the same uniform order been observed in their disposition all round, there must have been many more.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 570.

A. M. 3117. A. C. 587: OR, ACCORDING TO HALES, A. M. 4825. A. C. 586. JER. xl. 8—xiv. DANIEL, AND EZRA i—v.

This tower, and the several rooms in it, were all that was called 'the temple of Belus,' until Nebuchadnezzar enlarged it with vast buildings, which were erected in a square of two furlongs on every side, or a mile in circumference. On the outside of these was a wall enclosing the whole, in which were several gates leading to the temple, all made of solid brass, very probably from the brazen sea, the brazen pillars, and the other brazen vessels, which, ¹ from the temple of Jerusalem, were carried to Babylon.

This temple stood till the time of Xerxes; but he, on his return from the Grecian expedition, having first plundered it of its immense riches, among which were several images or statues of massy gold, demolished the whole of it, and laid it all in ruins. Alexander, upon his return to Babylon from his Indian expedition, proposed to have rebuilt it, and, to that purpose, set ten thousand men on work to clear away the rubbish; but his death, in a short time after, put an end to all further proceedings in that design, and (as modern travellers assure us) the knowledge of the very place where it once stood is at this time lost. ^a

3. Near to this temple, on the east side of the river, as we said, stood the old palace of the kings of Babylon, four miles in circumference; and exactly over-against it, on the other side of the river, was the new palace, built by Nebuchadnezzar, eight miles in compass, and surrounded with three walls one within another. But the most wonderful things belonging to it were the hanging gardens, which Nebuchadnezzar made in complaisance to his wife Amylis, ² daughter of Astyages king of Media; for she, retaining a strong inclination for the mountains and forests of her own country, desired to have something like it in Babylon: and therefore, to gratify her, he erected this monstrous work of vanity.

These gardens contained a space of four hundred feet square, and were carried up aloft into the air, in the

he could gather of this matter; and accordingly he sent him astronomical observations that had been made for 1903 years, which came within 115 years of the flood, or fifteen years after the tower of Babel was built, but fell infinitely short of their other monstrous computation, though this of Calisthenes seems to be a little enlarged; because, according to our chronology, we reckon no more than eighteen hundred years from Nimrod and the tower of Babel, to the reign of Alexander at Babylon.—Cabnet's Dictionary, under the word Babylon.

^a This was supposed to be the case at the time our author wrote; but the investigations of Rich, Ker, Porter, Kinnear, &c., have satisfactorily proved that the mound called by the Arabs, Birs Nimroud, or the Palace of Nimrod, and by the Jews Nebuchadnezzar's Prison, is the site of the celebrated temple of Belus, completed, if not begun, by Nebuchadnezzar. This mound stands in the centre of an immense court, surrounded by a canal, and which encloses a space of about two miles, the whole of which is one mass of ruins. The Birs rises in the centre of this to the height of 198 feet, surmounted by a tower, whose shattered elevation is 37 feet above the massy mound, and 22 feet broad. The country round this for many miles is covered with remains of buildings in the form of larger or smaller mounds, but clearly traceable by the masses of brick of which they are composed. A full description of these ruins would occupy more space than we can afford; but the inquiring reader may refer to Mr Bell's note on this subject in his edition of Rollin, vol. i. p. 380, et seq., where a full and satisfactory account of the ruins is given, and the exact fulfilment of all the prophecies respecting ancient Babylon clearly demonstrated.—Ed.

manner of several large terraces, one above another, until the highest of them came up to the height of the walls of the city, that is to say, was three hundred and fifty feet high. The ascent was from terrace to terrace, by stairs ten feet wide, and the whole pile was sustained by vast arches built upon arches one above another, and strengthened by a wall surrounding it on every side, of two and twenty feet in thickness.

On the top of the arches were first laid large flat stones sixteen feet long, and four broad; over them was a layer of reed, mixed with a great quantity of bitumen; over this were two rows of brick, closely cemented together by plaster; over these were laid thick sheets of lead, and all this to keep the moisture of the mould from draining away; and then, lastly, upon this lead was laid such a large quantity of earth heaped together, as afforded depth enough for the largest trees to take root in it. For, in this garden there was every thing that could either delight the eye, or gratify the curiosity, beautiful and large trees, flowers, plants, and shrubs; and to keep every thing verdant and gay in the upper terrace, there was an aqueduct or engine which drew up water out of the river into a kind of reservoir above, and from thence watered the whole garden.

4. The river, indeed, at a certain season of the year, namely, in the months of June, July, and August, by the sun's melting the snow in the mountains of Armenia, used to overflow its banks (in the same manner as the Nile in Egypt does), to the great damage of the city and country of Babylon; and therefore, to prevent this inconvenience for the future, Nebuchadnezzar had two artificial canals cut, on the east side of the Euphrates, in order to carry off the superfluous water into the Tigris. One of these canals discharged itself near Seleucia, and the other over against Apania: and, for the farther security of the country, from the head of these canals down to the city, and some way lower, he made vast banks of brick and bitumen; but the most wonderful part of the work was within the city.

There, on each side of the Euphrates, he built, from the very bottom of the channel, a great wall of the same thickness with the walls of the city, that is, eighty-seven feet thick, and of an hundred and sixty furlongs (which are ^b twenty miles of our measure) in length; and over-against every street that crossed the river, he made on each side a brazen gate in the wall, and stairs leading down to the river, from whence the inhabitants used to pass by boat from one part of the city to the other.

5. It was necessary, however, that while this work was carrying on, the stream should be diverted some other way; and therefore, to this purpose, he had a vast artificial lake made to the west of Babylon, which, according to the lowest computation, was forty miles square, and an hundred and sixty in compass; and being of a proportionable depth, was able to contain all the water until the work was finished. When this was done, the river was returned to its former channel; but the lake, and the canal which led to it, were still preserved, because they were found of use, not only to prevent the danger of all overflowings of the river, but to keep water likewise all the year round, as in a common reservoir, which might be let out on proper occasions, by sluices, for the improvement and fertilizing of the ground.

These are some of the vast works ^a which the generality of historians ascribe to Nebuchadnezzar, and upon the view and contemplation of which he grew so arrogant and elated, as to think himself equal, if not superior to God: for, ‘Is not this great Babylon, which I have built for the honour of my majesty?’ says he of himself; ¹ and, ‘Who is god but Nebuchadnezzar?’ say his sycophants concerning him. The truth is, if we will credit the account in the book of Judith relating to this prince, he was, in his temper, a professed atheist. ^b The sense of his success in life, and of the wonderful works which he had achieved, both in a civil and military capacity, had so intoxicated his reason, as to make him become fool enough, to say in his heart there was no other god but himself; for this is the avowed purpose of his sending his armies under the general Holofernes, ² ‘That all nations should worship him only, and that all tongues and tribes should call upon him as god.’

Fit therefore it was, that such impious pride should be abased, and that he who set himself above the rank of men, upon a level with God, nay, in an elevation superior to God, should be made sensible of his dependent state, and taught humility and self-annihilation, by being degraded to the condition of a brute. ‘He had said in his heart,’ for of him is that prophecy in Isaiah, ³ ‘I will ascend into heaven, I will exalt my throne above the stars of God;—I will ascend above the heights of the clouds, I will be like the Most High.—But how art thou fallen from heaven, O Lucifer, son of the morning? How art thou cut down to the ground, who didst weaken the nations?—They that see thee shall narrowly look upon thee, and consider thee, saying, Is this the man that made the earth to tremble, that did shake all kingdoms, that made the world as a wilderness, and destroyed the cities thereof?’ And well they might, when they saw ⁴ ‘him dwelling with the beasts of the field; eating grass like oxen, and wet with the dew of heaven, and his hair grown like eagle’s feathers, and his nails like the claws of birds.’ But then the question is, what the proper sense of these words is? Or, what is the same thing, of what kind this divine infliction upon the king of Babylon was?

Origen, ⁵ who was for resolving every thing that he could not comprehend in Scripture into allegory, was of opinion, that under the name of Nebuchadnezzar, Daniel intended to give us a representation of the fall of Lucifer, being probably led to think so by the above cited passage in the prophet Isaiah. But the account of the punishment which befell this prince is so often inculcated in the same chapter; foretold in the dream explained by the prophet; repeated by the voice from heaven; and all this published in a solemn declaration by the king himself after the recovery of his senses, that there is no manner of grounds to think of any figure or allegory in this piece of history.

Nebuchadnezzar’s real metamorphosis into an ox, both as to his outward and inward form, is a notion too gross for any but the vulgar, who may be taken, perhaps with such fictions of the poets; and what we have no need to recur to, thereby to multiply miracles to no purpose, from any words in the text which will fairly admit of another interpretation.

The metempsychosis of an ox’s soul into Nebuchadnezzar’s body, thereby to communicate the same motions, taste, and inclinations, that are observable in that animal, is a notion unknown to all antiquity; for, according to the doctrine of Pythagoras, such a transmigration was never made until the body was actually dead; besides the manifest incongruity of supposing two souls, a rational and a brutal, animating the same prince, or the prince’s soul departed from him, and become the substitute to a brute.

A fascination, both in the eyes of Nebuchadnezzar’s subjects, and in his own fancy and imagination, which might make them both believe, that he really was changed into an ox, and had the figure of one, is a notion every whit as liable to exception. For, besides that it is difficult to conceive, how a deception of this kind could abide upon a whole nation for the space of seven years, the Scripture takes notice of no evil spirit in this whole transaction, but imputes all to the sole power of God,

^a Berossus, Megasthenes, and Abydenus attribute all these works to Nebuchadnezzar; but Herodotus tells us, that the bridge, the river-banks, and the lake were the work of Nitocris, his daughter-in-law, who might possibly finish what he, at his death, left incomplete, and, upon that account, receive from this historian the honour of the whole.

^b There is nothing in the canonical books of the Old Testament, where Nebuchadnezzar is mentioned, from which it can reasonably be inferred that he was an atheist; and the Nabuchodonosor of the apocryphal book of Judith appears to have been a very different man. In that book Nabuchodonosor is expressly said to have reigned in Nineveh, and to have been the king of the Assyrians; but it no where appears that Nebuchadnezzar ever held his court in Nineveh. By Dr Hales, Nabuchodonosor is supposed, on good ground, to have been the immediate successor of Nimus III. the immediate predecessor of Sarea, or Sardanapalus II. and therefore the last king of Nineveh but one of the Assyrian dynasty. Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon appears to have been an arrogant and vainglorious conqueror, but in no other sense an atheist than many such conquerors have been, even in Christian countries, who, elated by success, forgot in their practice the God of battles, by whom that success was obtained. Far from being a speculative atheist, or from demanding divine worship to himself, the Babylonian conqueror appears to have been a zealous polytheist and idolater, acknowledging, however, as most polytheists of any reflection did, that there was one God superior to all the others, and ready occasionally—perhaps always—to attribute this superiority to the God of Israel. It is probable likewise that he believed in the Metempsychosis, a doctrine which appears, from the Asiatic Researches, and other ancient records, to have prevailed over all the east from a period long anterior to the reign of Nebuchadnezzar; and, if such was the case, there was a peculiar propriety in punishing his pride by the disease called lycanthropy. He persisted, in opposition to his own repeated conviction, to worship the gods, in whom he appears at times to have had no confidence whatever, giving, it may be supposed, some degree of credit to this gloomy doctrine; and therefore, with wisdom truly divine, he was visited with a species of madness, which, though it has been occasionally witnessed in every age and in different countries, appears to have been most frequent where the doctrine of the metempsychosis or the transmigration of souls prevailed. See Warburton’s Div. Leg. on this subject, and likewise Mosheim’s edition of Cudworth’s Intellectual System, with the authors referred to by the learned editor of that profound work.

who can humble the proud, and chastise the wicked, as he pleases.

The most general therefore, and most probable opinion is,—that Nebuchadnezzar, by the judgment of God, was punished with madness, which so disordered his imagination, that he fancied himself a beast, and was prompted to act like one.

There is a distemper, not a very common one indeed, but what has befallen several, which naturalists and physicians call lycanthropy,^a when by the power of a depraved imagination, and a distempered brain, a man really thinks that he is a wolf, an ox, a dog, or the like, and accordingly in his inclinations, motions, and behaviour, cannot forbear imitating the particular creature which he fancies himself to be. In this manner Nebuchadnezzar, imagining that he was become an ox, walked upon all four, fed upon grass, went naked, lowed with his voice, and butted, as he thought, with his horns; and, in short, did all the actions, as far as he was able, that a real ox is known to do. ¹ Hereupon his subjects, perceiving this change in him, took him and bound him, as madmen are wont to be treated, but, at last, he escaping out of their hands, fled to the fields, where he herded with the cattle, exposed to the dew of heaven, and the inclemencies of the weather; where his neglected body became horrid and dreadful to behold; where his hair, and his nails, in process of time, grew in the hideous manner that the prophet had described them; and, where his heart, that is, his apprehension, appetite, and inclinations, by the continuance of his distemper, became quite brutal, and of the same cast with the beasts that graze.

The masters of the medics, who have treated of this kind of madness, have made it their observation, that the persons infected with it are generally so excessively strong, that no bands or chains can hold them. They can live a long while without eating or drinking, and endure wet and cold without any great inconvenience to themselves; and therefore Nebuchadnezzar, though bred up in the pleasures and delicacies of the court, might, by the strength of his distemper, be enabled to do what otherwise he would not; to live in the fields for seven years together, naked, and exposed to the injuries of the weather, without any thing to nourish him, except either the grass on the ground, or the wild fruits on the hedges; but then, whether he retained the use of his reason whilst he continued in this disastrous state, is a question that is not so easily determined.

The Scripture, indeed, at first sight, seems to intimate, that he had no sense of his misery, nor made any reflection upon himself, or upon what he was doing, until God was pleased to remove his afflicting hand: for these are his own words.² ‘At the end of my days, I Nebuchadnezzar lift up mine eyes unto heaven, and my understanding returned unto me;’ which seem to imply, that all along before this, his reason was in a kind of deli-quium, and without any consciousness of what he was about. But then it may be asked, wherein would his punishment and humiliation consist, if the man was insensible; if he knew nothing of the matter; nay, if he took pleasure, as most madmen do, in the disorder of the imagination?

To be miserable, and not to know it, by some may be thought the very height of misery; but the person in Horace, who frequented the empty theatre every day, and delighted himself with the reveries of his own fancy, with plays and shows which nobody saw but himself, was not so well pleased with his friends when they had recovered him to his senses:—‘Friends, you have of a surety killed, not cured me, since my delight is thus vanished, and the agreeable aberration of my mind expelled by medicine.’³

To answer the ends of Providence, therefore, in afflicting in this manner this haughty and assuming prince, which was to mortify his pride, and bring him to a state of humiliation and acknowledgment of God’s superior hand, we may suppose, that at certain intervals at least, he had a sense and perception of his misery; that he saw the condition to which he was degraded; but being carried away with his brutal appetite, found it not in his power to extricate himself. St Paul, in his description of a man given up to his lusts, whereof Nebuchadnezzar, in his present condition, is no improper emblem, has these remarkable words. ⁴ ‘I know that in me,’ that is, in my flesh, ‘dwelleth no good thing; for to will is present with me, but how to perform that which is good, I find not; for the good that I would, I do not, but the evil that I would not, that I do. For though I delight in the law of God after the inner man, yet I see another law in my members, warring against the law in my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin, that is in my members. O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death!’ And, in like manner, if we suppose this king of Babylon, in such a perpetual struggle and conflict with himself; seeing his error but not able to avoid it; sensible of his disgrace, but not capable to redress it; committing the things which his soul abhorred; and detesting himself for what he found himself necessitated to do, till God should think fit to restore his understanding, by allaying the ferment of his blood and humours, correcting his appetite, and ranging his ideas into their proper order: if we suppose this, I say, we have before us the image of a creature completely miserable; and reasons for his humiliation, during his affliction, innumerable; ^b a fountain

^b What Nebuchadnezzar says of himself, with regard to this duty, is very remarkable,—‘I blessed the Most High, and praised and honoured him, that liveth for ever, whose dominion is an everlasting dominion, and his kingdom is from generation to generation. All the inhabitants of the earth are reputed as nothing, for he doth according to his will, in the armies of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth; and none can stay his hand or say unto him, What dost thou? I therefore now praise, and extol, and honour the king of heaven, all whose works are truth, and his ways judgment, and those that walk in pride, he is able to abase.’ (Dan. iv. 34, &c.) Which is enough, one would imagine, to make us think charitably of the conversion and final end of this prince: and with St Austin, to conclude, that whatever happened to him, by way of punishment, was designed by providence for his soul’s health. ‘By the hidden providence and mercy of God such a plan was adopted for the king’s salvation.’—Epist. 3.

^a Such was the distemper of Lycaon king of Arcadia, which Ovid has described, as if he had been turned into a wolf. In terror he flies to the silent wilderness, and there endeavouring to talk articulately, he can only howl—his mouth spontaneously acquires a rabid longing for food, and his wonted fury is directed against the cattle, his delight is now in bloodshed—his garments are changed to hair, his arms to legs—he becomes a wolf, though still in shape retaining the marks of his former nature.—*Ovid. to supply his gratitude upon the removal of it, inexhaustible; and, from his example, this lecture of admonition to all succeeding generations: ¹ 'Thus saith the Lord, let not the wise man glory in his wisdom; neither let the mighty man glory in his might. Let not the rich man glory in his riches; but let him that glorieth, glory in this,—that he understandeth, and knoweth me, that I am the Lord, who exerciseth loving-kindness, judgment, and righteousness in the earth; for in these things I delight, saith the Lord.'

SECT. II.

CHAP. I.—From the Death of Cyrus to that of Nehemiah.

THE HISTORY.

CYRUS died, when he was seventy years old, after he had reigned, from his first being made commander of the Persian and Median armies, thirty years; from his taking of Babylon, nine years; and from his becoming sole monarch of the east, seven years; and was succeeded by his son Cambyses, whom the Scripture calls Ahasuerus. As soon as he was well settled in the throne, the Samaritans, instead of applying themselves secretly to the ministers and officers of his court, presented their petition ² to him openly, desiring that the rebuilding of Jerusalem might be stopped; and though they did not prevail with him to revoke his father's decree, yet by the several discouragements which he put upon it, he, in a great measure, defeated its main design: so that the work went on very heavily in his reign. But his reign was not long: it was but seven years and five months, before he came to an untimely end, and was succeeded, for a short time, by the Magian, ^a who pretended to

^a The word Magian or Mige-gush, in the old Persian language, signifies a person that had his ears cut off, and was a name of contempt given to the whole sect, upon account of a certain impostor among them, who had the misfortune to lose his ears, and yet had the confidence to usurp the crown of Cyrus; but before this incident they went under another name, and were held in great reputation among the Persians. They were indeed their chief professors of philosophy, and in matters of religion, made these the great articles of their faith:—"That there were two principles or gods, the one the cause of all the good, and the other the cause of all the evil in the world; but in this they were divided; that some of them held both these principles to have been from all eternity, whereas others maintained, that the good principle only was eternal, and the evil one created, in the like manner as we believe, that the devil is a creature, who is fallen from his original purity and perfection. These two principles, they believed, were in continual opposition to each other, which was to continue till the end of the world; but then the good principle having overcome the evil, they should each of them have a distinct world to himself; the good reigning over all good beings and the evil over all the wicked. They imagined farther, that darkness was the truest symbol of the evil, as light was of the good god; and therefore they always worshipped him before fire, as being the cause of light, and before the sun more especially, because they accounted it the most perfect light. They paid divine honours, in short, to light, to the sun, to the fire in their temples, and to fire in their houses; but they always hated darkness, because they thought it a representation of the evil god, whom they ever had in the utmost detestation." Such were the Magi among the ancient Persians, and such are the Guebres, or worshippers of fire, among the present Persians and Indians.—Prideaux's Connection, and Calme't's Dic. under the word be his brother Smerdis, ^b and whom the history of Ezra ^c calls Artaxerxes. To him the Samaritans, in like manner, addressed themselves, and in a memorial, represented, "That ^d the Jews were rebuilding their city and temple at Jerusalem, which might be a matter of pernicious consequence to his empire; that these Jews had always been a rebellious people, as he would find, if he consulted the records of his ancestors; that therefore there was reason to suspect, that in case they were permitted to go on, when once they had finished the work, they would withdraw their obedience, or refuse to pay tribute; ^e and that by their example, very probably, all

^b The manner in which this Magian came to usurp the Persian throne is thus related by most historians:—Cambyses had a brother, the only son of Cyrus besides himself, and born of the same mother. His name, according to Xenophon, was Tanaxares, but Herodotus calls him Smerdis, and Justin, Mergis. He accompanied him in his wars for some time; but upon a pique of jealousy, the king sent him back into Persia, and there caused him to be murdered privately. The king, when he went upon the Egyptian expedition, had left the supreme government of his affairs in the hands of Patizithes, one of the chief of the Magians (for the king was addicted to that sect of religion), who had a brother that did very much resemble Smerdis, the son of Cyrus, and was, for that reason perhaps, called by the same name. Patizithes, hearing of the young prince's death, and supposing that this, and some other extravagances of Cambyses, had made him odious to his subjects, placed this brother of his on the throne, pretending that he was the true Smerdis, the son of Cyrus, and so sent heralds through the empire to proclaim him king. It was the custom of the eastern princes in those days to live retired in their palaces, and there transact all their affairs by the intercourse of their eunuchs, without admitting any else, unless those of the highest confidence, to have access to them. This conduct the pretended Smerdis exactly observed; but Otanes, a Persian nobleman, having a daughter, whose name was Pshedyma, who had been one of Cambyses' wives, and was now kept by Smerdis in the same quality, and being desirous to know whether he was the real son of Cyrus or no, sent her instructions, that the first night she lay with him, she should feel whether he had any ears (because Cyrus, for some crime or other, had cut off this Magian's ears), and she acquainted her father that he had none, he immediately took six others of the Persian quality with him, among whom Darius was one, and, entering the palace, slew both the usurper and his brother who had been the contriver of the whole plot.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 522.

^c That Cambyses was the Ahasuerus, as we said before, and the false Smerdis the Artaxerxes who obstructed the work of the temple, is plain from hence,—That they are said in Scripture (Ezra iv. 5, &c.) to be the kings of Persia that reigned between the time of Cyrus and the time of that Darius by whose decree the temple was finished; but as that Darius was Darius the son of Hystaspes, between whom and Cyrus there reigned none in Persia but Cambyses and Smerdis, it must follow from hence, that none but Cambyses and Smerdis could be the Ahasuerus and Artaxerxes who are said in Ezra to have put a stop to this work.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 522.

^d After the return from the captivity, the people in general came to be called Jews, because, though there were many Israelites among them, yet they chiefly consisted of the tribes of Judah and Benjamin; and though the edict of Cyrus gave all permission to return when they pleased, yet the sacred writers take notice only of those who returned in a body.—Patrick's Commentary on Ezra.

^e For this there are three expressions in the text, toll, tribute, and custom. By the first of these Grotius understands that which every head paid to the king, which we call poll-money; by the second, the excise (as we now speak) that was upon commodities and merchandise; and by the last the land-tax. But Witsius, (in his Miscell. part. 2.) is of opinion, that the first word rather signifies that part which every man paid out of his estate, according as it was valued; the second, that which was paid for every head; and the third, that which was paid upon the highways, by every traveller that went about the country with any kind of merchandise.—Patrick's Commentary.

Syria and Palestine would be tempted to revolt; so that, in a short time, his majesty would be excluded from having any benefit from his territories on that side of the river Euphrates.*

Upon consulting the records which the Samaritans referred the king to, it plainly appeared, that the Jews had defended themselves with great valour, and had been subdued by Nebuchadnezzar, not without much difficulty; whereupon he issued out an edict, wherein he prohibited the Jews to proceed any farther in their building, and ordered his officers in Samaria to put it in execution. They immediately went up to Jerusalem with an armed force, and having pursued the king's orders with the utmost rigour, put a full stop to any farther proceeding in the work, until the second year of ^a Darius Hystaspes.

Darius, upon the death of the pretended Smerdis, was, ^b by a stratagem, chosen king of Persia; and though the edict which prohibited the building of the temple, expired with the usurper, yet had the prophets Zechariah ^c and Haggai much ado to prevail with the

^a There are some who take the Darius here mentioned, not to be Darius the Second, who was the son of Hystaspes, but the Darius who is commonly called Nothus; but then they are pressed with this difficulty, which may well be called insurmountable. For, from the first year of Cyrus, who gave orders for the building of the temple, to the sixth year of Darius Nothus, in which they supposed that it was finished, there were, at least, an hundred and thirteen years: according to some, an hundred and seventeen; and according to others, an hundred and forty-two. But now, if all this time, Zerubbabel was in the government of Judea, and Joshua in the high-priesthood, so long an authority in church or state was never heard of in any age before. Nor must it be forgotten, what the prophet Haggai, (chap. ii. 3,) supposes, namely, That some then alive remembered the glory of the first temple, and compared it with the glory of the second; which upon the supposition that this was in the sixth year of Darius Nothus, will make them at least an hundred and fourscore years old, a thing almost incredible. And therefore the most probable opinion is, that the Darius here meant, was Darius Hystaspes, whose second year was the eighteenth after the first of Cyrus, as Huetius reckons.—Patrick's Commentary.

^b The seven princes, who had slain the usurper Smerdis, and his brother, consulting together about the settling of the government, came at length to this resolution, that the monarchy should continue in the same manner that it had been established by Cyrus, and that, to determine which of them should ascend the throne, they should all meet at a certain place the next morning, against the rising of the sun, and that he whose horse first neighed, should be appointed king. For as the sun was the great deity of all the Persians, they seemed by this method, to refer their election to it; but Darius's groom, being informed of this, tied a mare on the night before the election to the place where the next morning they were to meet, and brought his master's horse to cover her. As soon, therefore, as the princes met together at the time appointed, Darius's horse remembered the place, ran immediately thither, neighing and prancing all along; whereupon the rest dismounting, saluted him as their king, and accordingly placed him on the throne.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 521.

^c Zechariah was the son of Barachiah, and grandson of Iddo; but the time and place of his birth are unknown. Some will have him to be born at Babylon, during the captivity; but others think that he was born at Jerusalem, before the tribes of Judah and Benjamin were carried away. It is certain, however, that he returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel, and very probable that he began to prophesy in the second year of Darius, the son of Hystaspes. The number, excellency, and preciseness of his prophecies made him be styled "the sun among the lesser prophets," and as he began his predictions about two months after Haggai, with him he encouraged the Jews to go on in the rebuilding of their temple, and gave them assurance of the divine protection. But these prophecies were inconsiderable, in comparison of those which foretold the coming of the Messiah in the plainest terms; the cruel war which Antiochus Epiphanes waged with the Jews, and God's severe judgments against this tyrant; the Jewish war with the Romans, and the siege of Babylon by Darius; the dissolution of the old covenant, and the substitution of a new one under Christ; the glorious state of the Christian church, and the conversion of the Gentiles; the persecutions which the Christians should endure, and the severe punishment of their persecutors, and other such like events, contained in the ninth and following chapters of his prophecies. Some critics, however, are of opinion, that the style of this prophet is a little interrupted, and without connexion, and that the sixth, sixth, and sixth chapters, which go under his name, were originally written by Jeremiah; because in Matthew, (ch. xxvii. 9, 10,) under the name of Jeremiah, we find Zechariah xi. 12, quoted; and as the aforesaid chapters make but one continued discourse, they conclude from thence, that all three belonged to Jeremiah. But it is much more natural to suppose, that the name of Jeremiah, by some unlucky mistake, has slipped into the text of St Matthew, instead of that of Zechariah. Contemporary with him was the prophet Haggai, who, in all probability, was born at Babylon, and returned with Zerubbabel to Jerusalem. They both, with united zeal, encouraged the people to go on with the work of the temple, which, by the envy of the Samaritans, who were their enemies, and the ill offices of some at the court of Cyrus and Cambyses, whom they influenced, was discontinued for some time: but upon the accession of Darius to the throne, Haggai, in particular, by reproaching the people with their indolence and insensibility, by telling them that they were careful enough to lodge themselves very commodiously, while the house of the Lord lay buried in its own ruins, and by putting them in mind, that the calamities of drought and famine, wherewith God had afflicted them since their return, were owing to their neglect in repairing the temple, prevailed with them to set about the work in good earnest; so that, by virtue of these reproofs, as well as some encouragements which God occasionally authorized him to give them, they brought the whole to a conclusion in a short time.—Calmel's Dictionary under the words, and Universal History, b. ii. c. 1.

^d The plea which Josephus makes Zerubbabel the governor, and Joshua the high priest, urge upon this occasion, is to this effect—"That they were the servants of the great God, to whose honour this temple was built, and to his service dedicated by the greatest, the happiest, and the wisest prince that ever sat on that throne; that it stood for many ages, till, by reason of the wickedness of their forefathers, the city, by God's permission, was taken by Nebuchadnezzar, the king of Chaldea, the temple pillaged, and laid in ashes, and the people carried away captives into Babylon; that when Cyrus came to be possessed of the throne of Persia and Babylon, he ordered, by his royal proclamation, the rebuilding of the temple, and the restoring of all the sacred vessels that had been taken away by Nebuchadnezzar, which accordingly were transported to Jerusalem, and laid up again in the temple; that by the command of the same king, Abassar was sent to see the work expedited, and accordingly was present at the laying of the foundation; but that, ever since that time, by one artifice or other, their enemies had found means to obstruct and retard it: and that, for the truth of these allegations, they desired that Darius might be wrote to, that, by consulting public records, it might be known, whether or no these facts were according to this their representation."—Jewish Hist. b. xi. c. 4.

decree from Cyrus, which empowered and authorized them in what they did: whereupon the governor wrote to court, acquainting the king with the true state of the case, and desiring that search might be made into the public records, whether the Jews really had any such decree from Cyrus, and upon the whole, that he would be pleased to signify his will, what he would have him to do in this affair.

Darius,¹ who, the better to fortify his title to the crown, had married two of the daughters of Cyrus, thought himself concerned to do every thing that might tend to the honour of that great prince; and therefore confirmed the decree which he had granted to the Jews, with a fresh one of his own, wherein he gave them an assignment upon his revenues in several provinces for whatever money they wanted, to enable them to go on with the work, and to provide them sacrifices for the service of the temple, that the priests, in their daily offices, might^a put up their prayers for the prosperity of the king and the royal family: and wherein he ordered, that the man should be hanged, and his house pulled down^b for timber to make him a gallows, who ever should pretend to put any let or obstruction to this his injunction.

Upon the publication of this decree, and the great care that was taken to have it fully put in execution, the work of the temple went on so very successfully, that, in the sixth year of Darius, according to the Jewish account, and on the third day of the twelfth month, (which is called Adar, and answers in part to our February and March,) the whole of it was finished, and its dedication celebrated by the priests and Levites, and all the congregation of Israel, with great joy and solemnity. By

^a Though the Jews were not allowed to desire the heathen to pray to their deities for their prosperity, because they were forbidden to acknowledge any other God but one: yet the heathen, if they thought fit, might worship their God; nor did the Jews deny them that privilege, or refuse the offerings which they brought for that purpose, until in the time of their wars with the Romans, the faction of the zealots grew to be predominant: for then, as Josephus tells us, (b. ii. c. 7.) "one Eleazar, the son of Ananias the high priest, a desperate daring young man, and a military officer then in command, pressed some of his friends among the priests to receive no offering or sacrifice but from the Jews only; by which means it came to pass, that the very offerings of Caesar, which were used constantly to be made for the welfare of the Roman people, came to be rejected; and this proved the very ground and foundation of the war with that nation. The high priest, however, and the men of the best quality, declared themselves extremely dissatisfied with the novelty of this prohibition, and with great importunities, desired the continuance of so pious a custom, as offering up prayers for princes and governors." But all is in vain; though this place in Ezra, (chap. vi. 10.) one would think, sets the duty in a clear light.—Le Clerc's Commentary on Ezra.

^b The most obvious sense of the words in the text, (chap. vi. 11.) seems to be this; but Lud. de Dieu, observes, that, in the words which we there render 'being set up,' there is no proper construction; and therefore he would rather have them translated, according to the Septuagint, 'And standing, let him be beat upon it,' that is, 'whipped,' as we say, 'at a post,' for that was a punishment among the Persians and other nations. But if a greater punishment than this should here be intended, then he makes the first words refer to the timber, and the latter to the man, in this manner: 'and from above, let it fall upon him,' that is, the stake being lifted up, shall be struck into his body, and come out at his fundament, which was a cruel punishment among the Eastern people, and continues still in use to this day.—Patrick's Commentary.

the next month, which was the month Nisan, the first in the Jewish year, the temple was made fit for every part of divine service; and, therefore, on the fourteenth day of that month, the passover was observed in it, according to the law of God, and, by all the Jews that had returned from the captivity, solemnized with great joy and gladness of heart, 'because the Lord had made them joyful,' (as it is expressed in the book of Ezra.) 'and turned the heart of the king of Assyria^c unto them, to strengthen their hands in the house of God, the God of Israel.'

By the decree of Cyrus, which was thus confirmed by that of Darius, the tribute of Samaria had been assigned for the reparation of the temple; but now, that the body of the temple was finished, (though the outworks remained still untouched,) the Samaritans pretended that the end of this assignment was ceased, and thereupon refused to pay the tribute any longer. But the Jews, upon sending Zerubbabel their governor, with two other principal men, to Shushan, or Susa, which was then the residence of the Persian monarch, in order to complain of this unjust detention of the royal bounty, met with a proper redress; and returned with the king's order^d to his officers of Samaria, requiring them to take an effectual care, that, pursuant to his edict, the Samaritans paid their tribute to the temple, and gave the Jews for the future no cause to complain of their refusal herein: which put a full end to all contest about that matter, and was the last good office we find recorded in Scripture, that Darius did the Jews. For, in the six and thirtieth year of his reign^e he died, and was succeeded by Xerxes,

^c Darius is called 'the king of Assyria,' as now reigning over all the kingdoms which were formerly under the power of the Assyrians; and from hence Archbishop Usher infers, that Babylon, (which, in the beginning of his reign, had revolted,) must necessarily have been reduced by Darius before this time, otherwise he thinks he could not have here been styled, 'king of Assyria,' whereof Babylon was then the metropolis.—Patrick's Commentary; and Prideaux's Connection, anno 515.

^d A copy of the king's order, or the letter which he sent back by the Jewish commissioners to the officers and lieutenants of the province, and the senate of Samaria, Josephus has recorded in these words.

"King Darius, to Tangar and Sambaba, masters of our horse at Samaria, and to Shadrack, Bobelon, and the rest of their fellow subjects there, sendeth greeting:

"Whereas I am given to understand by Zerubbabel, Ananias, and Mardocheus, on the part of the Jews, that you stand accused of interrupting and discouraging the rebuilding of the temple, and of refusing to bear your part in the charge of the sacrifices, which, by my order and command, you ought to have done: this is to will and require you, upon sight of this letter, forthwith to supply them, out of my treasury at Samaria, with whatsoever they shall want for the use of their sacrifices and worship, to the end that they may offer up daily prayers and oblations, both for myself and all my people."—Jewish Antiq. b. xi. c. 4.

^e The character which our celebrated connecter of the Old and New Testament has given us of this Darius, is,—That he was a prince of great wisdom, clemency, and justice, and has the honour to be recorded in holy writ, for a favourer of God's people, and a restorer of his temple at Jerusalem, and a promoter of his worship therein. For all this God was pleased to make him his instrument: and, with respect to this, I doubt not, it was, that he blessed him with a numerous issue, a long reign, and great prosperity. For, though he was not so very fortunate in his wars against the Scythians and Greeks, yet every where else he had full success in all his undertakings, and not only restored and fully settled the empire of Cyrus, after it had been much shaken by Cambyses, and the Magian, but also added many large and rich provinces to it, especially those of India, Thrace, Macedon, and the isles of the Ionian sea.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 486.

Xerxes, ¹ according to Josephus, (for we have but little account of him in the sacred records), confirmed to the Jews all the privileges that his father Darius had granted them, and particularly that which assigned them the tribute of Samaria, for the charge of the sacrifices that were to be offered in the temple of Jerusalem. It is of him that the words of the prophet Daniel are meant: ² ‘Behold, there shall stand up yet three kings in Persia,’ which were Cyrus, Cambyses, and Darius Hystaspes, ‘and the fourth shall be far richer than they all; and, by his strength through his riches, he shall stir up all against the realm of Greece;’ for the story is well known, with what ^b a prodigious armament, both by sea and land, he set out against the Greeks, ^c but with ^a Darius had three sons by his first wife, the daughter of Gobrias, all born before his advancement to the throne, and four others by Atossa, the daughter of Cyrus, who were all born after it. Of the former, Artabasanus was the eldest; of the latter, Xerxes: and, as Darius advanced in years, between these two was the competition for the succession. Artabasanus urged, that, as he was the eldest son, according to the custom and usage of all nations, he ought to be preferred before any that was younger. But Xerxes replied to this, that he was the son of Darius by Atossa, the daughter of Cyrus, who was the first founder of the Persian empire; for which reason he held it just and reasonable, that the crown of Cyrus should rather come to a descendant of Cyrus, than to one that was not; and to this he added, that though Artabasanus was the eldest son of Darius, yet he was not the eldest son of a king; that he was born when he was only a private person, and could therefore claim no more than to be heir of his private fortunes; but that, as to himself, he was the first born after his father was king, and had therefore the best right to succeed him in the kingdom. Whereupon he was nominated to the succession, but not so much for the strength of his plea, as for the influence which his mother Atossa had over the inclinations of her husband.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 486.

^b After he had passed over the Hellespont, his land-army, upon the muster, was found to be one million and seven hundred thousand foot, and fourscore thousand horse, besides his chariots and camels, for which, allowing twenty thousand more, the whole will amount to one million and eight hundred thousand men. His fleet consisted of twelve hundred and twenty ships of the line of battle, besides galleys, transports, victuallers, and other sorts of vessels that attended, which were three thousand more; and on board of all these were reckoned to be five hundred and seventeen thousand, six hundred and ten men: so that the whole number of forces by sea and land which Xerxes brought with him out of Asia to invade Greece, amounted to two millions three hundred and seventeen thousand six hundred and ten men. After his passing the Hellespont, the nations on the other side that submitted to him added to his land-army three hundred thousand men more, and two hundred and twenty ships to his fleet, on board of which were twenty-four thousand men; and the servants, eunuchs, women, sutlers, and all such other people as followed the camp, were computed to be no less than as many more. So that the whole number of the persons of all sorts that followed Xerxes in this expedition were at least five millions. This is Herodotus's account of that armament: and, considering that he is the most ancient author that has written of this war, was himself alive when it happened, and has treated of it with greater appearance of exactness than any other, there is reason to believe, that his computation is the truest.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 480.

what foul disgrace he returned home from the inglorious expedition, when, falling into contempt with his own subjects, not a long while after, he was murdered by the captain of his guard, and succeeded by his son α Artaxerxes Longimanus, whom the Scripture calls Ahasuerus, and was the same ϵ who had the beautiful Hebrew Esther for his queen.

Upon \mathcal{f} some occasion or other, Ahasuerus appointed a precipitation that he could; but, at his coming thither, finding the bridge of boats which he had left there broken by storms, he, who had passed over that sea but a few months before with such pomp and pride, was forced to repossess in a poor fisher-boat, a piece of history this which Juvenal has not badly represented in these words: ‘But how did he return after his flight from Salamis? he that used to lash the north, west, and east winds with stripes—barbarian that he was! they never endured such treatment in the Æolian prison. But how did he return? forsooth in a single bark, over blood-coloured waves, and the vessel retarded by the closely-huddled dead bodies.’—Sat. 10.

^d This prince, to distinguish him from others of that name, was called Μαγεσχις, or Longimanus, upon the supposed length of his hands, with which it is said that he could have touched his knees, even when he stood upright; but this notwithstanding, it is reported of him, that he was both the handsomest person of the age in which he lived, and a prince likewise of a very mild and generous disposition.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 465.

^e Our learned Usher is of opinion, that Darius Hystaspes was the king Ahasuerus who married Esther, namely, that Atossa was the Vashî, and Artystona the Esther of the Holy Scriptures. But Herodotus positively tells us, that Artystona was the daughter of Cyrus, and therefore could not be Esther; and that Atossa had four sons by Darius, besides daughters, all born to him after he was king; and therefore she could not be that queen Vashî who was divorced from the king her husband in the third year of his reign, (Esther i. 3); nor he that Ahasuerus that divorced her. Joseph Scaliger is likewise of opinion, that Xerxes was the Ahasuerus, and Hamestris his queen the Esther of the Holy Scriptures. But whatever seeming similitude there may be in the names (and this is the whole foundation of his conjecture), it is plain from Herodotus, that Xerxes had a son by Hamestris, who was marriageable in the seventh year of his reign; and therefore it is impossible that he should be Esther's, because Esther was not married to Ahasuerus until the seventh year of his reign, (Esther ii. 16); and, considering that the choice of virgins was made for him in the fourth of his reign, and a whole year employed in their purifications, the soonest that she could have a son by him, must be in the sixth; and therefore we may conclude (with Josephus, the Septuagint, and the Apocryphal additions to the book of Esther), that the Ahasuerus in Scripture was Artaxerxes Longimanus, and Esther an Hebrew virgin, as she is all along represented.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 465.

^f The occasion of this great festival is, very likely, intimated to us in the phrase, ‘When the king Ahasuerus sat on the throne of his kingdom,’ (chap. i. 2,) that is, enjoying peace and tranquillity through his large dominions; for the history of his accession to the throne is this:—Xerxes, his father, was privately murdered by Artabanus, captain of his guard. He coming to him (who was then but the third son), made him believe that Darius, his eldest brother, had done it, to make his way to the throne, and had a design likewise to cut him off, to secure himself in it. This Ahasuerus believing, went immediately to his brother's apartment, and, by the assistance of the wicked Artabanus and his guards, slew him, thinking all the while that he acted but in his own defence. Artabanus's drift was to seize on the throne himself; but for the present, he took Ahasuerus, and placed him thereon, with a design to pull him down as soon as matters were ripe for his own ascent: but when Ahasuerus understood this from Magabyzus, who had married one of his sisters, he took care to counterplot Artabanus, and to cut him and his whole party off before his treason was come to maturity; and for this, and some other successes against his brother Hystaspes, which settled him in a peaceable possession of the whole Persian empire, very probably it was, that a festival season of above an hundred and fourscore days' continuance was appointed, which even to this day, according to some travellers, is no uncommon thing in those parts of the world.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 465; and Patrick's Commentary on Esther, chap. i.

solemn rejoicing in the city of Shushan, ^a which lasted for an hundred and eighty days; and in conclusion thereof, for seven days successively he made a great feast for all the princes and governors of his provinces; as the queen Vashti, ^b in her apartment, did for the ladies of the best distinction. In the last day of this feast, the king, either out of a frolic, or fondness to his queen, sent seven of his chamberlains to conduct her into his presence, that he might show her to the company, for she was extremely beautiful; and ordered, at the same time, that she should come with the crown on her head. ^c

This was an order so contrary to the usage of the Persians, and so little becoming her dignity and high station in life, that rather than be made a public spectacle, she adventured to disobey the king's command;

^a Cyrus, and the rest of the Persian kings, after the conquest of the Medes, whose country lay remote, settled their royal seat at Shushan, that they might not be too far from Babylon, and made it the capital of Persia. It stood upon the river Ulai, and was a place of such renown, that Strabo calls it Πόλις ἀξολογοσάτην, a city most worthy to be praised. The whole country about it was wonderfully fruitful, producing an hundred, and sometimes two hundred fold, as the same author informs us, (b. xv.) Pliny indeed supposes that Darius Hystaspes was the first founder of it, but he only enlarged and beautified it with a most magnificent palace, which Aristotle (in his book de Mundo) calls "a wonderful royal palace, shining with gold, amber, and ivory." Nor is it altogether foreign to this purpose, what our learned Lightfoot (de Templo, chap. 3,) tells us, namely, that the outward gate of the eastern wall of the temple, was called "the gate of Shushan," and had the figure of that city carved on it, in acknowledgment of the decree which this Darius granted in that place, in order to permit and encourage the Jews to rebuild their temple at Jerusalem.—Patrick's Commentary on Esther, chap. i., and Cabnet's Dictionary, under the word Shushan.

^b It has been a great inquiry among the learned, who this Vashti was. Those who make the Ahasuerus in Scripture to be Darius the son of Hystaspes, suppose that she was Atossa the daughter of Cyrus, who was first married to Cambyzes, her own brother, then to the Magian, who would have passed for Smerdis, and last of all to Darius. Others suppose, that she was Ahasuerus's own sister, because the Persians, in those days, made no scruple of these kinds of marriages; though there is much more reason to think, that before her marriage, there had been such a collection of virgins made for the use of the king, as was before Esther's, (this is implied in chap. ii. 19.) and that having the good fortune then of obtaining the preference in the king's esteem, she was created queen; but being, perhaps, a woman of no high descent, her family extraction, for that reason, might be concealed.—Cabnet's Dictionary, under the name.

^c It would appear that the general usage which obtained among the Persians, of keeping the females of the harem strictly secluded, was on particular occasions dispensed with; for Herodotus (b. v. c. 18,) relates a story of seven Persians of rank, who were sent by Megabyzus a Persian general, on a mission to Amyntas, a Grecian province. This province received them hospitably, and gave them a splendid entertainment. When, after the entertainment, they began to drink, one of the Persians thus addressed Amyntas: "Prince of Macedonia, it is a custom with us Persians, whenever we have a public entertainment, to introduce our concubines and young wives. Since, therefore, you have received us kindly, and with the rites of hospitality, imitate the custom we have mentioned." Their request was complied with, and the consequence was, what no doubt queen Vashti had reason to expect in her own case, namely, that when the Persians were warmed with wine, they began to behave indecorously towards the females. However improperly Ahasuerus may have acted in commanding his queen to be brought into the public assembly, he would appear to have done nothing contrary to general usage on such occasions; but we cannot help admiring the high sense of honour, if not virtue and modesty, which queen Vashti exhibited, in refusing to expose herself to the indecent treatment and inflamed passions of a group of drunken Bacchanalians.—Ed.

which ^d incensed him to such a degree, that, ^e advising with his counsellors in what manner he was to punish her for this public affront, he came to this resolution, (which was afterwards passed into an irreversible decree,) that, for fear that Vashti's ill example should encourage other women to contemn and disobey their husbands, she should be deposed from her royal dignity, and an order be issued out, for the making a collection of the fairest virgins, in every province through the whole empire, that, out of them, one might be chosen whom the king should like best to be queen in the room of the divorced Vashti.

At this time there lived at Shushan a certain Jew of the tribe of Benjamin, named Mordecai, a descendant of those who had been carried captive to Babylon with Jehoiachim king of Judah, and, by his attendance at ¹ the king's gate, seems to have been one of ^f the porters of the royal palace. He, having no children of his own, bred up Hadassah, ^g his uncle's daughter, who, being a very beautiful young woman, among other virgins, was made choice of upon this occasion. As soon as she ^h was carried to court, she was committed to the

^d The expression in the text is, 'that the king was very wroth, and his anger burned in him,' (Esther i. 12.) It was more immoderate, because his blood was heated with wine, which made his passion too strong for his reason; otherwise he would not have thought it decent for the queen, nor safe for himself, to have her beauty, which was very great, exposed in this unusual manner; especially if there be any thing in what the Jewish Targum seems to suggest, namely, that he commanded her to be brought quite naked, that her comely proportion might be seen as well as her face.—Patrick's Commentary on Esther, ch. i.

^e The words in our translation are, 'the wise men who knew the times,' (chap. i. 13.) and from hence some have observed, that as the Persian kings did nothing without their magi, who were great pretenders to astrology, men of this sort were called to know whether it was a proper time to set about the thing which the king might then have in his mind. For such was the superstition of the eastern people, that, as the satirist remarks, "whatever came from the mouth of the astrologer, they supposed it to issue from the fountain of Ammon." (Jav. Sat. 6.) The explication, however, which Vitringa gives us of the original words, Judehe habitim, is far from being improper, namely, that they were men well versed in ancient histories, and in the laws and customs of their country; and were therefore able to give the king counsel in all extraordinary and perplexed cases, as this certainly was.—Patrick's and Le Clerc's Commentaries on Esther i.

^f But perhaps he might have been an officer of a higher rank, because it was an order instituted by Cyrus, as Xenophon, in his Cyropæd. (b. viii.) informs us, that all persons whatever, who had any employment at court, should attend at the palace gate, where there was, doubtless, a proper waiting room for their reception, that they might be in readiness, whenever they were wanted or called for; and that this custom was afterwards continued, we may learn from Herodotus, (b. iii. c. 120.)—Le Clerc's Commentaries on Esther, ch. ii.

^g This woman was born in Babylon, and therefore, in analogy to that language, they gave her the name of Hadassah, which, in Chaldee, signifies a myrtle; but her Persian name was Esther, which some, a little incongruously, derive from αστήρ, a star, and others from satar, which signifies hidden, because she was concealed in Mordecai's house; or rather, because her nation was concealed, and she not known, until Mordecai's merit and services to the crown came to be rewarded.—Patrick's Comment.

^h The harems in the east were guarded with extreme vigilance. Chardin (Trav. p. 332.) informs us, that it is a crime for any person whatever to be inquiring what passes within those walls; that it is very difficult to be informed of the transactions in those habitations; and that a man may walk a hundred days, one after another, by the house where the women are, and yet know no more what is done therein than at the farther end of Tartary.

care of an eunuch, who was to have the custody of these virgins, and by her sweet and engaging behaviour, made herself so acceptable to him, that he assigned her the best apartment in the house appointed for their habitation, and gave her a preference in other matters before all the rest of the virgins.

It was the custom, at this time, that every virgin thus taken into the palace for the king's use, was to go through ^a a course of purification, by sweet oils and perfumes, for a whole year; which, when Hadassah had done, and so prepared herself for the king's bed, the king was so highly delighted with her, that intending to make her ^b more than a concubine, he continued her in his own palace, and in a short time set the royal diadem upon her head, and made her queen in the room of Vashti. The nuptials were celebrated with great magnificence. A splendid entertainment was made, which, in honour to the new queen, was called 'Esther's feast,' for that was the Persian name which had lately been given her, and the king, upon this joyful occasion, not only gave ^c rich presents to the queen, and largesses to the guests, but granted pardons likewise to his subjects, and a relaxation of tribute for some time to all the provinces of his dominions.

At Esther's first going to court, Mordecai had given her a strict caution, not to discover that she was a Jewess, lest the king should despise her for being a captive, which she carefully observed; and he for the same reason concealed his relation to her, contenting himself with the little employment he had at court, until a more favourable opportunity should present itself. In the mean time, he had the good fortune to discover a conspiracy, which ^d two of the king's chamberlains were forming against his life. This he communicated to the queen, and the queen acquainted the king with it in Mordecai's name, so that the conspirators were seized, convicted, and executed: but though the whole affair was recorded in the Persian annals, yet Mordecai, for the present, was no more thought on, until his merit and great services came to be remembered upon this occasion.

Haman, an Amalekite, of the posterity of Agag, king of Amalek, in the time of Saul, was become the king's chief favourite, and all the servants at court were ordered to show him great respect and reverence; which every one readily did, except Mordecai, who, upon his passing to and fro, took no manner of notice of him. ^e This so exasperated the proud Amalekite, that being informed that Mordecai was a Jew, he was resolved, in revenge of the affront, not to destroy him only, but his whole nation with him: but because there might be some danger in so bold an undertaking, he called together his diviners, to find out what day would be most lucky for putting his design in execution.

The way of divination then in use among the eastern people, was by casting lots, and therefore, having tried in this manner, first each month, and then each day in every month, they came at last to a determination, that the ^f thirteenth day of the twelfth month, which is called

^d These were two great men who perhaps kept the door of the king's bedchamber, and being either incensed at the divorce of Vashti, whose creatures they were, or at the advancement of Esther, who, in all probability, would raise her kinsman Mordecai to a superiority over them, took disgust thereat, and so resolved to revenge themselves on the king for it.—Prideaux's Connection, and Patrick's Commentary.

^e Josephus tells us, that Haman taking notice of this singularity in Mordecai, asked him, what countryman he was? And finding him to be a Jew, broke out into a violent exclamation at the insolence of such a scoundrel, that when all the natives of the freeborn Persians made no difficulty in doing him that honour, this slave of a Jew should presume to affront him; and in this rage he took up a desperate resolution, not only to be revenged of Mordecai, but to destroy the whole race of Jews likewise: well remembering, that his ancestors, the Amalekites, had been formerly beaten out of their land, and utterly exterminated by the Jews.—Jewish Antiq. b. xi. c. 6. [That a man of Mordecai's character should neglect or obstinately refuse to give to any person in authority the usual marks of civil respect, cannot be supposed; and therefore we must consider that the homage which Haman received from the venial crowd that hung about the palace, was something more than this, probably that prostration of body which the Persians were accustomed to give as the profoundest act of submission, and which was nothing else than a species of worship—an act of homage which even the ancient Greeks refused to render, and which it would have been the greatest impiety in Mordecai, to render to any mortal man, however exalted his character and situation. Into his religious scruples, the ambitious favourite did not, nor could not enter, and determined at all hazards to rid himself of one who was likely to prove an obstacle in his way to universal power, he had formed the purpose of taking the life of the obnoxious Jew.]—Jamieson's Eastern Manners, pp. 346, 347.—Ed.

^f It was in the first month in the year, when Haman began to cast lots, and the time for the execution of the Jews was, by these lots, delayed until the last month in the year; which plainly shows, 'That though the lot be cast into the lap, yet the whole disposing thereof is from the Lord,' (Prov. xvi. 33.) For hereby almost a whole year intervened between the design and its execution, which gave time for Mordecai to acquaint queen Esther with it, and for her to intercede with the king for revoking or suspending the decree, and thereby disappointing the conspiracy: for we can hardly think, what Le Clerc suggests, that Haman gave the Jews all this time, that they might make their escape out of the kingdom, and not stay to be slain, which possi-

This sufficiently explains the reason of Mordecai's conduct.—Ed.

^a The reason is assigned in the following verse for their being kept so long in this course, namely, that for six months they might be anointed with the oil of myrrh, which, besides the fragrance of its smell, was good to make the skin soft and smooth, and clean it from all manner of scurf: and for six more with sweet odours, which, in these hot countries, were necessary to take away all ill scents, and, as some think, to make the body more vigorous. But besides this, there might be something of state in making those vassals (for such they were counted) wait, before they were admitted to the honour of the king's bed; and something of precaution too, in keeping them seclude for so long a time, that the king might be satisfied that he was not imposed upon by a child begotten by any other man.—Patrick's Commentary, and Poole's Annotations on Esther ii. 12.

^b According to this account of things, this Persian monarch seems to have had but one wife, at least but one in chief favour and esteem with him, though it is certain he could not fail of having an infinite number of secondary wives or concubines. This was the name of every one that was taken from among the virgins, who had a separate house for themselves, and conducted to the king's bed; where having passed a night, she returned no more to the virgins' apartments, but was, the next morning, received into the house of the concubines, and there treated in the state and part of one of the king's wives; for such they were accounted. No man was permitted to marry them, as long as the king lived; and upon his demise, they generally fell to his successor. Of these Darius Nothus is reckoned to have had no less than 360.—Poole's Annotations.

^c The manner of the Persian king was, to give his queens, at their marriage, such a city to buy them clothes; another for their hair, another for their necklaces; and so on for the rest of their expenses. And as it was customary for him, according to the testimony of Herodotus, upon his accession to the throne, to remit the tribute that was due to him from all the cities; so he might upon this occasion, out of his abundant joy, make a release to the provinces, and forgive them some of the duties and imposts that they were bound to pay him.—Patrick's Commentary.

Adar, would be most fortunate for his design. Whereupon he went to the king, and having insinuated to him, “That there were a certain people dispersed all over his empire, who called themselves Jews, and who, having laws and ordinances of their own, despised all his edicts and injunctions; that their principles, in short, tended to the disturbance of the good order of his government, and the breach of all uniformity; that, upon these accounts, it was not consistent with the rules of policy to allow them any farther toleration; and therefore he proposed they should be destroyed, and extirpated all out of the empire of Persia; and lest the loss of so many subjects should be thought a diminution of the king’s revenue, he proposed to make up the defect out of his own private fortune.” The king was easy enough to be wrought upon by this court-minion; who, having obtained his royal consent, ^a ordered the secretaries of state ^b to form a decree pursuant hereunto, which when it was was signed, he sent ^c by posts to all lieutenants, and governors of provinces, with strict charge to destroy, and cause to be killed, all the Jews, of whatever sex or condition, both young and old, that were any where within their jurisdiction, on the thirteenth of Adar following.

The publication of this horrid decree occasioned an universal grief and lamentation, wherever the Jews inhabited; and in the city of ^d Shushan, which was not well pleased with it, Mordecai in particular having put on sackcloth, and covered his head with ashes, went along the streets, ^e bemoaning his and his countrymen’s to a future peace and security of all our lives after.”—Jewish Antiq. b. 11, c. 6.

^c The first institution of posts is generally ascribed to the Persians; for the kings of Persia, as Diodorus Siculus, (b. xix.) observes, that they might have intelligence of what passed in all the provinces of their vast dominions, placed centinels on eminences, at convenient distances, where towers were built, and these centinels gave notice of public occurrences to one another, with a very loud and shrill voice, by which means news was transmitted from one extremity of the kingdom to the other, with great expedition. But as this could be practised only in the case of general news, which might be communicated to the whole nation, Cyrus, as Xenophon relates, (gropæd. b. viii.) set up couriers, places for post-horses on all high-roads, and offices, where they might deliver their packets to one another. This, says our author, they did night and day; so that no rain or hard weather being to stop them, in the judgment of many, they went faster than cranes could fly. The like is said by Herodotus, b. viii. And he acquaints us farther, that Xerxes, in his famous expedition against Greece, planted posts from the Ægean sea to Shushan, at certain distances, as far as a horse could ride with speed, that thereby he might send notice to his capital city of whatever might happen in his army. The Greeks borrowed the use of posts from the Persians; and, in imitation of them, called them αγγαροι. Among the Romans, Augustus was the person who set up public posts, who at first were running footmen, but were afterwards changed into post-cha riots and horses, for the greater expedition. Adrian improved upon this; and having reduced the posts to great regularity, discharged the people from the obligation they were under before of furnishing horses and chariots. With the empire the use of posts declined. About the year 807, Charlemagne endeavoured to restore them; but his design was not prosecuted by his successors. In France, Louis XI. set up posts at two leagues’ distance through the kingdom. In Germany, count Taxis set them up, and had, for his recompence, in 1616, a grant of the office of postmaster-general to himself and his heirs for ever. Above eight hundred years ago, couriers were set up in the Ottoman empire: and, at this time, there are some among the Chinese; but their appointment is only to carry orders from the king and the governors of provinces, and, in a word, for public affairs and those of the greatest consequence.—Calmet’s Dictionary, under the word.

^d Not only the Jews, but a great many others in Shushan, might be concerned at this horrid decree, either because they were related to them, or engaged with them in worldly concerns, or perhaps out of mere humanity and compassion to so vast a number of innocent people, now appointed as sheep for the slaughter. They might apprehend likewise that, upon the execution of the decree, some sedition or tumult might ensue; that, in so great a slaughter, it was hard to tell who would escape without being killed or plundered, because those who were employed in this work would be more mindful to enrich themselves than to observe their orders.—Poole’s Annotations; and Patrick’s and Le Clerc’s Commentaries.

^e The latter Targum, upon the book of Esther, gives us this account of Mordecai’s behaviour upon this sad occasion, namely, that in the midst of the streets he made his complaint, saying, “What a heavy decree is this which the king and Haman have passed, not against a part of us, but against us all, to root us out of the earth!” Whereupon all the Jews flocked about him, and having caused the book of the law to be brought to the gate of Shushan, he being covered with sackcloth, read therein these words out of Deut. iv. 30, 31, ‘When thou art in tribulation ly might bring an odium upon himself, when it came to be known by whose instigation this massacre was committed.—Patrick’s and Calmet’s Commentaries.

^a In the text it is said, (chap. iii. 10,) ‘And the king took his ring from his hand and gave it unto Haman.’ This he did both as a token of affection and honour. With the Persians, for a king to give a ring to any one was a token and bond of the greatest love and friendship imaginable. (Alex. ab Alex. Genial. Div. b. i. c. 26.) ‘Mirza Sheileca entertained us with a breakfast more elegant than any of the similar meals to which we had been invited. Just before we were rising to depart, the minister, after having talked much on the hopes which he cherished, that the friendship of the two nations would long subsist, pulled a diamond ring from off his own finger, and placed it on the envoy’s, saying, ‘And, that I may not be thought to be insincere in my professions, let me beg of you to accept this as a pledge of my friendship for you; and intreat you to wear it for my sake.’ This gift, unlike the generosity of Persian presents, was really handsome: it was a beautiful stone, perfect in all its parts.’—(Morier’s Journey through Persia, p. 149.) It may be this was given to Haman, to seal with it the letters that were or should be written, giving orders for the destruction of the Jews. Among the Romans in aftertimes, when any one was put into the equestrian order, a ring was given to him, for originally none but knights were allowed to wear them. It was sometimes used in appointing a successor in the kingdom: as when Alexander was dying, he took his ring from off his finger, and gave it to Perdicas, by which it was understood that he was to succeed him.—See Macc. vi. 14, 15.—Ed.

^b The decree itself, according to Josephus, was to this effect:—“The great king Artaxerxes, to the hundred and seven and twenty governors of the provinces, between India and Ethiopia, greeting. Whereas it hath pleased God to give me the command of so many nations, and a dominion over the rest of the world, as large as I myself desire, I being resolved to do nothing that may be tyrannical, or grievous towards my people, and to bear a gentle and easy hand over them, with an eye more especially to the preservation of their peace and liberties, and to settle them in a state of tranquillity and happiness, not to be shaken. All this I have taken into mature deliberation: and being given to understand by my trusty and well beloved friend and counsellor, Haman, a person of a tried faith, prudence, and justice, and whom I esteem above all others, that there is a mixture of a sort of inhuman people among my subjects, that take upon them to govern by their own laws, and to prescribe ways to themselves, in contempt of public order and government; men depraved both in their customs and in their manners, and enemies not only to monarchy, but to the methods of our royal administration. This is therefore to will and require, that upon notice given you by Haman (who is to me as a father) of the persons intended by this my proclamation, you put all the said persons, men, women, and children, to the sword, without any commiseration or favour, in a strict pursuance of my decree. And it is my further command, that you put this in execution upon the thirteenth day of the twelfth month of the present year, to make but one day’s work of the destruction of all mine and your enemies, in order hard fate, even until he came to the palace-gate; which, when the queen understood, and sent to inquire the cause, he returned her a copy of the king's decree, whereby she might plainly perceive what mischief was intended against all the nation, unless, by a timely intercession with the king, she would endeavour ^a to prevent it.

Esther, at first, excused herself from engaging in this affair, because an ordinance was passed, inhibiting any person, whether man or woman, upon pain of death, from approaching the king's presence, without a special order. But when he returned her in answer, 'that the decree extended to the whole Jewish nation, without any exception; that if it came to execution, she must expect to escape no more than the rest; that God very probably raised her to her present greatness, on purpose that she might save and protect his people: but that if she neglected to do this, and their deliverance should come some other way, then should she, and her father's house, by the righteous and just judgment of God, most certainly perish:' which so roused her drooping courage, that she sent him word again, that he and all the Jews in Shushan should ^b fast for her three days, as she herself intended to do, and offer up their humble supplications to God, that he would prosper her in so hazardous an undertaking, and then she would not fail to address the king, though it were at the utmost peril of her life.

The people fasted as she had enjoined them; and on the third day she dressed herself in her royal apparel, and ^c went toward the room where the king was sitting and all these things are come upon thee in the latter days, if thou turn to the Lord thy God, and shalt be obedient to his voice (for the Lord thy God is a merciful God), he will not forsake thee, nor destroy thee, nor forget the covenant of thy fathers, which he swore unto them.' After which he exhorted them to fasting, humiliation, and repentance, according to the example of the Ninevites.—Patrick's Commentary.

^a Ever since the reign of Dejoces king of Media, Herodotus, (b. i.) informs us, that, for the preservation of royal majesty, it was enacted, "That no one should be admitted into the king's presence; but that, if he had any business with him, he should transact it by the intercourse of his ministers." The custom passed from the Medes to the Persians; and therefore we find it in the same historian, (b. iii.) that after the seven Persian princes had killed the Magian who had usurped the throne, they came to this agreement, that whoever should be elected king, should allow the others to have at all times a ready access to his presence (which is an implication that they had it not before), whenever they should desire it, except only when he was accompanying with any of his wives. This, therefore, was the ancient law of the country, and not procured by Haman, as some imagine: though it cannot be denied, but that the reason of the law at first might be, not only the preservation of the majesty and safety of the king's person, but a contrivance likewise of the great officers of state, that they might engross the king to themselves, by allowing admittance to none but whom they should think proper to introduce.—Pool's Annotations; and Le Clerc's Commentaries.

^b This is not to be understood, as if the people were to take no manner of sustenance for three days, because few or none could undergo that, but only, either that they should abstain from all delicacies, and content themselves with coarse fare, as Joseph expounds it, or that they should make no set meals of dinner or supper in their families, but eat and drink no more than would suffice to sustain nature, and support them in prayer to God for a blessing upon her undertaking.—Patrick's and Le Clerc's Commentaries.

^c But first, says the latter Targum, she made a solemn prayer to God, with many tears, as soon as she was dressed, saying, "Thou art the great God, the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, the God of my father Benjamin: as thou didst deliver upon his throne in the inner part of the palace. Upon the first sight of her, he held out his golden sceptre, (a token that he pardoned her presumption and spared her life, and then asked her, what the request was that she had to make to him. At the extension of this favour, she approached nearer, and having touched ^d the end of his sceptre, only desired that he and Haman would come to a banquet which she had prepared for him. Haman, who happened then to be absent, was called to attend the king; and when the king and he were at the banquet, he asked her again concerning her petition, promising that he would grant it her, even were it to extend to half his kingdom: but ^e her request again was no more, than that he and Haman would favour her again, the next day, with their company at the like entertainment, and that then she would not fail to disclose her request.

Haman ^f was not a little proud of the peculiar honour

Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah, out of the fiery furnace, and Daniel from the lion's den, so deliver me now out of the hand of the king, and give me grace and favour in his eyes,' &c.

^d A sceptre was the ensign of the highest and most absolute authority; and therefore some have observed, that when Mordecai was advanced to the greatest dignity next the king, having the royal robes on, and other ensigns of royal dignity, no mention is made of any sceptre, for that was proper and peculiar to the king; and the queen's touching, or, as some say, kissing it, was a token of her subjection, and thankfulness for his favour. But Josephus has mightily improved upon the story; for he tells us, "that as the queen with her two handmaids approached the room where the king was, leaning gently upon one, and the other bearing up her train, her face being covered with such a blush, as expressed a graceful majesty, but at the same time, some doubtful apprehensions upon her approaching of the king, mounted on his throne, and the sparkling glory of his robes, that were all over embroidered with gold, pearl, and precious stones, she was taken all on a sudden with a trembling at so surprising a sight; and upon fancying that the king looked upon her as if he were measy, and out of humour, she fell into the arms of one of her maids in a direct swoon. This accident, says he, by the intervention of God's holy will and providence, put the king into a fright, for fear she might not come to herself again; so that making what haste he could from his throne, he took her up in his arms, and with the kindest words that could be, gave her this comfort:—That no advantage should be made of the law to her prejudice, though she came without calling, because the decree extended only to subjects; whereas he looked upon her as his companion and partner in the empire."—Jewish Ant. b. xi. c. 6.

^e Her intention in desiring thus to entertain the king twice at her banquet, before she made known her petition, was, that thereby she might the more endear herself to him, and dispose him the better to grant her request, for which reason she thought it a piece of no bad policy to invite his first favourite to come along with him. But in the whole matter, the singular providence of God is not a little conspicuous, which so disposed her mind, that the high honour which the king bestowed upon Mordecai the next day, might fall out in the mean time, and so make way for her petition, which would come in very seasonably at the banquet of wine: for as then it was most likely for the king to be in a pleasant humour, so it was most usual for the Persians to enter upon business of state, when they began to drink.—Le Clerc's and Patrick's Commentaries, and Prieleaux's Connection, anno 453.

^f Athenæus mentions it as a peculiar honour, which no Grecian ever had before or after, that Artaxerxes vouchsafed to invite Timagoras the Cretan to dine even at the table where his relations eat, and to send sometimes a part of what was served up at his own; which some Persians looked upon as a diminution of his majesty, and a prostitution of their nation's honour. In the life of Artaxerxes, Plutarch tells us, that none but the king's mother, and his real wife, were permitted to sit at his table; and therefore he mentions it as a condescension in that prince that he sometimes invited his brothers. So that this particular favour was a matter that Haman had some reason to value himself upon.—Le Clerc's Commentary.

which both the king and queen had done him; but upon his return home, seeing Mordecai sitting at the palace gate, and refusing to show him the least obeisance, though ^a he restrained himself at present, yet so moved was he with indignation against him, that when he came home, and related to his family the favours which that day he had received, he could not forbear complaining of the affront and disrespect which Mordecai had put upon him; inasmuch, that his wife, and others that were present, advised him to have a gibbet of ^b fifty cubits high instantly erected, and the very next morning to go to the king, and obtain a grant of him to have that insolent fellow hanged upon it.

This project he liked very well, and therefore caused the gibbet to be set up: but when he came to court in the morning, he found that things had taken quite another turn. The king, that very morning, happened to awake sooner than ordinary, and being not able to compose himself to sleep again, he called for ^c the annals of his reign, and ordered a person that was then in waiting to read them to him. The reader went on, until he came to the passage which made mention of Mordecai's discovery of the treason of the two chamberlain's; and when the king upon inquiry was given to understand, that the man, for so signal a service, had received no reward at all, he called unto Haman (who was waiting for admittance upon a quite different intent), and asked him, What it was he would advise him to do to the man, on whom he designed to confer some marks of his favour?

^a It may seem a little strange, that so proud a man as Haman was, should not be prompted immediately to avenge himself on Mordecai for his contemptuous usage of him, since he had enough about him, no doubt, who, upon the least intimation of his pleasure, would have done it; and since he, who had interest enough with his prince to procure a decree for the destruction of a whole nation, might have easily obtained a pardon for having killed one obscure and infamous member of it. But herein did the wise and powerful providence of God appear, that it disposed Haman's heart, contrary to his own inclination and interest, instead of employing his power against his enemy, to put fetters, as it were, upon his own hands.—Poole's Annotations.

^b That men might at a great distance see him, to the increase of his disgrace (as Haman might think), and that, struck with the greater terror by that spectacle, they might not dare for the future to despise or offend him.—Patrick's Commentary, and Poole's Annotations.

^c In these diaries (which we now call journals) wherein was set down what passed every day, the manner of the Persians was to record the names of those who had done the king any signal service. Accordingly Josephus informs us, "That upon the secretary's reading these journals, he took notice of such a person, who had great honours and possessions given him as a reward for a glorious and remarkable action; and of such another, who made his fortune by the bounties of his prince, for his fidelity; but that, when he came to the particular story of the conspiracy of the two eunuchs against the person of the king, and of the discovery of this treason by Mordecai, the secretary read it over, and was passing forward to the next, when the king stopped him, and asked if that person had any reward given him for his service?" &c., which shows indeed a singular providence of God, that the secretary should read in that very part of the book, wherein the service of Mordecai was recorded. But the latter Targum, to make a thorough miracle of it, tells us, that when the reader opened the book at the place where mention was made of Mordecai, he turned over the leaves, and would have read in another, but that the leaves flew back again to the same place where he opened it at first, so that he was forced to read that story to the king.—Patrick's Commentary, and Jewish Antiq. b. xi. c. 6.

Haman, who never dreamed but that the person he meant of was himself, was resolved to lay it on thick; and therefore he gave advice, ^d that the royal robe should be brought, which the king, on solemn occasions, was wont to wear; the horse, which was kept for his own riding, ^e and the crown, which was used to be set upon the horse's head, ^f and that, with this robe, the person whom the king thought proper to distinguish should be arrayed, and the chief man in the kingdom appointed to lead his horse by the reins, walking before him in the quality of an officer, and proclaiming, 'Thus shall it be done to the man whom the king delights to honour.' 'Take then the horse and the robe,' says the king, 'and do all that thou hast mentioned to Mordecai the Jew, who has not been yet rewarded for the discovery of the treason of the two eunuchs that intended to have taken away my life.'

Nothing certainly could cut a proud man more to the ^d To form a notion of that height of pride and arrogance to which Haman (who thought all the honours he specified were designed for him) was arrived, we may observe, that, for any one to put on the royal robe, without the privacy and consent of the king, was, among the Persians, accounted a capital crime. To which purpose Plutarch, in his life of Artaxerxes, has related this story:—"That one day, when in hunting, the king happened to tear his garment, and Tiribazus was telling him of it, the king asked him what he should do. Why, put on another, says Tiribazus, and give that to me. That I will, says the king, but then I enjoin you not to wear it. Tiribazus, however, who was a good kind of a man enough, but a little weak and silly, adventured to put it on, with all its fine ornaments; and when some of the nobles began to resent it, as a thing not lawful for any subject to do, I allow him, says the king, laughing at the figure he made, to wear the fine trinkets as a woman, and the robe as a madman."—Le Clerc's Commentary.

^e There was a custom, not unlike this, among the Hebrews, as appears from the history of Solomon, (1 Kings i. 33,) for the person that was to be declared successor to the crown, on the day of his inauguration, to be mounted on the king's horse: and to the like custom among the Persians, it is highly probable that the poet Statius, in his description of a young king succeeding to his father's throne, may allude:—"As an Achemenian youth, on receiving the throne and lands of his ancestors, hangs in uncertainty while deliberating to whom he may entrust the various boundaries of his kingdom, he is still afraid to handle the bow and mount his father's steed, and to himself he seems scarce able to bear the load of empire, or as yet to use the badge of majesty."—Thebaid. b. viii.

^f Commentators are not agreed whether this crown was placed upon the king's head or his horse's. Those who refer it to the king, will have it to be what we call a turban, made of fine white and pure linen, which it was death for any one to put on his head, without the king's express order; to which purpose Arrian (Alex. Exped. b. vii.) tells us this story:—"That as Alexander was sailing on the Euphrates, and his turban happened to fall off among some reeds, one of the watermen immediately jumped in and swam to it; but as he could not bring it back in his hand without wetting it, he put it upon his head, and so returned with it. Whereupon most historians that have wrote of Alexander (says he) tell us that he gave him a talent of silver for this expression of his zeal to serve him, but, at the same time, ordered his head to be struck off, for presuming to put on the royal diadem." Other commentators are of opinion, that this keter, which we render crown, being a word of a large signification, will equally denote that ornament which the horse that the king rode wore upon his head. As it must be acknowledged that this application of the thing agrees better with the signification and order of the Hebrew words; with the following verses, wherein no mention is made of the keter, but only of the robe and the horse to which this crown belonged; and with the custom of the Persians, who used to put a certain ornament (in Italian called fiocco) upon the head of that horse whereon the king was mounted.—Le Clerc's and Patrick's Commentaries, and Poole's Annotations.

heart, than to be employed in such an office; but the king's command was positive, so that Haman was forced to do it, how much soever it might go against the grain: and when the irksome ceremony was over, he returned to his house, lamenting the disappointment and great mortification he had met with, in being forced to pay so signal an honour to his most hated enemy. But while he was relating this to his family, and they thereupon expressing some uneasy apprehensions, as if this were a very bad omen, one of the queen's chamberlains came to his house to hasten him to the banquet; and, having seen the gallows which had been set up the night before, he fully informed himself of the intent for which it was prepared.

When the king and Haman were set down to the entertainment, the king asked Esther again, what her request was; renewing his promise, that he would not fail to grant it her, even though it extended to the half of his kingdom. 'But my petition, O king,' says she, 'is only for my own life, and the life of my people, because there is a design laid against us, not to make us bondmen and bond-women (for then I should have been silent), but to slay and destroy us all. If therefore I have found favour in thy sight, O king, let my life and the life of my people be given at my request.' At this the king asking, with some commotion, who it was that durst do any such thing? the Haman then present, she told him, was the contriver of all the plot: whereupon the king rising up from the banquet in a passion, ^a went into the garden adjoining; and Haman, taking this opportunity, ^b fell prostrate on the bed where the queen was sitting, to supplicate his life; but the king, coming in the mean time, and seeing him in this posture, 'What, will he ravish the queen before my eyes!' cried out aloud: whereupon those that were in waiting came and covered his face, ^c as a token of the king's indignation

^a Partly as disdainng the company of so audacious and ungrateful a person; partly to cool and allay his spirit, boiling and struggling with such a variety of passions; and partly to consider within himself the heinousness of Haman's crime, the mischief which himself had like to have done by his own rashness, and what punishment was fit to be inflicted on so vile a miscreant.—Patrick's Commentary, and Poole's Annotations.

^b It was a custom of the Persians, as well as other nations, to sit, or rather to lie upon beds, when they ate or drank; and therefore, when Haman fell down as a suppliant at the feet of Esther, and (as the manner was among the Greeks and Romans, and not improbably among the Persians) embraced her knees, the king might pretend that he was offering violence to the queen's chastity. Not that he believed that this was his intention, but, in his furious passion, he turned every thing to the worst sense, and made use of it to aggravate his crime.—Patrick's Commentary.

^c The majesty of the kings of Persia did not allow malefactors to look at them. As soon as Haman was so considered, his face was covered. Some curious correspondent examples are collected together in Poole's Synopsis, in loc. From Perocke we find the custom still continues. Speaking of the artifice by which an Egyptian bey was taken off, he says, (Travels, vol. ii. p. 179) "A man being brought before him like a malefactor just taken, with his hands behind him as if tied, and a napkin put over his head, as malefactors commonly have, when he came into his presence, suddenly shot him dead."—Harmer, vol. ii. p. 96. This custom may be traced among the Romans in the punishment of a patricide, who, when convicted, was immediately hooded, as unworthy of the common light, (Kennell's Rom. Antiq. part ii. b. 3, c. 20, p. 146.) and in that form of pronouncing sentence on a criminal ascribed by Cicero (Pro Cato Rabirio, c. iv.) to Tarquinius Superbus. "Go, officer, against him: and when the chamberlain, who had been to call him to the banquet, acquainted the king of the gallows which he had prepared for Mordecai, who had saved the king's life, he gave immediate orders, that ^d he should be hanged thereon (which accordingly was done), and his whole estate given to the queen, whereof she appointed Mordecai her steward. At the same time she informed the king of her near relation to Mordecai, so that he took him into his royal favour, advanced him to great power, riches, and dignity in the empire, and made him keeper of his signet, in the same manner as Haman had been before.

But though Haman was thus removed, yet the decree which he had procured remained still in full force; nor could it be repealed, because the laws of the Medes and Persians were such, that nothing written in the king's name, and signed with the royal signet, could be reversed. All therefore that the king could do, upon the queen's second petition, to have the decree cancelled, was to grant the Jews, by another ^e decree, such a power to defend themselves against all that should assault them on the day ^f when the former decree was to

^d Josephus indeed tells us, that he died on the cross: but others have observed, that crucifixion was not a Persian punishment; and Salmasius (in his book de Cruce) shows that it was the manner of the Persians first to cut off the heads of malefactors, and then to hang them on a gibbet. However this be, "I cannot pass over the wonderful harmony of providence," says Josephus, "without a remark upon the almighty power, and the admirable justice and wisdom of God, not only in bringing Haman to his deserved punishment, but entrapping him in the very same snare that he had laid for another, and turning a malicious invention upon the head of the inventor." Neither is there any law more just, than to ensnare the murderer by his own artifice.—Antiq. b. xi. c. 6.

^e Josephus has given us a true copy, as he says, of this decree, or, as he calls it, of the letters which Artaxerxes sent to the magistrates of all the nations that lie between India and Ethiopia, under the command of a hundred and seven and twenty princes:—"Wherein he represents the abuse which favourites are wont to make of their power and credit with their prince, by insulting their inferiors, by flying in the face of those that raised them, and, to gratify their resentments, calumniating the innocent, and putting honest men in danger of their lives: wherein he makes mention of the uncommon favours and honours which he had bestowed upon Haman, the Amalekite, who had, notwithstanding, taken measures to supplant him of his kingdom, to destroy Mordecai, the preserver of his life, together with his dearest wife the queen, and to extirpate the whole nation of Jews, who were good and peaceable subjects, and worshippers of that God to whom he was indebted for the possession and preservation of his empire: wherein he acquaints them, that for these wicked and treasonable practices, having caused him and his whole family to be executed before the gates of Susa, his royal pleasure, by these presents, was that they should not only discharge the Jews from all the pains and penalties to which they are made liable by his letters which Haman had sent them; but that they should likewise aid and assist them in vindicating themselves upon those that spitefully and injuriously oppressed them; and wherein he tells them, that whereas the time appointed for the utter destruction of these people, was to have been on the thirteenth day of the month Adar, his further pleasure was, that the same month and day should be employed in their rescue and deliverance; and that if any person, either by disobedience or neglect, should act in any thing contrary to the terror of this his imperial command, he should be liable to military execution by fire and sword."

^f It might be presumed that some, out of hatred to the Jews might be inclinable to obey Haman's decree: for though he himself was gone, yet it cannot be imagined, that all the friends and creatures that he had made perished with him. He might have

be executed, as might render it in a great measure intellectual.

To this purpose, a fresh edict was drawn up in the third month, signed by the king, and transmitted to the provinces: so that, when the thirteenth day of Adar came, by the means of these different and discordant decrees, a war was commenced between the Jews and their enemies, through the whole Persian empire; but as the rulers of the several provinces, and other officers of the king, well understood what power and credit Esther and Mordecai then had with him, they so favoured the Jews every where, that on that day they slew, in the whole empire, 75,000 persons, and in the city of Shushan, on that day and the next, 800 more; among whom were ^a the ten sons of Haman, whom, by a special order from the king, they hanged perhaps on the same gallows whereon their father had hung before; and in memory of this, their wonderful deliverance, the Jews did then, and have ever since, on the fourteenth and fifteenth days of the month Adar, kept a great festival, which they called ^b the 'feast of lots.' But proceed we now to some other affairs.

a great party every where, and some of them so furiously enraged at his fall, as, even at the hazard of their own lives, would not fail to show their indignation at those who were the occasion of it: and therefore this second decree procured by Mordecai, gave them authority, if any attempt was made upon them, either in great bodies, or small parties, not only to defend themselves and repel them, but to make as great a slaughter of them as they were able, and even to take possession of their goods, as Haman had procured them license (chap. iii. 13.) to seize the goods of the Jews.—Patrick's Commentary.

a It is not unlikely, that many might be enraged at his death, and his sons, in particular, might set themselves at the head of those who were bold enough to attempt the destruction of the Jews in Shushan, being resolved to revenge their father's death, though in so doing they were sure to meet their own. And this seems to suggest the reason why Esther was so solicitous to have their dead bodies (for they were slain already) hung upon the gallows, (chap. ix. 13.) even because they had shown more malice and indignation against the Jews, and on the day when the cruel edict came to take place, had made more desperate attacks upon them than any; though the reason of the state, in this severity, might be to expose the family to the greater infamy, and to deter other counsellors from abusing the king at any time with false representations. For though the Jews suffered none to hang on the tree, as they called the gallows, longer than till the evening of the day whereon they were executed; yet other nations let them hang until they were consumed, as appears from the story of the Gibeonites, (2 Sam. xxi. 9, 10.) or devoured by crows, vultures, or other ravenous creatures: from whence that vulgar saying among the Romans, puscere in cruce corvos, had its rise.—Patrick's Commentary, and Poole's Annotations.

b Pur, in the Persian language, signifies a lot, and the feast of purim or lots, which had its name from Haman's casting lots, in order to divine which day would be most lucky to prefix for the murder of all the Jews in the whole Persian dominions, is, to this very day, celebrated by the Jews, with some peculiar ceremonies, but most of them reducible to these three things, reading, resting, and fasting. Before the reading, which is performed in the synagogue, and begins in the evening, as soon as the stars appear, they make use of three forms of prayer: in the first of these, they praise God for counting them worthy to attend this divine service; in the second, they thank him for the miraculous preservation of their ancestors; and in the third, they bless his holy name, for having continued their lives to the celebration of another festival in commemoration of it. Then they read over the whole history of Haman from the beginning to the end, but not out of any printed book, for that is not lawful, but out of a Hebrew manuscript, written on parchment. There are five places in the text, wherein the reader raises his voice with all his might: when he comes to the place that mentions the names of the ten sons of Haman, he repeats them very quick, to show that they were all destroyed in a moment; and every time that the

In the beginning of the seventh year of Ahasuerus, Ezra, a priest descended from ^c Seraiah the high priest, who was slain by Nebuchadnezzar, when he buried the temple and city of Jerusalem, a man of great learning, and excellently ^d skilled in the knowledge of the Scriptures, who had hitherto continued in Babylon, with others of the captivity that had not yet returned, obtained leave of the king to go to Jerusalem, and to take as many of

name of Haman is pronounced, the children, with great fury, strike against the benches of the synagogues, with the mallets which they bring for that purpose. After that the reading is finished, they return home and have a supper, not of flesh, but of spoumeat: and early next morning they arise and return to the synagogue: where, after they have read that passage in Exodus, which makes mention of the war of Amalek, they begin again to read the book of Esther, with the same ceremonies as before; and so conclude the service of the day, with curses against Haman and his wife Zeresh, with blessings upon Mordecai and Esther, and with praises to God for having preserved his people. Their resting on this day is observed so religiously, that they will not so much as set or sow any thing in their gardens, with full persuasion that it would not come up if they did; and therefore they either play at chess, and such like games, or spend the time in music and dancing, until it be proper to begin their feasting, wherein they indulge themselves to such an immoderate degree, that their feast of purim has, with great justice, been called the Bacchanals of the Jews. They allow themselves to drink wine to excess, nay, even to such a pitch, as not to be able to distinguish between the blessing of Mordecai, and the curse of Haman, as themselves speak; and amidst the other sports and diversions of the day, they used formerly to erect a gibbet, and burn upon it a man made of straw, whom they called Haman; but herein it was thought, that they might have a design to insult Christians, upon the death of our crucified Saviour; and therefore Theodosius the second, (Anno Dom. 408.) forbade them to use this ceremony, under the penalty of forfeiting all their privileges. We have only farther to remark concerning this festival, that it is always kept for two days together, and the reason hereof is this:—the Jews at Shushan had two days allowed them to revenge themselves of their enemies, (Esther ix. 13.) but the rest of the Jews in other nations had but one. This caused, at first, some difference in their time of feasting; for the Jews in all other parts of the kingdom, having done execution on their enemies on the thirteenth day, kept their rejoicing feast on the fourteenth; but the Jews at Shushan, being engaged in this work both on the thirteenth and fourteenth days, kept their festival for their deliverance on the fifteenth. When Mordecai, however, had made a record of this great deliverance, he sent letters to all the Jews throughout the dominions of Ahasuerus, to establish it as a standing ordinance among them, that they should keep both the fourteenth and fifteenth of the month Adar every year, as the days whereon the Jews rested from their enemies: and this is the reason why the festival continues for two days, though the former of them is only kept with great solemnity.—Patrick's Commentary, Howel's History, in the notes, and Cabuel's Dictionary under the word Purim.

c In Ezra vii. 1, Ezra is called the son of Seraiah, but as the death of Seraiah occurred 120 years before this time, our author very properly considers the term as implying here a descendant.—Ed.

d Both the Septuagint, Vulgate, and our translation, render the words sepher mahir, a ready scribe, (Ezra vii. 6.) as if to have a quick hand at writing out the law, were any great perfection, or that any aged man, as Ezra was, should be renowned for it. It was not then for writing, but for explaining the things contained in the Scriptures that Ezra was so famous. For as sepher signifies a book, so sepher denotes one skilled and learned in that book; and as there was no book comparable to the book of the law, therefore sepher became a name of great dignity, and signified one that taught God's law, and instructed the people out of it; in which sense we find the word γραμματισ, or scribes, used in the New Testament. For when our Saviour is said to have taught the people, 'as one having authority, and not as the scribes,' this plainly shows, that these scribes were not transcribers, but teachers and expounders of the laws, though they did not do it with a proper authority.—Patrick's and Le Clerc's Commentaries.

On the first day of the first month, which is called Nisan, and might fall about the middle of our March, he set forward on his journey from Babylon, ^a with an ample commission and authority to restore and settle the state, reform the church of the Jews, and regulate and govern both according to their own laws. When he came to the river Ahava, ^b he there halted, until the rest of his company was come up; and then, having, in a solemn fast, ^c recommended himself, and all that were with him, to the divine protection, on the twelfth day he set forward for Jerusalem, where they all safely arrived on the first day of the fifth month, called Ab, that is, about the middle of our July, having spent four whole months in their journey from Babylon thither.

Upon his arrival, Ezra delivered up to the temple the offerings which had been made to it by the king, his nobles, and the rest of the people of Israel that staid behind, which ^d amounted to a very large sum, and having communicated his commission to the king's lieutenants and governors throughout all Syria and Palestine, he betook himself to the executing of the contents of it.

He had not been long in his government, before he found that many of the people had taken wives of other nations, contrary to the law of God; and that several of the priests and Levites, as well as other chief men of Judah and Benjamin, had transgressed in this particular. And therefore after he had, ^e in mourning and fasting and ^f prayer, deprecated God's wrath for so sad

^a It can hardly be imagined, but that some more than ordinary means were used to obtain so great a favour from the king, as this commission was; and therefore we may suppose that it was granted at the solicitation of Esther, who was become the best beloved of the king's concubines, though not as yet advanced to the dignity of queen: for seeing it was usual for the kings of Persia, on some particular days and occasions, to allow their women to ask what boons they pleased, it is not unlikely, that, by the direction of Mordecai, upon some such time and occasion as this, Esther, though she had not discovered her kindred and nation, might make this the matter of her request.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 459. [It is not improbable that the king, who in the seventh year of his reign, had made Mordecai the Jew his prime minister, and Esther the Jewess his queen, should give to Ezra the Jew, a commission conferring such full powers as we find vested in Ezra, (Ezra vi. vii. viii. 31; Esther ii.; Dan. ix. 1.) Xerxes might hope, that by thus patronising the Jews, he should obtain some favour after his unsuccessful campaigns from the God of heaven, whom the Jews worshipped, and to whom Cyrus attributed all his victories. This much seems to be intimated by the words of the edict, (Ezra vii. 23.) The commission of Ezra was given in the seventh year of the king, after the retreat from Greece. It is no objection to our hypothesis, that Ezra began his journey on the first day of the first month, and arrived at Jerusalem on the first of the fifth month, in the seventh year of Artaxerxes, while Esther is said to have been declared queen in the tenth month of this year; for the book of Esther computes the months from harvest, or Tishri, while Ezra reckons from spring or Nisan. Moreover, the favour of the king towards the Jews did not commence with the elevation of Esther to the throne; for before this time Mordecai had a place among the nobles in the court of the palace, and consequently he must have been one of the royal officers. The difference of the names Artaxerxes, Xerxes, and Ahasuerus, need occasion no difficulty, for these are not so much proper names, as appellatives applied to every king at pleasure. Thus Daniel calls even Astyages, Ahasuerus of the Median line.]—Jahn's Hebrew Commonwealth, vol. i. p. 199.—Ed.

^b This was a river of Assyria, and very probably that which ran along the Adiahene, where the river Diava, or Adhava, is known to be, and upon which Ptolemy places the city of Abane, or Avane. Here, some imagine, was the country which, in the second book of Kings xvii. 24, is called Ava, from whence the king of Assyria translated the people called Avites into Palestine, and, in their room, settled some of the captive Israelites. It was a common thing for those that travelled from Babylon to Jerusalem, in order to avoid the scorching heat of the desert of Arabia, to shape their course northward at first, and then, turning to westward, to pass through Syria, into Palestine; but Ezra had a farther reason for his taking this route; for as he intended to get together as many Israelites as he could, to carry along with him to Jerusalem, he took his course this way, and made a halt in the country of Ava, or Ahava, from whence he might send emissaries into the Caspian mountains, to invite such Jews as were there to come and join him.—Le Clerc's Commentary on Ezra viii., and Cabnet's Dictionary under the word Ahava.

^c This they had the greater reason to do, because they carried things of considerable value along with them; were apprehensive of enemies that lay in wait for them; and were ashamed to ask any guard of the king; who being not much instructed in divine matters, might possibly think that what they said of God's favour towards them, and the prophecies concerning their restoration, were but vain boasts, in case they should seem to distrust his power and favour, of whom they had spoken so magnificently, by making application to the king for his protection and defence. Rather therefore than give any such umbrage, they were resolved to commit themselves entirely to God: but then it was necessary that they should beseech that of him, which, without giving offence, they could not request of the king.—Patriarch's Commentary.

^d According to the account we have of them, (Ezra viii. 26, 27,) there were 650 talents of silver, which at 375 pounds to the talent, make 243,750 pounds. The silver vessels weighed 100 talents, which came to 37,500 pounds. The gold in coin was 100 talents, which at 4500 pounds per talent, made 450,000 pounds; and besides all this, there were 20 basins of gold of 1000 drachms, and two vessels of fine copper, as valuable as gold.—Houell's History in the notes. [Sir J. Chardin, (MS. note,) has mentioned a mixed metal used in the east, and highly esteemed there, which might probably be of as ancient an origin as the time of Ezra. He says, I have heard some Dutch gentlemen speak of a metal in the island of Sumatra and among the Maecassars, much more esteemed than gold, which royal personages alone might wear. It is a mixture, if I remember right, of gold and steel. Calmbac, is this metal, composed of gold and copper; it in colour nearly resembles the pale carnation rose, has a very fine grain, and the polish extremely lively. Gold is not of so lively and brilliant a colour.]—Harnet, vol. ii. p. 490.—Ed.

^e The manner in which Ezra is said to have expressed his concern for the people's unlawful marriages, is, by 'rending his garment, and his mantle,' (chap. ix. 3,) that is, both his inner and upper garment; which was a token not only of great grief and sorrow, but of his apprehensions likewise of the divine displeasure; and by 'pulling off the hair of his head and beard,' which was still a higher sign of exceeding great grief among other nations, as well as the Jews; and therefore we find in Homer, that when Ulysses and his companions bewailed the death of Elpinor, 'they sat together lamenting and tearing their hair.'—Odyss. x.

^f The prayer we have in Ezra ix. 6, &c. the purport of which is this:—That he was confounded when he thought of the greatness of their sins, which were ready to overwhelm them, and of the boldness and insolence of them beyond measure, even though they had seen the divine vengeance upon their forefathers, in so terrible a manner, that they had not yet worn off the marks of his displeasure. He had begun indeed to show favour to some of them; but this so much the more aggravated their wickedness, in that, so soon after their restoration and settlement in their native country, they had returned to their old provocations, notwithstanding the many admonitions in the law and the prophets, to have nothing to do with the people of Canaan, except it were to expel and root them out. What then can we expect, says he, but the utter destruction of the small remnant that is left of us, if, after all the punishments which God has inflicted on us, and his beginning now to be gracious unto us, we relapse into the same offences for which we have so severely sulked? For while we remain monuments of his mercy, and yet appear before him in our abominations, we must an apostasy, he caused proclamation to be made for all the people of the land, that had returned from the captivity, to meet together at Jerusalem, under the penalty of excommunication and confiscation of their goods; and when they met, he endeavoured to make them sensible of their sin, and engaged them in a promise and covenant before God, to depart from it, by putting away their strange wives, and the children that were born of them, that the seed of Israel might not be polluted by such an undue commixture; and accordingly commissioners were appointed to inspect this affair, who, in three months' time, made a proper inquiry, and a thorough reformation of this enormity.

Upon the death of Zerubbabel, the administration both of civil and ecclesiastical affairs devolved upon Ezra; but in the twentieth year of Abasuerus, ^a Nehemiah, a very religious and excellent person among those of the captivity, and who was a great favourite with that prince, succeeded him in the government of Judah and Jerusalem. He had informed himself, from some people that were come from Jerusalem, of the miserable state and condition of that city; that ^b its walls were broken down, and its gates burned, so that its inhabitants lay open not only to the incursions and insults of their enemies, but to the reproach likewise and contempt of their neighbours. This mournful relation affected the good man to such a degree, that he applied himself in fasting and ¹ prayer to God, and humbly besought, that he would be pleased to favour the design which he had conceived of asking the king's permission to go to Jerusalem.

By his office, ^c he was cupbearer to the king; and

^a It may well be questioned whether this Nehemiah be the same that is mentioned in Ezra (chap. ii. 2, and Neh. vii. 7), as one that returned from the Babylonish captivity under Zerubbabel; since from the first year of Cyrus to the twentieth of Artaxerxes Longimanus, there are no less than ninety-two years intervening; so that Nehemiah must, at this time, have been a very old man, upon the lowest computation above an hundred, and, consequently, utterly incapable of being the king's cupbearer, of taking a journey from Shushan to Jerusalem, and of behaving there with all that courage and activity that is recorded of him. Upon this presumption, therefore, we may conclude, that this was a different person, though of the same name; and that Tarshatha (the other name by which he is called, Ezra ii. 63, and Neh. vii. 65,) denotes the title of his office, and, both in the Persian and Chaldean tongues, was the general name given to all the king's deputies and governors.—Le Clerc's and Poole's Annotations.

^b The commissions which had hitherto been granted to the Jews were supposed to extend no farther than to the rebuilding of the temple, and their own private houses; and therefore the walls and gates of their city lay in the same ruinous condition in which the Chaldeans left them after that devastation.—Patrick's Commentary, and Poole's Annotations.

^c This was a place of great honour and advantage in the Persian court, because of the privilege which it gave him that was in it, of being daily in the king's presence, and the opportunity which he had thereby of gaining his favour, for the obtaining of any petition that he should make to him. And that it was a place of great advantage seems evident, by Nehemiah's gaining those immense riches which enabled him for so many years, (Neh. v. 14, 19) out of his own private purse only, to live in his government with all that splendour and expense, that will hereafter be related, without burdening the people at all for it.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 415.

therefore, when it came ^d to his turn to wait, the king, observing that his countenance was not so cheerful as at other times, and being told, that the distressed state of his country, and of the city where his ancestors were buried, were the only cause of it, gave him, at his request, through the intercession of the queen (who ² was then sitting with him), leave to go to Jerusalem, and a full commission, as his governor of the province of Judea, to repair the walls, and to set up the gates, and fortify the city again in the same manner that it was before it was dismantled and destroyed by the Babylonians; but, upon this condition it was, that he should return to court again, at such a ^e determinate time.

The king, at the same time, wrote letters to all the governors beyond the Euphrates, to be aiding and assisting to him in the work. He sent his order to Asaph, the keeper of his forests in those parts, to furnish him with whatever timber he should want, not only for the reparation of the towers and gates of the city, but for the building of himself a house likewise, as governor of the province, to live in; and, to do him still more honour, he sent a guard of horse, under the command of some of the captains of his army, to conduct him safe to his government.

With these letters and powers, Nehemiah arrived at Jerusalem, and was kindly received by the people; but it was three days before he acquainted any one with the occasion of his coming. On the third day at night, he, with some few attendants, went privately round the city, to take a view of the walls, which he found in a ruinous condition; and, on the next, called together the chief of the people, and, ^f having reminded them of the desolate

^d Commentators have generally observed, that it was almost four months between his hearing of the disconsolate condition wherein Jerusalem lay, and his requesting leave of the king to go thither. But, besides that it might not come to his own turn of waiting sooner, there might be these farther reasons assigned for this his long silence and delay: as that he could not take so long and dangerous a journey in the winter; that he could no sooner meet with a seasonable opportunity of speaking with the king upon so critical an affair; or, as others will have it, that he retired all this intermediate while, and spent it in fasting and prayer.—Poole's Annotations, and Patrick's Commentary.

^e How long this was, it is not certain. It is said indeed that he was 'governor in the land of Judah for twelve years,' chap. v. 14—xiii. 6. But considering what haste he made in despatching the building of the walls, which he finished in two and fifty days, the leave which he asked might be but for a year, or perhaps half so much; after which time, it is likely, that he returned to Shushan, according to his promise; but, some time after, was sent back again by the king, who found his presence there serviceable, or perhaps necessary, for the better regulation of that province, to be his governor for twelve years.—Patrick's Commentary.

^f The speech which Josephus puts in the mouth of the governor upon this occasion is to this effect:—"You cannot but see and understand, you men of Judea, that we ourselves are, at this day, under the power and providence of the same almighty and merciful God that did so many things for our forefathers Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, out of a gracious regard to their piety and justice: and it is by the favour of that God that I have now obtained leave from the king to enter upon the rebuilding of your wall, and the putting of an end to the work of the temple that is yet unfinished. But taking this for granted, that you live among a sort of malicious and spiteful neighbours, who would do all that is to be done in nature for the crossing of your design, when they come once to see you heartily intent upon the undertaking, I shall therefore recommend it to you, in the first place, resolutely and fearlessly to cast yourselves upon God, who will manner in which the walls of their city lay, and exhorted them to set about the reparation of them, he produced his commission and letters to that purpose, which, when they were read, so gladdened and revived their drooping spirits, that they joyfully and unanimously cried out ‘Let us rise and build.’

In carrying on the building, Nehemiah divided the people into several companies, and assigned to each of them the quarter where they were to work, reserving to himself the reviewal and direction of the whole. But they had not long proceeded in the work, before Sanballat, an officer of the Moabites, and Tobiah, a man of note among the Ammonites, two bitter enemies to the Jewish nation, began to scoff and ridicule their undertaking. As the work, however, advanced, they changed their note, and apprehending themselves in danger from the growing greatness of the Jews, were resolved to put a stop to their future progress.

To this purpose they entered into a confederacy with some neighbouring nations, to come upon them by surprise, demolish their works, and put them all to the sword; but the governor having notice of this their design, and sending out scouts daily to observe their motions, placed a guard well armed to defend and encourage the workmen; and ordered, that each workman should have his arms nigh at hand, in case they were attacked; while himself went often in person among them, by his precept and example, encouraging them to trust in the Lord, and, in his speeches and exhortations, putting them frequently in mind, that it was for their wives, their brethren, and children, (in case they were compelled to it,) that they fought; so that, by these means, they secured themselves against all the attempts and designs of their enemies, until the work was brought to a conclusion.

Sanballat, and the rest of his confederates, perceiving that their plot was discovered, and not daring to attack Nehemiah by open force, had recourse to craft and stratagem. To this purpose, under pretence of ending the difference between them in an amicable manner, they sent to invite him to a conference, in a certain village, in the plain of Ono, which belonged to the tribe of Benjamin, intending there to do him a mischief; but Nehemiah, very probably suspecting their wicked design, returned in answer to the four messages of the same import, which they successively sent, “that the work wherein he was engaged required his personal attendance, and therefore he could not come.”

Sanballat, perceiving that Nehemiah was too cautious to be insured by a general invitation, sent by his servant a letter, ^a wherein he informed him, that the current most certainly defeat all the practices of your enemies; and, in the next place, to ply your business day and night, without any intermission either of care or of labour, this being the proper season for it.”—Jewish Antiquities, b. xi. c. 5.

^a To send an open letter, was considered a mark of great disrespect. A letter has its Hebrew name from the circumstance of its being rolled or folded together. The modern Arabs roll up their letters, and then flatten them to the breadth of an inch; and, instead of sealing them, paste up their ends. The Persians make up their letters in a roll about six inches long; a bit of paper is fastened round it with gum, and sealed with an impression of ink. In Turkey, letters are commonly sent to persons of distinction in a bag or purse: to equals they are also inclosed, but to inferiors, or those who are held in contempt, they are sent open or uninclosed. This explains the reason of Nehemiah’s observation; — “That he was building the walls of Jerusalem only to make it a place of strength, to support his intended revolt; that, to this purpose, he had suborned false prophets to favour his design, and to encourage the people to choose him king; and that therefore, to stop the course of these rumours, (which in a short time would come to the king’s ears,) he advised him to come to him, that they might confer together, and take such resolutions as were convenient.” But Nehemiah, knowing his own innocence, easily saw through this shallow contrivance, and returned him for answer, that “all these accusations were false, and the inventions only of his own naughty heart;” so that finding himself disappointed here likewise, he betook himself to this last expedient.

There was one Shemaiah, the son of Delaiah the priest, a great friend to Nehemiah, whom Sanballat had bribed to his interest. This man pretended to the gift of prophecy: and, therefore, when Nehemiah came to his house one day, he foretold, that his enemies would make an attempt to murder him that very night, and therefore advised him to go with him ^b into the inner part of the temple, and so secure themselves by shutting the doors. But though Nehemiah did not apprehend the other’s design, which he came to find out afterwards, yet, out of a sense of honour and religion, he declared positively, “That, come what would, ^c he could not quit his station, because it would badly become a man in his character, to seek out for refuge, when he saw danger approaching.”

These, and many more difficulties, the good governor had to contend with; but by God’s assistance he overcame them all, and in the space of two and fifty days, having completed the whole work, he afterwards held servation; ‘Then sent Sanballat his servant unto me with an open letter in his hand.’ In refusing him the mark of respect usually paid to persons of his station, and treating him contemptuously, by sending the letter without the customary appendages, when presented to persons of respectability, Sanballat offered him a deliberate insult. Had this open letter come from Geshem, who was an Arab, it might have passed unnoticed, but as it came from Sanballat, the governor had reason to expect the ceremony of inclosing it in a bag, since he was a person of distinction in the Persian court, and at that time governor of Judea.—Parson’s Illustrations, vol. iii. p. 241.—Ed.

^b By ‘the house of God within the temple,’ (as it is in the text, Neh. vi. 10.) Shemaiah certainly meant the sanctuary; and to advise Nehemiah to retreat thither, he had a good pretence, because it was both a strong and a sacred place, being defended by a guard of Levites, and by its holiness, privileged from all rude approaches. But his real design herein might be, not only to disgrace Nehemiah, and dishearten the people, when they saw their governor’s cowardice, but to prepare the way likewise for the enemies assaulting and taking the city, when there was no leader to oppose them: to give countenance to the calumny that had been spread abroad, of his affecting to be made king, because he fled upon the report of it; and, perhaps, by the assistance of some other priests, that were his confederates, either to destroy him, or to secure his person, until the city was betrayed into the enemy’s hands.—Patrick’s Commentary, and Pool’s Annotations.

^c The words of Nehemiah, upon this occasion, are very significant, as well as magnanimous. “Should such a man as I flee? I, the chief governor, upon whose presence, and counsel, and conduct, the very life and being of the whole city and nation does, in a great measure, depend: I, who have professed such resolution, courage, and confidence in God; I, who have had such eminent experience of God’s gracious, and powerful assistances, of his calling me to this employment, and carrying me through it, when the danger was greater than now; shall I dishonour God and religion, and betray the people and city of God by my cowardice? God forbid.”

a dedication ^a of the walls and gates of Jerusalem, with such solemnity and magnificence as a work of that nature required.

To this purpose he separated the priests, the Levites, and the princes of the people, into two companies, one of which walked to the right hand, and the other to the left, on the top of the walls. The two companies which were to meet at the temple in their procession, were attended with music, both vocal and instrumental. When they came to the temple, they there read the law, offered sacrifices, and made great rejoicings; and as the feast of tabernacles happened at the same time, they failed not to celebrate it with great solemnity.

When the walls were finished, Nehemiah, to prevent any treachery from his enemies, either within or without the city, ^b gave the charge of the gates to his brother Hanani, and to Hananiah, marshal of his palace, ^c two men in whom he could confide; commanding them not to suffer the gates to be opened till some time after sunrise, to see them safe barred at night, and to set the watch, which should consist of settled housekeepers that were careful and diligent men. And for the still farther security of the city, observing that the ^d number of its inhabitants was too few, he ordered that the principal men of the nation should there fix their habitations, and, at the same time, caused the rest to cast lots,

^a Dedication is a religious ceremony, whereby any temple, altar, and vessel thereto belonging, is, by the pronouncement of a certain form of blessing, consecrated to the service of God; and this dedication, we may observe, extends not only to things sacred, but to cities and their walls, and sometimes to private houses, (Deut. xx. 5.) As, therefore, Moses in the wilderness dedicated the tabernacle, and Solomon the temple, when he had finished it; so Nehemiah, having put things in good order, built the walls and set up the gates, thought proper to dedicate the city, as a place which God himself had chosen, and sanctified by his temple and gracious presence; and by this dedication, to restore it to him again, after it had been laid waste, and profaned by the devastation of the heathens.—Patrick's Commentary, and Pool's Annotations.

^b Nehemiah, very likely, was now returning to Shushan to give the king an account of the state of affairs in Judea, and therefore he took care to place such men in the city as he knew would faithfully secure it in his absence. Hanani is said to be his brother; but he chose his officers, not out of partial views to his own kindred, but because he knew that they would acquit themselves in their employment with a strict fidelity. Hanani had given proof of his zeal for God and his country, in his taking a tedious journey from Jerusalem to Shushan, to inform Nehemiah of the sad estate of Jerusalem, and to implore his helping hand to relieve it, chap. i. And the reason why Nehemiah put such trust and confidence in Hananiah was, because he was a man of conscience, and acted upon religious principles, which would keep him from those temptations to perfidiousness which he might probably meet with in his absence, and against which a man, destitute of the fear of God, has no sufficient fence.—Patrick's Commentary, and Pool's Annotations.

^c So the house which was built for Nehemiah's residence might justly be called, because he lived there in great splendour, though wholly at his own charge, and as the king's viceroy, there gave audience to the people, as a king is wont in his palace.—Patrick's Commentary, and Pool's Annotations.

^d One reason why the bulk of the Jews (who were originally pastors, and lovers of agriculture) might rather choose to live in the country than at Jerusalem was, because it was more suited to their genius and manner of life. But at this time their enemies were so engaged to see the walls built again, and so restless in their designs to keep the city from rising to its former splendour, that it terrified many from coming to dwell there, thinking themselves more safe in the country, where their enemies had no pretence to disturb them.—Le Clerc's and Patrick's Commentaries.

^e whereby a tenth part of the whole people of Judah and Benjamin ^f became obliged to dwell at Jerusalem, though those who came voluntarily were better received.

While the walls of the city were building, there happened a kind of mutiny among the common people, which might have been of fatal consequence, had it not been timely composed: for the rich, taking the advantage of the meager sort, had ^g exacted heavy usury of them, insomuch, that they made them pay the centesima for all the money that was lent them, that is, one per cent. for every month, which amounted to twelve per cent. for the whole year. This oppression reduced them so low, that they were forced to mortgage their lands, houses, and tenements, and even to sell their children into servitude ^h to have ⁱ wherewith to buy bread for ^e Though the casting of lots be certainly forbidden, where the thing is done out of a spirit of superstition, or with a design to tempt God; yet, on some occasions, it is enjoined by God himself; and the most holy persons both in the Old and New Testament, in particular cases, have practised it. The wise man acknowledges the usefulness of this custom, when he tells us, 'that the lot causeth contention to cease, and parteth between the mighty,' Prov. xviii. 18; and therefore it was no bad policy (as things now stood) to take this method of decision, since the lot, which all allowed was under the divine direction, falling upon such a person, rather than another, would be a great means, no doubt, to make him remove more contentedly to the city.—Patrick's Commentary, and Cabnet's Dictionary, under the word Lot.

^f These were the two tribes that anciently possessed Jerusalem, which stood partly in one tribe, and partly in the other: for which reason, in some places of Scripture, Jerusalem is reckoned as belonging to the children of Judah, Josh. xv. 62, and Judg. viii. 28; and in others, to the children of Benjamin, Judg. xxi. 28; but what part of the city belonged to the one, and what to the other, is not so well agreed among learned men. Since these two tribes, however, were the ancient inhabitants of the city, there was all the reason in the world, why, in this scarcity of inmates, they, above any others, should be obliged to come and dwell there.—Patrick's Commentary.

^g This usury was the more grievous, because it was not only contrary to their law, and demanded at a time when they were hard at work, and their enemies threatening to destroy them all; but, as some have observed, that the twentieth of Ahasuerus (wherein this was done) began about the end of a sabbatical year after the law, which forbade every creature to exact any debt of 'his neighbour or his brother,' Deut. xv. 2, had been so frequently read. This raised the cry of the poor to a greater height, having been forced to sell their children, and deprived now of all power of redeeming them, because their lands were mortgaged to those oppressors.—Patrick's Commentary.

^h As to the paternal power of the Hebrews, the law gave them leave to sell their daughters, (Exod. xxi. 7); but the sale was a sort of marriage, as it was with the Romans. Fathers sold their children to their creditors, (Isaiah l. 1); and in the time of Nehemiah, the poor proposed to sell their children for something to live upon; and others bewailed themselves that they had not wherewith to redeem their children that were already in slavery. They had the power of life and death over their children, (Prov. xix. 18). But they had not so much liberty as the Romans, to make use of this severe privilege without the knowledge of the magistrate. The law of God only permitted the father and mother, after they had tried all sorts of correction at home, to declare to the elders of the city that their son was stubborn and rebellious; and upon their complaint he was condemned to death and stoned, (Deut. xxi. 19). The same law was in force at Athens.—Fleury's Hist. of the Israelites, p. 130.—Ed.

ⁱ Not long before this there had been a great scarcity for want of rain, which God thought proper to withhold, in punishment for the people's taking more care to build their own houses than his, as we read, Hag. i. 9, &c. In which time the rich had no compassion on their poor brethren, but forced them to part with all they had for bread; and now (what made them the support of themselves and their families; which being a manifest breach of the law of God (for¹ that forbids all the race of Israel to take usury of any of their brethren), Nehemiah, as soon as he was informed thereof, resolved to remove so great an iniquity. And, accordingly, having called a general assembly of the people, wherein he set before them the nature of the offence, how great a breach it was of the divine law, and how heavy an oppression upon their brethren; what handle it might give their enemies to reproach them; and how much it might provoke the wrath of God against them all; he caused it to be enacted, by the general suffrage of the whole assembly, that every one should return to his brother whatever he had exacted of him upon usury; and should likewise release all the lands, houses, and tenements, that he had, at any time, taken of him upon mortgage; which act presently removed all uneasiness, and pacified the minds of the people.^a still more miserable) another death was come upon them, which might easily happen, from the multitude of people that were employed in the repair of the walls; from the building-work, which hindered them from providing for their families some other way; and from the daily dread they had of their enemies, which might keep them from going abroad to fetch in provision, and the country people from bringing it in.—Patrick's Commentary, and Poole's Annotations.

^a In the text, Neh. ch. v. 15, it is said, 'even their servants bare rule over the people.' By these words it is evident that some oppressive practices are referred to. They probably relate to the forcible taking away of provisions from the people by the servants of former governors. In these countries this was no uncommon thing; many instances of it might be easily produced: the one which follows may, however, suffice. After the jealousy of the poor oppressed Greeks, lest they should be pillaged, or more heavily loaded with demands by the Turks, had prevented their voluntarily supplying the Baron du Tott for his money, Ali Aga undertook the business, and upon the Moldavian pretending not to understand the Turkish language, he knocked him down with his fist, and kept kicking him while he was rising, which brought him to complain in Turkish of his beating him so, when he knew very well they were poor people, who were often in want of necessaries, and whose princes scarcely left them the air they breathed. "Pshaw! thou art joking, friend," was the reply of Ali Aga, "thou art in want of nothing except of being basted a little oftener. But all in good time. Proceed we to business. I must instantly have two sheep, a dozen of pigeons, fifty pounds of bread, four oques (a Turkish weight of about forty-two ounces) of butter, with salt, pepper, nutmeg, cinnamon, lemons, wine, salad, and good oil of olives, all in great plenty." With tears the Moldavian replied: "I have already told you that we are poor creatures, without so much as bread to eat; where must we get cinnamon?" The whip was taken from under his habit, and the Moldavian beaten till he could bear it no longer, but was forced to fly, finding Ali Aga inexorable, and that these provisions must be produced. A quarter of an hour was not expired, within which time Ali Aga required these things, before they were all brought.—Memoirs, vol. i. part ii. p. 10; and Forbes's Oriental Memoirs, vol. i. p. 231.—It was nearly dark when we reached the town, if a long straggling village may bear this appellation. Ibrahim rode first, and had collected a few peasants around him, who we could just discern by their white habits, assembled near his house. In answer to his inquiries respecting provisions for the party, they replied, in an humble tone, that they had consumed all the food in their houses, and had nothing left to offer. Instantly the noise of Ibrahim's lash about their heads and shoulders made them believe that he was the herald of a party of Turks, and they fled in all directions. This was the only way, he said, to make those misbegotten dogs provide any thing for our supper. It was quite surprising to see how such lusty fellows, any one of whom was more than a match for Ibrahim, suffered themselves to be horse-whipped, and driven from their homes, owing to the nancing any manner of oppression, that he did not exact the daily revenue of forty shekels of silver, and the constant furniture of his table with provisions; but remitted these and all other advantages of his place, that might any way be troublesome and chargeable to the people. Nay, he not only refused the allowance which was due to him as governor, but, at his own charge,^b kept open house, entertaining every day at his table a hundred and fifty of the Jews, and their rulers, besides strangers; for which he constantly allowed an ox, six fat sheep, and fowl in proportion, and, on every tenth day, wine of all sorts. Besides this, he gave² many rich presents to the temple; and, by his generous example, encouraged others, both princes and people, to do the like.

Thus Nehemiah, with great honour and applause, having executed the commission with which he was sent to Jerusalem, at the expiration of the time which was allowed him, he returned to Shushan, according to his promise to the king. But before he did that,^c Ezra the learned scribe, at the request of the people, produced the book of the law, which he had now completed, and having divided the company into several parts, he, with thirteen priests more, read from a wooden pulpit,^d and as he went along, expounded it to them.^e This they dread in which they hold a nation of stupid and cowardly Mahometans.—Clarke's Travels, vol. iii. p. 614.—Ed.

^b From this great and daily expense, it seems most probable, either that Nehemiah had large remittances from the Persian court, even besides his own estate, to answer it, or that he did not continue at Jerusalem for the whole twelve years together; or that, if he did, he did not continue this expensive way of house-keeping all the time, but only during the great and present exigencies and distresses of the Jews, which ceased in a good measure after that the walls were built, the act against usury passed, and the people discharged to their ordinary course of maintaining themselves and families.—Poole's Annotations, and Le Clerc's Commentary.

^c This Ezra, without all controversy, was the same Ezra who came from Babylon to Jerusalem, in the seventh of Artaxerxes, with a full commission to assist Zerubbabel in the reformation of the whole state of the Jewish church. After the death of Zerubbabel, the whole administration devolved upon him; but as his commission lasted but twelve years, upon its expiration Nehemiah succeeded to the government, and we hear no more of Ezra, until he is here called upon to read and expound the law to the people; whether, as some think, he returned to Babylon, to give the people an account of affairs in the province of Judea, or whether, in this intermediate time, he employed himself, in some retirement, in the great work of preparing a new and current edition of the Holy Scriptures, of which we shall give a full account in our next section.—Patrick's Commentary, and Poole's Annotations.

^d This pulpit was to raise him up higher than the people, the better to be seen and heard by them; but we are not to think that it was made in the fashion of ours, which will hold no more than one person; for, as we may observe by the very next words, it was made large and long enough to contain fourteen people at once.—Patrick's Commentary.

^e The words in the text (Neh. viii. 8,) are, 'so they read in the book in the law of God distinctly, and gave the sense, and caused them to understand the reading.' The Israelites having been lately brought out of the Babylonish captivity, in which they had continued seventy years, according to the prediction of Jeremiah, (xx. 11,) were not only extremely corrupt, but it appears that they had in general lost the knowledge of the ancient Hebrew to such a degree, that when the book of the law was read, they did not understand it; but a certain Levite stood by, and gave the sense, that is, translated into the Chaldee dialect. This was not only the origin of the Chaldee tergums, or translations of the law and the prophets into that tongue; but all listened to with a very devout attention, ^a and celebrated the ensuing feast of tabernacles with great gladness of heart; and, on a day appointed for a solemn fast, confessing their own sins, in deprecating the judgments due to the iniquity of their fathers; acknowledging the omnipotence of God in creating and preserving all things, and enumerating his gracious mercies in their sundry deliverances from their enemies and persecutors, they made a covenant with him, that they would walk in his law, which was given by Moses; and, to ^b oblige themselves to a more strict performance of this covenant, it was ordered to be engrossed, that the prince, priests, and Levites, might set their ^c hands and seals to it; and those who did not set their seals, of what age, sex, or condition soever, did bind themselves with an oath, punctually to observe it.

But, notwithstanding all this precaution, Nehemiah had not been long gone from Jerusalem, before the people relapsed into their old corruptions; which, in a great measure, was owing to the mismanagement of ^d Eliashib was also, in all probability, the origin of preaching from a text; for it appears that the people were not only ignorant of their ancient language, but also of the rites and ceremonies of their religion, having been so long in Babylon, where they were not permitted to observe them. This being the case, not only the language must be interpreted, but the meaning of the rites and ceremonies must also be explained; for we find from ver. 13, &c. of this chapter, that they had even forgotten the feast of tabernacles, and every thing relating to that ceremony. As we no where find that what is called preaching on or expounding a text, was even in use before that period, we are probably beholden to the Babylonish captivity for producing, in the hand of Divine providence, a custom the most excellent and beneficial ever introduced among men.—Dr A. Clarke.—Ed.

^a The words in the text are, 'since the days of Joshua, the son of Nun, unto that day, had not the children of Israel done so, and there was very great gladness,' (Neh. viii. 17.) But it can hardly be thought that this festival had never been observed since Joshua's time; because we read in the foregoing book of Ezra, that it was kept at their return from Babylon; but the meaning is, that the joy since that time had never been so great as it was upon this occasion; for which the Jews themselves assign this reason, namely, that in the days of Joshua they rejoiced, because they had got possession of the land of Canaan, and now they equally rejoiced, because they were restored, and quietly settled in it, after they had been long cast out of it.—Patrick's Commentary.

^b The observances, which they chiefly obliged themselves to in this covenant, were, 1st, not to make intermarriages with the Gentiles. 2dly, to observe the sabbaths and sabbatical years. 3dly, to pay their annual tribute for the reparation and service of the temple. And, 4thly, to pay their tithes and first-fruits for the maintenance of the priests and Levites: from which particulars, thus named in this covenant, we may learn what were the laws of God, which hitherto they had been most neglective of, since their return from the captivity.—Prideaux's Connection, anno III.

^c It signifies little, indeed, what such untoward people promised; for what regard would they have to their own hand-writing, who regarded not the ten commandments, written on tables of stone by the finger of God? It was very useful, however, that there should be a public instrument to convince them of their impiety, and that they might be publicly confounded when they proved perfidious deserters, by showing them, under their own hands, their engagements to future fidelity.—Patrick's Comment.

^d Some are apt to imagine, that this Eliashib was no more than a common priest, because he is said to have had 'the oversight of the chambers of the house of God,' (Neh. xiii. 4.) which was an office too mean, as they think, for the high-priest. But we cannot see why the oversight of the 'chambers of the house of God' may not import the whole government of the temple, which certainly belonged to the high-priest only: nor can we conceive how any one that was less than absolute governor of the whole the high-priest, who, being by marriage allied to Tobiah, the Jews' great enemy, had allowed him an apartment in the temple, in the very place where the offerings, and other things appertaining to the priests and Levites, used to be repositied. So that when Nehemiah returned from the Persian court with a new commission for the reforming of all abuses, both in church and state, he was not a little surprised to find such a gross profanation of the temple, and that chambers should be provided in the house of God for one who was a declared enemy to his worship.

He therefore resolved to put an end to this; but found himself under a necessity of proceeding with caution in the affair, because ^e Tobiah had insinuated himself into the good opinion of most of the people, and especially those of note. The first step therefore that he took towards this reformation was to convince them of their error, by causing the book of the law to be read publicly, and in the hearing of all the people; so that when the reader came to that place in Deuteronomy, wherein it is commanded that ^f an Ammonite or Moabite should not come into the congregation of God, even temple could make so great an innovation in it. He was assistant, indeed, in the reparation of the walls of the city; but excepting this one act, where do we read of his doing any thing worthy of memory, towards the reforming of what was amiss in church or state, in the times either of Ezra or Nehemiah? And yet we cannot but presume, that had he joined with them in so good a work, some mention would have been made of it in the books written by them. Since, therefore, instead of this, we find it recorded in Ezra, (chap. x. 18.) that the pontifical house was, in his time, grown very corrupt, and, not improbably, by his connivance, began to marry into heathen families, (Neh. xiii. 28.) it seems most likely that it was Eliashib the high-priest who was the author of this great profanation of the house of God; but as he might die before Nehemiah returned from Babylon, for this reason we hear nothing of the governor's reprehending him for it.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 428.

^e By his making two alliances with families of great note among the Jews: for Johanan his son had married the daughter of Meshullam the son of Berechiah, (Neh. vi. 18—iii. 4.) who was one of the chief managers of the building of Jerusalem, under the direction of the governor; and he himself had married the daughter of Shechaniah the son of Arah, another great man among the Jews; by which means he had formed an interest, and was looked upon as a worthy man, though (being an Ammonite) he could not but bear a national hatred to all that were of the race of Israel.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 428.

^f They who, by 'the congregation of God,' in this place, do understand 'the public assemblies for divine worship,' lie under a great mistake; for no man of any nation was forbidden to come and pray to God in the temple. Men of all nations, indeed, that were willing to become proselytes, were admitted into the Jewish communion; and, if they submitted to be circumcised, were allowed to eat the passover, and to enjoy all the privileges that true Israelites did, except only in the case of marriage; and therefore this phrase of not 'entering into the congregation of the Lord,' must be understood to mean no more than a prohibition of marriage; for this, according to their rabbins, was the case of such prohibitions. None of the house of Israel, of either sex, were to enter into marriage with any Gentiles, of what nation soever, unless they were first converted to their religion, and became entire proselytes to it; and even in that case, some were debarred from it for ever; others only in part; and others again only for a limited time. Of the first sort were all of the seven nations of the Canaanites, mentioned in Dent. vii; of the second sort were the Moabites and the Ammonites, whose males were excluded for ever, but not their females; and of the third sort were the Edomites and Egyptians, with whom the Jews might not marry until the third generation; but with all others who were not of these three excepted sorts, they might freely make intermarriages whenever they became thorough proselytes to

to the tenth generation for ever: they being sensible of their transgression in this respect, separated themselves immediately from the mixed multitude, which gave Nehemiah an easy opportunity of getting rid of Tobiah, who was an Ammonite; and therefore he ordered the people, while they were in this good disposition, to cast his furniture out of the sacred chambers, and to have them cleansed again, and restored to their former use.

Among other corruptions that grew up during the governor's absence, there was one of which, as he was a constant frequenter of the public worship, he could not but take notice, and that was, the neglect of carrying on the daily service of the house of God, in a proper and decent manner. For the tithes, which were to maintain the ministers of the temple in their offices and stations, being either embezzled by the high-priest, or withheld by the laity, for want of them the Levites and singers were driven from the temple into the country, to find a subsistence some other way: and therefore, to remedy this abuse, he forthwith ordered the people to bring in their tithes of corn, wine, and oil, into the treasury of the temple; and having appointed proper officers to receive and distribute them, he recalled the absent ministers, and restored everything to its former order.

The neglect of the service of God had introduced a profanation of the sabbath: for, during Nehemiah's absence, the Jews had not only done all manner of servile works on that day, but had permitted strangers, Tyrians, and others, to come and sell their fish, and other commodities, publicly in the streets of Jerusalem. Against these wicked and irregular practices, Nehemiah remonstrated to the chief men of the city with some warmth; and, to let them see that he was resolved to make a thorough reformation in this matter, he gave a strict order, that towards the evening, before their sabbath began, the city gates should be shut, and not opened, until the sabbath was over: and to have this order more duly executed, he appointed ^b some of his own servants for the present to guard the gates, that no burden might pass through on the sabbath day. So that when the merchants and other dealers came, and, finding the gates shut against them, took up their lodgings without the walls in hopes of selling to the country people, though their religion. At present, however, because, through the confusions which have since happened in all nations, it is not to be known who is an Ammonite, who an Edomite, a Moabite, or an Egyptian, they hold this prohibition to have been long out of date, and that now, any gentile, as soon as proselyted to their religion, may immediately be admitted to make intermarriages with them.—Pridcaue's Connection, anno 428.

^a The method of purifying any thing or person that was legally unclean is thus described:—'For an unclean person, they shall take of the ashes of the burnt heifer of purification for sin, (that is, of the heifer that was sacrificed on the great day of expiation), and running water shall be put thereto in a vessel,' which being afterwards strained off and kept for this purpose, 'a clean person,' that is, the priest (for to him the work of purifying is appropriated, Lev. xiii.) 'shall sprinkle upon the unclean person;' and on the seventh day at even, after having bathed himself, and washed his clothes, he shall be deemed clean; but it is very likely that things inanimate were, immediately upon their being sprinkled with this water of separation, as it is called, (Numb. xix. 9) reputed clean.—Patrick's Commentary.

^b It seems as if matters were come to that pass, that he could not trust the common porters of the gates, and therefore appointed some of his own domestics (who, he knew, would neither be careless nor corrupted) to see that the gates were shut, and all traffic prohibited.—Patrick's Commentary.

they could not to the citizens, the next day he threatened to take them into custody, if they did not go about their business; and to this purpose, appointed a guard of Levites ^c to take up their station at the gate, and to stop all comers in, that might any way profane the sabbath.

Another reformation, and the last indeed that we find recorded of Nehemiah, was his dissolution of unlawful marriages among the Jews. Their law strictly forbade them to make intermarriages with any foreign nations, either by giving their daughters to them for wives, or by taking their daughters to themselves; but, since their return from captivity, people of all conditions had paid so little regard to this command, that even the pontifical house, which of all others ought to have set a better example, was become polluted with such impure mixtures, insomuch that Joiada the high priest had a son, who married the daughter of Sanballat the Horonite, who, at that time, very probably was governor of Samaria.

These mixed marriages, besides many other damages that accrued to the state, would, in a short time, as he observed to them, quite corrupt their native language, ^d because he perceived, that the children already began to smatter the speech of their foreign parent; ^e and therefore he required them all, under the penalties ^f

^c The reason why he appointed the Levites to this office of keeping the gates on the sabbath-day, was, because he not only thought, that, by virtue of their character, they would meet with more deference and respect than his domestic servants, but that when he and his servants were gone from Jerusalem, he was resolved to have this watch continued, until this evil custom of admitting dealers into the city on the sabbath-day was quite broken.—Patrick's Commentary

^d What the natural language of the Jews at this time was whether the Hebrew or Chaldee, is matter of some inquiry among the learned. Those who suppose that it was Hebrew, produce the books of Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther, besides the prophecies of Daniel, which, for the most part, were written in Hebrew, and which they suppose the authors of them would not have done, if Hebrew at that time had not been the vulgar language. But to this it is replied, that these Jewish authors might make use of the Hebrew language in which they wrote, not only because the things which they recorded concerned the Jewish nation only, among whom there were learned men enough to explain them; but chiefly because they were minded to conceal what they wrote from the Chaldeans, who at that time were their lords and masters, and, considering all circumstances might not perhaps have been so well pleased with them, had they understood the contents of their writings. Since it appears then, say they, by several words occurring in the books of Maccabees, the New Testament, and Josephus, that the language which the Jews then spoke was Chaldee; that this language they learned in their captivity, and, after their return from it, never assumed their ancient Hebrew tongue, so as to speak it vulgarly, it hence must follow, that what is here called the language of the Jews, and their native tongue, was at that time no other than the Chaldee, for the ancient Hebrew was only preserved among the learned.—Le Clerc's Commentary.

^e From Nehemiah xiii. 23, 24, it appears that there were children in the same family by Jewish and PLEISTINE mothers. As the Jewish mother would always speak to her children in Hebrew or Chaldee, so they learned to speak these languages; and as the Ashdod mother would always speak to her children in the Ashdod language, so they learned that tongue. Thus there were in the same family children who could not understand each other; half, or one part, speaking one language and the other part another. Children of different wives did not ordinarily mingle together; and the wives had separate apartments. This is a better explanation than that the same child spoke a jargon half Ashdod and half Hebrew.—Dr A. Clarke.—Ed.

^f There are some things in the text, which, as they are made to proceed from Nehemiah's own mouth, and appear in our translation, sound a little oddly: 'I contended with them, and cursed them, and smote certain of them, and plucked off their hair;' c. xiii. 25, which he inflicted upon some that were obstinate, to put away their wives, and to have no more communion of that kind with any foreign nation: in which he proceeded with such impartiality, that when the son of Joiada refused to quit his wife, he ordered him immediately to depart the country; ^a which accordingly he did, and with several others that were in the like circumstances, went and settled under his father-in-law in Samaria.

These were some of the reformations which Nehemiah, as a wise and pious governor, made in the Jewish church and state. But after his death, it was not long before the people relapsed into the same enormities; for which reason we find Malachi, ^b the last prophet under the law; who, not long after Haggai and Zechariah, must have lived in the time of Nehemiah, reproving the priests for their iniquity and scandalous lives, and upbraiding the people with their neglect of the worship of God; with their refusal to pay their tithes and offerings; with their divorcing their own wives, and marrying strange women; and with their inhumanity and cruel usage of their indigent brethren; the very same enormities which this good governor laboured to reform.

How long after this Nehemiah lived at Jerusalem, is uncertain: it is most likely, however, that, notwithstanding all the revolutions ^c in the Persian court, he continued in his government to the time of his death, but when that happened, it is no where said; only we may observe, that at the time when he ends his book he could not be much less than seventy years old.

CHAP. II.—Objections answered and Difficulties obviated.

THE Jewish law against marrying with heathens runs thus:—¹ ‘When the Lord thy God shall bring thee into the land whither thou goest to possess it, and hath cast out many nations before thee,—Thou shalt not make marriages with them; thy daughter thou shalt not give unto his son, nor his daughter shalt thou take to thy son. And the reason of the law is assigned in the following verse: ‘For they will turn away thy sons from following me, that they may serve other gods: for did not Solomon ² king of Israel,’ as Nehemiah argues with the people, ‘sin by these things?’ And if so great a one as he, who excelled all mankind in wisdom, was not safe from the seducement of these outlandish women, how shall ye be able to preserve yourselves from their enticements? And yet, as Moses goes on in his reasoning, ³ ‘Thou art an holy people unto the Lord thy God; and the Lord hath chosen thee to be a special people unto himself above all the people that are upon the face of the earth.’

Here then is an express law, enforced with weighty

But the sense of these words is no more than this:—‘I contended with them,’ that is, I expostulated the matter with them. ‘I cursed them,’ that is, excommunicated them, in the doing of which I denounced God’s judgments against them, ‘I smote certain of them,’ that is ordered the officers to beat some of the most notorious offenders, either with rods or with scourges, according to Deut. xxv. 2, ‘And I plucked off their hair,’ that is, I commanded them to be shaved, thereby to put them to shame, and make them look like vile slaves: for as the hair was esteemed a great ornament among eastern nations, so baldness was accounted a great disgrace: and to inflict these several punishments upon them, Nehemiah had a sufficient provocation, because in their marrying with heathen nations, they had acted contrary, not only to the express law of God, but to their own late solemn covenant and promise, Ezra x. 19.—Paole’s Annotations. [The author of this note, by the phrase ‘plucking off the hair,’ (Neh. xiii. 25) understands shaving the head; but there is no reason for departing from the literal sense of the words in our version, particularly as the words signify to pluck off with violence, as if one were plucking a live bird. The same word is used in the same sense Ezra ix. 3. ‘plucked off the hair of my head, and of my beard.’ Also in Isaiah l. 6, ‘I gave my cheeks to them that plucked off the hair.’ Not only was this mode of punishment practised among the Jews, but it was also common in Persia, and sometimes hot ashes were put upon the skin after the hair was torn off, in order to make the pain the more exquisite.—See Horne’s Introduction, Paxton’s Illustrations, and Gesen. Heb. Lex.—Ed.]

^a Josephus relates the matter, as if this expulsion had been effected by the power of the great Sanhedrim; but whether the Sanhedrim was at this time in being or no, as we have no clear footsteps of it until the time of Judas Maccabeus, there was no occasion for their interposing, since Nehemiah, no doubt, as governor of the province, had authority enough to banish him out of Judea, as Bertram, (On the Jewish Republic, c. 13.) expands the phrase, ‘I chased him from me,’ (Neh. xiii. 28.)

^b Whether the word Malachi be the proper name of a man, or only a generic name to denote an angel, a messenger, a prophet, or the like, has been a matter of some inquiry. From the prophet Haggai, (chap. i. 13.) and this other, whom we cite under the name of Malachi, (chap. iii. 1.) it appears, that in these times the name of Malach-Jehovah, or the messenger of the Lord, was often given to prophets; and under this title, the Septuagint have characterized, and the fathers of the Christian church have frequently quoted, this prophetic writer. But the author of the Lives of the Prophets, under the name of Epiphanius Dorotheus, tells us, that this writer was of the tribe of Zebulun, a native of Sapha, and that the name of Malachi was given him, because an angel used visibly to appear to the people after the prophet had spoken to them, to confirm what he had said; though most of the ancient Jews, as well as the Chaldee paraphrast, were of opinion that Malachi was no other than Ezra under a borrowed name. However this be, it is agreed on all hands, that he was the last of the prophets of the synagogue, and lived about 400 years before Christ; of whose coming, and the coming of his forerunner John the Baptist, and of whose religion, and the institution of a catholic and universal church, in the room of the Jewish, he speaks in very full and express terms, (chap. iii. 1.)—Caland’s Dictionary under the word.

^c Upon the death of Artaxerxes, (in Scripture called Ahasuerus,) Xerxes, his only son by his queen, for he had several by his concubines, and among these, the most famous were Sogdianus, Ochus, and Arsites, succeeded in the Persian throne; but, by the treachery of one of his eunuchs, Sogdianus came upon him while he was drunk, and, after he had reigned no more than five and forty days, slew him, and seized on the kingdom. But his unjust possession did not hold long, for his brother Ochus, being then governor of Hyrcania, raised a considerable army, and, having gained many of the nobility and governors of provinces to his interest, marched against him, and, under a pretence of a treaty, having got him into his power, threw him headlong into ashes, a punishment used among the Persians for very enormous criminals; so that, after he had reigned only six months and fifteen days, he died a very miserable death, and was succeeded by Ochus; who as soon as he was settled in the kingdom, took the name of Darius, and is therefore by historians called Darius Nothus, and after he had slain his brother Arsites, who thought to have supplanted him, as he had done Sogdianus, and Sogdianus, Xerxes, and suppressed several other insurrections against him, continued to sway the Persian sceptre for nineteen years, but whether he or Nehemiah, his governor of Judea, died first, we have no certain account: all that we know is that the last act of the governor’s reformation, namely, his dissolution of strange marriages, was in the fifteenth year of this prince’s reign, and consequently but four before his death.—Prideaux’s Connection, anno 125.

reasons, against these pagan marriages: and therefore, since whatever is done contrary to the law, is ipso facto null and void, these marriages with idolatrous women, which were strictly forbidden by God, were, properly speaking, no marriages at all; and the children which proceeded from them, were in no better condition than those whom we call bastards. ¹ No interposition of civil authority was therefore needful to dissolve these marriages. The infidelity of the party espoused was as much an interdiction, as any of the most proximate degree of consanguinity, which, by the laws of all civilized nations, is known to vacate the marriage.

But even suppose that the civil authority thought proper to interpose in this matter, yet, wherein had the Jews any reason to complain, if in just punishment for their wilful breach of a known and positive law, they were excluded from cohabiting with these illegal wives? The Jews, I say, especially, who for every light and trivial cause ^a made no scruple even to give their lawful wives a bill of divorcement, and might therefore, with much less difficulty, be supposed willing to repudiate those whom the laws of their God, for fear of their catching the infection of idolatry, had forbidden them to live with.

St Paul, indeed, is not for 'turning away an unbelieving wife,' in case she is 'willing to dwell with her husband;' but then he supposes, that this couple were married when they were both heathens, and in a state of infidelity, in which case there was no law, either divine or human, forbidding them to marry, whereas in these Jewish marriages with pagans the prohibition is strict; and therefore, as there was no sin in their coming together at first, and the Christian religion, whether it was the man or the woman that embraced it, made no alteration in the case, his advice is, that they continue to dwell together, even though they be of different persuasions in matters of religion: because, as he farther adds this reason, ² 'the unbelieving husband is sanctified by the wife; and how knowest thou, O man, but that by thy peaceable cohabitation with her, thou mayest convert, and save thy wife?'

Though therefore the apostle is not for encouraging any separation between husband and wife upon account of their difference in religion, when their marriage was previous to either of their conversions to Christianity; yet, if we will make him consistent with himself, we must allow, that he is utterly averse to all mixed marriages with infidels, when in his following epistle he advises all Christians, ³ 'Not to be unequally yoked together with unbelievers; for what communion,' says he, 'has light with darkness, or what concord has Christ with Belial?' &c. Whereby he gives us to think, that he esteemed all marriage with heathens illegal, and that, had the apostle, at that time, been either of Ezra's or Nehemiah's council, he would have given his vote for their dissolution among the Jews.

We own, indeed, that it is a very gracious declaration of God, 'Behold, all souls are mine, as the soul of the father, so also the soul of the son is mine; that soul that sinneth, it shall die;' but then we are to consider, that as life signifies, in general, all that happiness which attends God's favour, so death denotes all those punishments which are the effects of divine displeasure; and among these, the miseries of the next world are chiefly intended. These indeed shall be allotted to men, according to their own demerits, without any regard to the faults of their forefathers, which shall neither be laid to their charge nor made an aggravation of their guilt; but as to temporal evils and calamities, it cannot well otherwise be, but that, in the very course of things, children should suffer for the iniquities of their parents.

Though therefore it may seem a little hard, that the children should be included in their mother's divorce, yet the laws of most nations have determined this point:—That children are to follow the condition of their mothers, be it what it will, and, consequently as they are unlawfully born, they must of course be alienated from the family, at the same time that the mother is repudiated, and in virtue of that very law which declares her marriage to be null. So that it was no arbitrary act in Ezra to abdicate the children, as well as the mothers: though, ⁴ to prevent the danger of their corrupting the other children of the family, if they were allowed to stay, and of insinuating themselves so far into their father's affections, as to prevail with them in time to recall their ejected wives, might be motive enough to a prudent ruler, considering the then situation of affairs, to put the law rigidly in execution. As this however was an act of the government, wherein Ezra, and other good men who feared the Lord, were concerned, we may reasonably presume, that some provision was made for the maintenance, and perhaps the education of these poor children, in the principles of the Jewish religion, at the public charge.

How long Nehemiah was in finishing the walls of Jerusalem, interpreters are not agreed; because some of them, supposing the space of two and fifty days, ⁵ mentioned in the Scripture, to be too short for the perfecting of the whole, have begun their computation from the time that Nehemiah returned his answer to Sanballat's first message, and others, from the time that the stone-wall was finished, and so allow the whole fifty-two days for the perfecting of the rest. But if we look into the compass of time, from Nehemiah's being at Shushan, to the day of the month when these walls are said to have been finished, we shall find, that no more than fifty-two days could well be allowed for the perfecting of the whole.

It was ⁶ in the first month, called by the Jews Nisan, that Nehemiah was at Shushan, and obtained of the king leave to go to Jerusalem: and though we have no express account what time he spent in his journey, and when he came to Jerusalem; yet if we may make a conjecture from the time that Ezra expended in the same journey, we can scarce suppose that he arrived at Jerusalem before the end of the fourth month. the first day of the first month. He made a ¹ short stay indeed at the river Ahava ; but it was the first day of the fifth month before he reached Jerusalem. Nehemiah could not possibly set out so soon in the year, because his commission ² from the king, and instructions to the neighbouring governors, must have taken some time in passing through the several offices : and therefore we can scarce suppose that he reached Jerusalem sooner than the time specified ; and from thence to the twenty-fifth day of the sixth month, (including the three days of rest that he gave himself before he began,) the space will be much about fifty-two days, wherein we suppose that the whole work was finished : ³ for if Alexander the Great, as Arrianus and Curtius relate, built the walls of Alexandria, which was seven miles in compass, in the space of twenty days, why should it be thought a thing incredible, that a vast number, not of hired but voluntary men, full of zeal for the work themselves, animated by the example of their rulers, and ranged and distributed in a proper manner for dispatch, should, in almost thrice that space of time, be able to finish a work of less compass, when they had long summer days for it, plenty of stones, and other materials hard at hand, the foundation of the wall unrazed, some parts of it standing entire, only some breaches here and there to be amended ; and when their design in the whole was, not to study curiosity but strength, and to provide themselves with such a fortification for the present, as would secure them from any sudden invasion of their enemies ?

How ⁴ long Nehemiah continued at the Persian court, after his return from Jerusalem, the sacred history nowhere informs us. It tells us, indeed, that he came back again, after certain days ; but since the word yamin, which we render days, does equally signify years, and in many places of the Hebrew Scriptures is used in that sense, we cannot but wonder how the generality of chronologers, as well as commentators, came to overlook this sense of the word, and in so doing, to make Nehemiah's stay at Shushan much shorter than it possibly could be. For since he had been twelve years in reforming what he found amiss among the Jews, and Ezra had been doing the same for thirteen years before him ; they must, one would think, have brought their reformation to such a state and stability, that a little time could not have been sufficient so totally to have unhinged it : and therefore we may conclude, that his absence at court, which gave room for these irregularities to grow to such an height, was not for certain days, but for some years' continuance ; and consequently that the author of this part of his life had no intention, either to magnify his good offices, or to relate any thing incredible concerning him ; since, though he acquaints us with sundry corruptions that had sprung up, yet he makes the time of his absence, if we take his words in their proper sense, long enough for that purpose.

That Nehemiah was the writer of the account of his own government in Judea, for that is the subject of his book, most interpreters are agreed : ⁵ and, as he appears in that character, it cannot misbecome him to give the world a narrative how himself behaved in that high station ; though, in doing this, he could not avoid the saying of something in his own commendation, unless he had been minded, out of his excessive modesty, to conceal from posterity (which it had been invidious to do) an excellent example of his extraordinary virtue, and love of his country.

St Paul, no doubt, was a very modest man : ⁶ he durst not, as he tells us, make himself of the number, or compare himself with such as commended themselves ; and yet, in the very next chapter, (that ⁷ he might stop the mouths of false apostles, and covetous people,) we find him telling the Corinthians, that he preached the gospel to them freely, and without desiring any contributions of them for his necessary support. ⁸ ' I robbed other churches,' says he, ' taking wages of them, to do you service ; and when I was present with you, and wanted, I was chargeable to no man :—for in all things I have kept myself from being burdensome to you, and so will I keep myself ; as the truth of Christ is in me, no man shall stop me of this boasting in the regions of Achaia ; for what I do, that I will do, that I may cut off occasion from those that desire occasion, that wherein they glory, they may be found even as we : ' and after all this, can any find fault with Nehemiah, for telling his reader, that ⁹ ' what was prepared for me daily, was an ox and six choice sheep, fowls in proportion, and once in ten days, store of all sorts of wine ; yet for all this, required not I the bread of the governor,' that is, the allowances which were made to the governors appointed by the kings of Persia, to provide them a table, ' because the bondage was heavy upon this people,' and they not in a condition, without much difficulty, to maintain themselves : wherefore ' think upon me, O God, for good, according to all that I have done for this people.'

To serve God for nothing, or purely for his own sake, is a notion that perhaps may comport with our glorified state, where our service will be attended with vision ; but, at present, it is too romantic, and what the Author of our being expects not from us. He who made us, and set the springs in our nature, knows very well, that we are principally moved by hopes and fears, and for this reason has propounded rewards and punishments to us ; nor did we ever find it, till now, accounted a flaw in the character of the worthies of old, or an indication of their mercenary spirits, that, in all their good works or sufferings, they ¹⁰ ' had a respect to the recompence of the reward, which God, the righteous judge,' had promised to give unto his faithful servants.

Ezra, no doubt, was at this time a man of great esteem among his brethren, and no less favoured in the Persian court ; otherwise Artaxerxes would never have granted him a commission to reform and regulate the affairs of the Jewish church, fraught with such ample powers. Ever since that time, the Jews have looked upon him as another Moses, who, as Moses was the giver of the law, revived and restored it, after it had been in a manner quite lost and extinguished in the Babylonish captivity. There is some reason to believe therefore, that ¹¹ ' this scribe of the law of the God of heaven,' was the usual title or appellation of honour, whereby Ezra was digni-field and distinguished among his countrymen; and that Artaxerxes might take it upon common report, and so insert it in his commission, as the name whereby he was generally styled among the Jews, without ever giving himself time to consider what was the full purport and intendment of it.

But if even he did attend to this, yet, as the heathens had different kinds of gods, celestial, terrestrial, and infernal, he might easily reconcile this to his own principles, only by supposing that this God of the Jews was one of the celestial order, and, though a deity peculiar to them, might nevertheless be revered and worshipped by him in conjunction with his other gods.

But, after all, if we reflect a little on the ease and indolence, and, in a manner, total sequestration from all business, wherein these great monarchs of the east were used to indulge themselves, we shall find reason to believe, that Artaxerxes knew nothing of the matter. If he be the same who goes under the name of Ahasuerus in the book of Esther, he had been imposed on by Haman to consent to a bloody decree against the Jews, with so little thought and consideration of what he was about, that ¹ he did not so much as remember the person at whose instigation it was done: and yet, notwithstanding the great mischief which this negligence of his might have brought upon him, we find him instantly sinking into the like sleepy and careless temper. ² 'Write ye for the Jews, says he to Mordecai and Esther, 'as it liketh you, in the king's name, and seal it with the king's ring,' and whatever is thus wrote and sealed, no man may reverse. And, by parity of reason, why may we not suppose, that when Ezra applied to court for his commission, the whole form of drawing it up was referred to him, and such other Jews as he thought proper to take into his council? For, 'Write ye, as it liketh you, in the king's name,' might, in one case as well as the other, be all that the king had to say to the matter. And indeed, if we look into the contents of the commission itself, we shall soon perceive that it must have been drawn by something more than a heathen hand. For if Ezra himself had been to dictate the words, how could he have expressed the tenor of his commission more fully than in these: ³ 'forasmuch as thou art sent by the king, and his seven counsellors, to inquire concerning Judah and Jerusalem, according to the law of thy God, which is in thine hand?' what Jewish king could have given more pious instructions than these: ⁴ 'and thou Ezra, after the wisdom of thy God, set magistrates and judges, such as know the laws of thy God, and teach ye them that know them not? And where can we find a livelier sense of God's supreme authority, and of that regard which is due from the greatest kings and potentates to his commands, more emphatically expressed than here: 'whosoever is commanded by the God of heaven, let it be diligently done for the house of the God of heaven?' "Words," as Jacobus Capellus, in a kind of rapture, cries out, "fit to be written upon the palaces of kings in letters of gold, and engraven on the minds of all the faithful with a stile of adamant."

agreed, that the same hand which composed the two books of Chronicles was concerned in writing that part of Ezra, because the Chronicle concludes with the very same words wherewith the history begins, which, in ancient authors, to connect the thread of the discourse, as Grotius observes, is no unusual thing. The Jewish doctors indeed are chiefly of opinion, that these Chronicles were written by Ezra. But this can hardly be, because the author, whoever he was, continues the ⁶ genealogy of Zerubbabel to the twelfth generation, which is lower than Ezra lived. Nor can Ezra be the author of the six first chapters of the book which bears his name, because the person who wrote it ⁷ is said to have been at Jerusalem in the time of Darius Hystaspes; whereas Ezra ⁸ did not go thither until the reign of Artaxerxes. It is most likely, therefore, that Ezra, upon his coming to Jerusalem, might meet with certain annals or memoirs kept, of the several transactions that had happened since the time of the people's return from captivity, and that to these, after he had made an extract of such as were true and authentic, he added a farther continuation of the history of his own government. For, that the four last chapters of the book were of his own composing, is evident from this testimony. ⁹ 'And at evening sacrifice, I arose up from my heaviness, and having rent my garment, and my mantle, I fell upon my knees, and spread out my hands unto the Lord.' Then follows the prayer which he made, and immediately it is subjoined, ¹⁰ 'Now when Ezra had prayed, and when he had confessed, and cast himself down before the house of God:' which plainly shows, that Ezra was the author of that part of the book, which speaks of himself in the first person.

And, in like manner, that Nehemiah was the writer of what is reputed his, seems to be evident, ¹¹ not only from his own declaration in the front of it, (which was the practice of Herodotus, Thucydides, and other ancient historians in those days,) but from the testimony of the Jewish church likewise, which all along received it into their canon, and from the approbation of the seventy interpreters, who, from the very first, gave it a place in their translation under that name.

There is some difficulty, indeed, in reconciling the account of Josephus concerning Sanballat, and what is recorded of him in Nehemiah. Josephus ¹² tells us, "That he, being made governor of Samaria under the last Darius, married his daughter to one whose father had been high priest of the Jews, and that when his son-in-law was thereupon driven out of Jerusalem, he obtained leave of Alexander to build a temple on mount Gerizim, like that at Jerusalem, and to make him the priest thereof." Now, to make this accord with what we read in Nehemiah, ¹³ the general opinion is, that there were two Sanballats, the first the Sanballat of the Holy Scriptures, and the other the Sanballat of Josephus; and that there were two marriages contracted by two different persons, sons of two different high priests of the Jews, with two different women, who were each daughters of two different Sanballats; the first the daughter of the Sanballat of the Scriptures, and the other the daughter of the Sanballat of Josephus, and that he who married the first of them was the son of Joiada, but he who married the second of them was the son of Johanan, and brother of Jaddua. But there is no reason to have recourse to this perplexed solution, seeing that Josephus has incurred a palpable mistake in point of chronology. For, ¹ since this marriage was consummated while Joiada, the son of Eliashib, was the high priest of the Jews, even in the fifth year of his pontificate; ² and since he entered upon that office in the eleventh year of Darius Nothus, who reigned in all nineteen years, it must follow, that the license which Sanballat obtained for the building of a temple at Samaria, was not from Alexander, but from this Darius, in the fifteenth year of his reign, and above eighty years before the Darius Codomannus whom Alexander vanquished was known. There is no occasion, therefore, to suppose any more Sanballats than one, or to extend his life to any immoderate length; only we may perceive, that Josephus was under a mistake in placing this Sanballat under the reign of Codomannus, who should have been placed under a former Darius, surnamed Nothus; and consequently, that all he tells us of this Sanballat's attending Alexander in his wars, and obtaining of him a license to build a temple, is a mere fiction founded on that mistake: because, in Alexander's time, the Samaritans, by murdering Andromachus, his governor of Syria, had so incensed that great conqueror against them, that, instead of granting them any favours, ³ we find him making all the havoc of them that he could.

Who the author of the book of Esther was, the opinions of the learned are various. Some ascribe it to Ezra, others to Mordecai, others to Mordecai and Esther in conjunction, and others again to the joint labours of the great synagogue, who, from the time of Ezra to Simon the Just, superintended the edition and canon of Scripture. Those who contend for Mordecai, have these words to allege in his behalf: ⁴ And Mordecai wrote these things, and sent letters unto all the Jews, that were in all the provinces of king Ahasuerus, and the Jews undertook to do as Mordecai had written to them: ⁵ but the thing is evident, that these words relate, not to the book itself, but to the circular letters which Mordecai sent to the Jews, in all the provinces of the Persian empire, signifying what a mighty deliverance God had vouchsafed them, and, in commemoration of it, instituting an annual festival to be observed for ever.

And indeed the institution of this annual festival, and its continued observation, is a standing proof that this history of Esther is real, and not fictitious: since we can hardly conceive, how a wise nation should at first appoint, and afterwards continue the celebration of this solemn time of feasting and rejoicing every year, merely because a certain man among them had once the good fortune to write an agreeable fable or romance; much less can we conceive, from what motive a whole assembly of learned doctors should receive a writing of no better character into the canon of their Scriptures, or (to make it of more universal use) should honour it with a Greek translation.

It must be owned, indeed, that no foreign author has taken any notice of this piece of history; but the reason hereof is obvious, namely, ⁶ because the authors who wrote of the affairs of Persia at this time, entered no farther into them than as they were coincident with the affairs of Greece; and though the last six chapters of this history are not to be found in any Hebrew copy, yet Origen is of opinion, ⁷ that once they were extant, though now lost, and that from it the Septuagint formed their translation; though others, with more probability, think, that (as the history of this memorable transaction might be recorded by divers hands) there were once two Hebrew copies of it, one in a larger, and the other in a less volume, and that, as the less is what we have at present, from the larger has proceeded the Greek copy, with its sundry additions.

Haman, we read, was an Amalekite, one of that nation ⁸ against which God pronounced a curse; and therefore, upon this consideration, Mordecai might think himself not obliged to pay him the reverence which he expected; and, if the rest of the Jews had the like notion of him, this might be reason sufficient for his extending his resentment against the whole nation. But there seems to be something more in the reverence which the people were commanded to pay him, than what is the effect of civil respect. The king of Persia, we know, expected a kind of divine adoration from all that approached his presence; ⁹ as we read of one Timagoras, upon whom the people of Athens passed sentence of death, for his worshipping of Darius, accounting the honour of their whole city debased by this mean submission of one of their citizens, though at that time Darius was one of the greatest monarchs upon earth. And as the kings of Persia did arrogate this to themselves, so they sometimes imparted it to their chief friends and favourites, as it seems at this time to have been the case with Haman. For we can hardly conceive, why the king should give a particular command, ¹⁰ that all his servants should reverence him, if by this reverence no more is intended than that they should show him a respect suitable to his station: but now, if we suppose that the homage expected from them was such as came near to idolatry, ¹¹ we need not wonder, that a Jew should deny that honour, or the outward expressions of it, to any man, since the wise and sober Greeks did positively refuse to give it to the very kings themselves. And that this was the case before us, the author of the apocryphal additions to the book of Esther seems to imply, when he introduces Mordecai as praying in these words,—¹² 'Thou knowest, O Lord, that it is not contumacy, nor pride, nor desire of vain glory, that makes me not worship Haman: for I would willingly kiss his feet for the safety of Israel. But I do it, that I may not prefer the glory of a man, to the glory of God, nor adore any one but thee, my Lord, alone.'

Though we are far from pretending to apologize, either for the injustice of Ahasuerus in abdicating his queen, or for the conduct of Esther in going to his bed, yet a good deal of this might be resolved into the custom of a nation, where the king was absolute, and his subjects mere vassals, where the will of the prince, I say, was a perfect law, and a plurality of wives and concubines reputed honourable. This, however, may be said in behalf of Ahasuerus, that he did not divorce his wife, without first consulting his counsellors, and such as were best acquainted with the laws of their country; and therefore, if there was any iniquity in it, they were the persons chiefly to be blamed, who represented the queen's disobedience as a crime of such a dangerous nature, that it would have had a noxious influence upon the whole nation, had it not been severely punished. And this may be said in excuse for Esther, that the words which we render, ¹ 'she was brought,' may equally signify 'she was taken away,' namely, by violence; ² for (as the Targum upon this passage relates the matter) 'Mordecai, hearing of the king's edict for the collection of all the beautiful virgins in his dominions, hid his cousin in a private place, where the officers could not find her; but when Esther (whom all the neighbourhood knew to be a great beauty) was missing, an order from the king to Mordecai was procured, which, upon pain of death, obliged him to produce her.' However this be, it is certain, that the persons whom the king took to his bed in this manner, were not reputed harlots, but became his lawful wives, though wives of an inferior degree; and therefore it is no great wonder, that Esther, in these circumstances, though a very virtuous woman, should consent; nor can we tell, but that Mordecai and she might have a dispensation from God, (as God, no doubt, can dispense with his own laws,) supposing there were any contrariety to the divine laws in this transaction.

To account for the humour of princes, and their management of public affairs, is next to a thing impossible. We see, even among us, that great men are sometimes unmindful of the highest services that are done them, and take no care to reward them, especially if the person be in himself obscure, and not supported by a proper recommendation. And therefore we are not at all to wonder, if a prince, that buried himself in indolence, and made it a part of his grandeur to live unacquainted and unconcerned with what passed in his dominions, (as this was the custom of most eastern kings,) should overlook the great service which Mordecai had done him, or if he ordered him a reward, that, by the artifice of those at court, who were no well-wishers to the Jews, he might be disappointed of it.

There seems, however, to have been a particular direction of providence in having his reward delayed till this time, when he and all his nation were appointed to destruction, when the remembrance of his services might be a means to recommend them to the king's mercy, and the honours conferred on him a deep mortification to his adversary. These honours indeed were very remarkable; but by Haman's manner of proposing them, they seem to have been the usual marks of distinction and esteem, that the kings of Persia conferred on those whom they were minded to make conspicuous; and so far was Mordecai from being elated with them, that as soon as the solemnity was over, we read, that ³ he returned to his duty, and attendance at the king's gate.

He had declared himself a Jew, to satisfy the people at court, that he could not, with a good conscience, comply with the king's command relating to the reverence which was to be paid to Haman; and the interposition of Providence in behalf of the Jewish nation, even during their captivity, had been so visible, that the wise men about Haman might, from experience, form a conjecture, that if their God was become their friend, (as by this strange turn of affairs in favour of Mordecai it looked as if he was,) no weapon forged against them would prosper; because they had seen so many plots, which would have crushed any other nation, turn to their advancement, as well as their enemies' destruction. The advice ⁴ which Achior gave to Holofernes, is founded upon the known experience of those times, and bespeaks a man well acquainted with the state of the Jews: 'Now, therefore, my lord, and governor, if there be any error in this people, and they sin against their God, let us consider that this will be their ruin.—But if there be no iniquity in their nation, let my Lord now pass by, lest their Lord defend them, and their God be for them, and we become a reproach before all the world.' Considering, then, that Mordecai was of the seed of the Jews, a people whom God had wonderfully raised from under great oppressions, and that, at this time, there was a desperate design, by Haman's management, carrying on against them, Haman's wise men might easily, and without the spirit of prophecy, divine, ⁵ that as Mordecai (whom they knew to be a man of great courage and wisdom,) was now got into the king's favour, it would not be long before he would find an opportunity of applying to him, who was a person of a mild disposition, for a revocation of the bloody decree which Haman, by imposing upon his credulity, had procured, and consequently of ruining Haman in the king's good graces. For the known instability of court favours, and the little quarter that there is given to rivals or enemies, made it no hard matter, from Mordecai's advancement to read Haman's destiny.

Haman, indeed, was outrageously bent against the Jews, and what he offered the king in lieu of the damage which his revenues might sustain by the destruction of so many of his subjects, is a prodigious sum for any private man to be owner of; but we read of several such persons in history, who, in those ancient times, were possessors of much greater. Pithius the Lydian, for instance, ⁶ when Xerxes passed into Greece, was possessed of 2000 talents of silver, and of 4,000,000 daricks in gold, which together, amounted to near £5,500,000 of our sterling money; and ⁷ Marcus Crassus, the Roman, after he had consecrated the tenth of what he had to Hercules, feasted all the people of Rome at 10,000 tables, and gave a donative of corn to every citizen, as much as would last him three months, found the remainder of his estate to be 7,100 Roman talents, which amount to above £1,500,000 of our money. This may seem a little strange to us at present; but our wonder will cease, if we consider that, from the time of David and Solomon, and for 1500 years afterwards, the riches of this kind were in much greater plenty than they are now. The prodigious quantities of gold and silver which Alexander found in the treasures of Darius; the vast loads of them which were often carried before the Roman generals, when they returned from conquered provinces; and the excessive sums which certain of their emperors expended in donatives, feasts, shows, and other instances of luxury and prodigality, are of this proof sufficient: ¹ but at length the mines of the ancient Ophir, which furnished all this plenty, being exhausted, and by the burning of cities, and devastation of countries, which followed upon the eruptions of the Goths, Vandals, and Huns, and other barbarous nations in the west, and of the Saracens, Turks, and Tartars in the east, a great part of the gold and silver, which the world then abounded with, being wasted and destroyed by these means, the great scarcity of both, which afterwards ensued, was occasioned; nor have the mines of Mexico, Peru, and Brazil, been as yet able fully to repair it.

The great sum which Haman would have given to gratify his revenge against the Jewish nation, was an additional provocation to them, no doubt, to slay every one who came to annoy them; but then it must be considered that, in this, they acted by virtue of an edict, which authorized them to stand upon their own defence; that they were not the first aggressors, but only opposed those that openly assaulted them, and were for putting an unjust decree in execution against them; and as the Amalekites, who might be dispersed throughout the Persian dominions, were the known and inveterate enemies of the Jews, and, following now the fortune of Haman, might be forward enough to execute the decree which he had procured against them, it is therefore reasonably presumed, that most of those whom the Jews, in their necessary defence, both in Shushan and in the provinces, did destroy, were of that devoted nation; and that, by this their slaughter, the prophecies against Amalek were accomplished.

However this be, we cannot take leave of this wonderful deliverance of the Jewish nation, without making this one reflection upon it, namely, ² "That though, in the whole, there was no extraordinary manifestation of God's power, no particular cause or agent, that was in its working, advanced above the ordinary pitch of nature; yet the contrivance, and suiting these ordinary agents appointed by God, is, in itself, more admirable than if the same end had been effected by means that were truly miraculous. That a king should not sleep, is no unusual thing, nor that he should solace his waking thoughts by hearing the annals of his own kingdom, or the journals of his own reign, read to him, &c.; but that he should lie awake at that time especially, when Haman was watching to destroy the Jews; and that, in the chronicles of the kingdom they should light on that place where Mordecai's unrewarded services were recorded; that the king thereupon should resolve forthwith to do him honour, that Haman should come in at the very nick of time, when he was so disposed, and should ignorantly determine what honour should be done him, and be appointed to that ungrateful office himself: this was from the 'keeper of Israel,' who 'neither slumbers nor sleeps,' and was truly 'marvellous in his people's eyes.' For although miracles, in their nature, are more apt to strike the sense, yet such secret contrivances of God's wisdom and providence do more affect the understanding: the one works astonishment, the other admiration."

CHAP. III.—Of Ezra's edition of the Holy Scriptures and the institution of Synagogue-Worship.

EZRA, no doubt, in his knowledge of the Holy Scriptures, was a great man. The sacred history gives him this character, that ³ 'he was a ready scribe in the law of Moses, which the Lord God of Israel had given.' The Jewish doctors look upon him as the second founder of it; and are generally of opinion, that he was the prophet Malachi, ⁴ and had that title given him because he was sent as God's messenger, to revive their religion, after it had been, in a manner, quite extinguished. Nay, ⁵ many ancient fathers of the Christian church attribute more to him, in this particular, than even the Jews themselves; for they suppose, that, in the Babylonish captivity, all the Scriptures were entirely lost and destroyed, but that Ezra, by divine revelation, renewed and recovered them again. This, however, is carrying the compliment too far, and leaving the authority of the Holy Scriptures to stand upon a very precarious bottom; since some may be apt to infer, that he who is said thus wonderfully to have restored them, might much more likely have forged the whole.

We readily acknowledge, indeed, that in the time of Josiah, through the two preceding reigns of Manasseh and Ammon, copies of the law might be very scarce. But by the pious care of that good prince, we are informed, that this defect was soon remedied; that copies were taken of the original law that was then found in the temple; that search was made in the schools of the prophets, and in all other places where they could be found, for the other parts of holy writ, and transcripts formed out of these likewise, so that, in a short time, all that were desirous to know the law of their God, either by writing them out themselves, or procuring others to do it for them, were furnished with copies both of the law and the prophets. Within a few years, indeed, the city and temple were destroyed, and with them was the authentic copy of the laws, which was repositied in the temple, burned and consumed; but before this calamity befell the Jews, all the sacred writings then extant were got into private hands, and carried away with them into captivity.

That Daniel had a copy of the Holy Scriptures with him in Babylon, is certain, because ⁶ he not only quotes the law, but makes mention likewise ⁷ of the prophecies of the prophet Jeremiah, which he could not have done, had he not had them by him. That, at the finishing of the temple, (which was in the sixth of Darius, and above fifty years before Ezra came to Jerusalem,) copies of the law were in common use, no one can doubt, who reads, how the priests and Levites were settled in their respective functions, ⁸ 'according as it is written in the books of Moses;' and that when the people called for the Scripture, to have it read unto them, they did not request of Ezra to get it anew dictated to him, but that he ⁹ 'would bring forth the book of the law of Moses, which the Lord had commanded Israel;’ which plainly implies, that all the people well knew that this book was then extant, and needed not such a miraculous expedient as that of a divine revelation for its recovery.

But if Ezra did not restore the Scripture in this manner, the question is, what did he towards it? Now, to this it may be answered, that, upon his coming to Jerusalem, he got together as many copies as he could meet with, either in private hands, or public repositories; that by comparing these copies one with another, he found out the true reading, and so corrected all the mistakes that had crept into them, either through the negligence or ignorance of transcribers; that, having thus made the copies perfect, he collected from them all the books of which the Holy Scriptures did then consist, (for some books that appeared later were admitted after this time,) disposed them in their proper order, and so far settled the canon of Scripture, that, for the illustration, connexion, and completion of these books, especially such as were historical, he added some passages that were not in them before, and changed some names that were then grown obsolete, for such as were more modern, and better understood, which, as he was a prophet, he was authorized to do; that having thus made the books, in all their parts, perfect and intelligible, for the still greater ease and convenience of the vulgar, he caused the whole to be written out in the Chaldee character, which, after the Babylonish captivity, was in general use among the people, so that the old Hebrew letters were, from that time, laid aside among the Jews, and only retained by the Samaritans; and lastly, that to ascertain the reading of this introduced character, he added the vowel-points that are now found in our Hebrew bibles: but whether this was of his doing, or the work of some later hand, is a matter of much debate among the learned.

Those who maintain that Ezra, whom all held to be a prophet, was the author of these points, and that they, consequently, are of the same authority with the text itself, argue in this manner,—That when the Hebrew language ceased to be the mother-tongue of the Jews, as all agree it did after the Babylonish captivity, it thence became, in a manner, impossible to teach it, without the assistance of the vowel-points; and therefore, at least, they must have begun in the time of Ezra, and continued in use ever after: that two ancient books, called Bahir and Zohar, which are said to have been written, the one a little before, and the other a little after the time of our Saviour, made express mention of these points in more places than one: that whereas it is said, on the other side, that the Masorites of Tiberias (above five hundred years after Christ) were the inventors of these points; this appears unlikely, because the schools which the Jews once had in Judea were at this time all suppressed: nor was there any number of learned men left in the nation, of sufficient ability for such a work: and, lastly, that if it be allowed that the present points are not of the same authority with the letters themselves, but only of a late and human invention, this will weaken the authority of the Scriptures, and leave the sacred text to an arbitrary and uncertain reading and interpretation.

Those who maintain the contrary opinion, namely, that these vowel-points are of a later date than Ezra, fortify themselves with such arguments as these,—That the sacred books, which the Jews make use of in their synagogue-service, neither have, nor ever had, any of these points in them, which can only be imputed to this,—That when the Holy Scriptures began first to be publicly read in the synagogues, (which was presently after this edition which Ezra made of them,) there were no such vowel-points then in being: that if we compare the translation of the Septuagint, the Chaldee paraphrases, or the Latin version of St Jerome, with the present pointed Hebrew bibles, we shall in several places find, that they read the text otherwise than according to the present punctuation; which is an argument that these points were either not in being, or not in any great authority in those times: and, lastly, that if we consult Philo Judæus, or Josephus, who are two of the oldest authors of the Jews, or any of the ancient Christian writers, for several ages after Christ, we shall not find one word mentioned of these points, though they could not but have sundry occasions to take notice of them, if either they had been in use, or of such great credit and authority with the Jews, as is pretended. And therefore, to answer the arguments on the other side, they allege, that the books of Bahir and Zohar are not near so ancient as they are reputed; that for above a thousand years after their pretended composure, the Jews themselves knew nothing of them, nor were they once mentioned by any author whatever during that interval; and therefore there is reason to think, that a false date of antiquity was fraudulently put to them, to give them some sanction, and to recommend them to the world with a better credit.

That the Masorites of Tiberias were certainly in being a long time in Judea, and in their way of learning were not a little eminent; for St Jerome himself informs us, that he made use of them: that though there may be some difficulty in reading without points; yet since we find that the Samaritans, who understand Hebrew no better than the Jews, have no points to this day, yet can read the Hebrew text, in the Samaritan character, we need not doubt but that custom, good sense, and the coherence of the discourse, will supply rules for the remedying of these inconveniences. And lastly, since there is no language in the world, wherein there are not several equivocal expressions, which may occasion an ambiguity in the sense; though points in this case may be of some use, yet they cannot totally secure us from error, because faults in transcribing or printing and variations in pointing, are unavoidable.

To accommodate the matter then, as well as we can, between these contending parties; though these vowel points were never anciently esteemed any part of the Sacred Scripture of the Old Testament, but only additions of human invention, for the more easy reading of the text, because they were never received by the Jews, to whom were committed the oracles of God, into the books which were read in their synagogues; yet we have good reason to conclude, that upon the Hebrew ceasing to be a vulgar language, as it certainly did in the time of Ezra, they must of necessity have been introduced.

When every child learned the Hebrew tongue from his cradle, it was no hard matter for those who thus understood it by rote, to learn to read it by letters only, without the vowels; but when it became a dead language, the case was altered: ¹ for then, instead of understanding it first, in order to read it, they were first to read it, in order to understand it; and therefore having not the previous knowledge of the language to direct them herein, they must necessarily have had some other helps, in order to know with what vowel each syllable was to be pronounced; and to give them this help, the vowel-points seem certainly to have been invented: and therefore the time of this invention cannot be placed later than the time when they became necessary, that is, when the Hebrew became a dead language, and so was acquirable no other way than by study and instruction.

From this necessity of instruction, and probably not long after Ezra's edition of the holy Scripture, there sprung up a set of men among the Jews, whose profession it was to write out copies of the Hebrew text, and to preserve and teach the true reading of it. What they did of this kind, is called by the Jews the Masorah, that is, the tradition; because they pretend to have the true reading, as the Talmudists pretend to have the true interpretation, of the Scriptures handed down to them from generation to generation. However, as their whole business was to study the true reading of the Hebrew text, to preserve it from being corrupted, and to teach it to others, it is highly probable that they were the first inventors of vowel-points, because the whole use of these points was to be subservient to this purpose.

But though these points might be invented by the Hebrew grammarians, whom we call Masorites, much earlier than some will allow; yet, from their late appearance in the world, it seems very probable, that as at first they might invent them only for their private use, so, for some time, they might reserve them to themselves, and teach them only to their scholars. For the Jews, we must know, had anciently two sorts of schools, those of the Masorites and those of the Rabbins: the former taught only the Hebrew language, and to read the Scriptures in it; but the other taught their pupils to understand the word of God, and all the interpretations of it. These were the great doctors of divinity among them, to whom the Masorites were as much inferior as the teachers of grammar schools among us are to the professors of divinity in our universities.

As long therefore as these vowel-points went no higher than the schools of the Masorites, they were not much regarded among their learned men; and this is the reason why we find no mention made of them either in the Talmud, or in the writings of some ancient fathers, from whom it might have been expected. But after the publication of the Talmud, the Jewish doctors thought it advisable, in order to preserve the right reading of the text, as the Mishna and Gemara were supposed to preserve its right interpretation, to take this punctuation of the Masorites into their divinity schools, and having reviewed and corrected it with great care, they added it to the text, and so gave it all the venerable aspect it now bears.

But though these vowel-points were added to the text by such persons as understood the language perfectly, and having since undergone the review and correction of many ages, may be justly accounted a work, as complete in its kind, as can be done by human art; yet since it was only done by human art, it is no authentic part of the Scriptures: and therefore these points are not so unalterably fixed to the text, but that a change may be made in them, when the nature of the context, the analogy of grammar, or the style of the language, shall give a sufficient reason for it; especially considering, that notwithstanding their exact fixation at first, they are still liable to the mistakes of transcribers and printers, and by reason of their number, the smallness of their figures, and their position under the letters, are more liable to suffer by them than any other sort of writing whatever.

So that, upon the whole, it appears, that though these vowel-points were not affixed to the Hebrew text by Ezra himself; yet were they of early date after his edition of the Holy Scriptures: that, though they did not immediately appear in the world, nor are taken notice of by any writer of repute for many ages after; yet this was occasioned by their being confined to the schools of the Masorites, who in all probability were the first inventors of them: and though, being of human invention only, they cannot be supposed of equal authority with the text itself; yet are they of excellent use for the preservation of its right reading and for the prevention of innumerable perplexities and ambiguities, that would otherwise be incident to it.

The learned are not a little divided concerning the rise and antiquity of the Jewish synagogues: for some contend, that they were in use under the tabernacle and first temple, whilst others assert, that they had no being until the times of the captivity. The former, in behalf of their opinion, urge, ² that, as in the wilderness, the court of the tabernacle could not contain the hundredth part of the worshippers of the God of Israel, and, as in the promised land, the temple was too far distant for devout persons of every tribe to resort to it every sabbath day; there was a necessity for other places to be appointed for the service of God, that the sense of religion might not be extinguished and lost. To this purpose they observe that the Levites were dispersed in several cities, and the prophets and sons of the prophets settled in their respective colleges, that they might be ready at hand, upon all occasions, to expound the law, and instruct the people in their duty, whenever they met together for that purpose. And therefore we find the Shunamite's husband thus expostulating with his wife; ³ 'wherefore wilt thou go to the man of God, to-day, seeing it is neither new-moon, nor the sabbath;' which plainly implies, that at such stated seasons as these, the custom was to resort to such teachers for instruction: and, if this was the custom, there is no question to be made, but that proper places were appointed for their reception. It is an unworthy imputation therefore to think that so many temples should be built for idol-worship, and yet none should have zeal or piety enough to erect a synagogue for the God of heaven, or that the Pharisees should set up these useful inventions, and yet the elders and prophets, and holy men under the Old Testament, should want them.

These are the principal arguments on that side; but the silence of Scripture seems to be a strong confutation of them: for had these places of religious worship been in use among the Jews in the time we are now speaking of, we cannot conceive why there should not as frequent a mention have been made of them in the Old Testament, as there is in the New. The common, therefore, and indeed the most probable, opinion is,¹ that there were no such things as synagogues built before the captivity of Babylon and the destruction of the temple; that the Jews, seeing themselves carried away into a strange country, where they had no temple for divine service, came to a resolution of building such houses as were afterwards called synagogues, there to be instructed in the law, and to worship the God of their fathers, in the best manner they could, on every sabbath day; and that, upon their return, finding the great conveniency of such like buildings, they erected the same in their own country, as they had done before in the land of their captivity, and herein were followed by the Jews of the dispersion, in all parts of the world wherein they lived.

After Ezra had set forth a correct edition of the law, the prophets, and other sacred writings, which were extant in his time, his next care was to appoint proper persons, namely, the most learned of the Levites, and other scribes, that were well skilled in these writings, to read and expound them to his people.² This, no doubt, they did at first in the same manner that himself had done, that is, by gathering the people together in some wide street, or open place of the city, that was of the fittest capacity to receive them. But, in the wet and winter seasons of the year, the inconvenience of this came to be felt; so that, in process of time they erected houses and tabernacles, wherein to meet for this purpose: and this was the true cause and original^a of such edifices in Judea.

Synagogues were public edifices, situate either within or without their city, and generally in an elevated place.³ They were usually raised above any private house, except when there was an interdiction from the civil power, because the Jews have a notion, that it is a dishonour to God to have his house inferior, nay, so much as equal, to those of men, and in whatever city this happens, they threaten it with a speedy destruction. They are always roofed, and covered over, and by this are

² Prideaux's Connection. ³ Basnage's History of the Jews.

^a Mr Basnage, in his history of the Jews, is of opinion, that the origin of synagogues was not until the reign of the Asmonæans, some few ages before Christ, and he imputes it to this occasion:—The zealous traditionists, who made long commentaries upon the law, thought it a crime to keep the people, whose applause they mightily desired, in ignorance of them; and instead of confining their explications to Jerusalem, where they found themselves too much slighted and confined, they carried them into every city, where there were oratories, and public places of assembly. Before this, private persons made their prayers to God in their houses, where they had a place set apart for that holy exercise. It was generally upon the top of the house, for their houses were flat-roofed, that the family and their friends met together, to read some portion of the law on the sabbath day; and when there was any prophet in the city, the devout people assembled at his house. But after that the doctors had added their traditions and commentaries to the law, the business of interpreters became so much the more necessary, because those traditions were not written; so that the number of interpreters and interpretations increased daily. For this reason, convenient places were made choice of, that the people might the better meet together to be instructed; and from hence, in all probability, it is that they derive their synagogues.—B. v. c. 4.

distinguished from the proseuchæ, which were commonly in the fields, and open to the heavens. In the midst of them there is a desk, or pulpit, made very probably in imitation of that, which, as⁴ we read, Ezra made use of, from whence the book or roll of the law is read very solemnly, and from whence both he that expounds it, or he that preaches to the congregation at any time, always delivers himself. At the upper end of the synagogue, and over against the door, which ever stands to the west, there is a chest, or press, wherein the book of the law is kept, wrapt in a fine embroidered cloth, and, what is uncommon in our churches, during the time of divine service the women are separated from the men, and seated in a gallery inclosed with lattices.

Every town, wherein there were ten batelaim, that is, ten persons of full age and free condition, always at leisure on week-days, as well as sabbaths, to attend on divine service, was thought large enough to have a synagogue built in it; otherwise it was not; because the Jewish notion is, that less than such a number could not make a congregation, and, without a congregation, no part of the synagogue service could be performed. But as their notion was farther, that any person, Gentile as well as Jew, might be permitted to erect a synagogue, because the holiness of the place, as they thought, consisted not so much in the fabric, as in its being set apart and dedicated to holy uses; it thence came to pass, that though there were but few at first, yet in process of time they became so numerous, that, in our Saviour's time, there was no town in Judea, but what had one or more in it; that, in Tiberias, a city of Galilee, there were no less than twelve, and, if we may credit the Jews, 480 in Jerusalem. The buildings were contrived much after the same manner as our parish churches; had over their door or entrance this inscription written, This is the gate of the Lord, the righteous shall enter into it; and upon the walls within, were these, or such like sentences. Remember thy Creator: Keep thy foot when thou goest into the house of the Lord: Silence is commendable in the time of prayer: and, Prayers without attention, are like a body without a soul, &c.

⁵ I. In the synagogue service the first office was prayer. Their prayers at first were but very few, but have since increased to a very large bulk, which makes the synagogue service very long and tedious. What they reckon the most solemn part of their prayers are those, which they call Shemoneh Eshreth, that is, the eighteen prayers, which, according to them, were composed, and

^b These prayers were originally no more than eighteen, but R. Gamaliel, a little before the destruction of Jerusalem, added the nineteenth, which is the 12th in the subsequent order, against Christians, who are therein meant by the names of apostates and heretics; and that we may judge of the merits of these prayers, a very learned hand has given us the following translation of them, in the same order as they are in the Jewish liturgies.

I. "Blessed be thou, O Lord, our God, the God of our fathers, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob, the great God, powerful and tremendous; the high God, bountifully dispensing benefits; the Creator and Possessor of the universe, who rememberest the good deeds of our fathers, and in thy love sendest a redeemer to those who are descended from them, for thy name's sake, O King, our helper, our Saviour, and our shield. instituted by Ezra, and the great synagogue; and therefore they enjoin all that are at age, of what sex or condition soever, either in private or public, to repeat them three times a day, and on every synagogue-day, they offered them up, with the greatest solemnity, in their public assemblies. These prayers, however, are but of the same nature that the Lord's prayer is in our public service, that is, the fundamental and principal part; for besides these, they have some prayers going before, some following after, and others interspersed between them, which make the liturgies very tedious, and justify our Saviour's finding fault with their long prayers.

III. 'Thou art holy, and thy name is holy, and thy saints do praise thee every day. Selah. For a great king, and an holy one art thou, O God. Blessed art thou, O Lord, God most holy.'

IV. 'Thou of thy mercy, givest knowledge to men, and teachest them understanding; give graciously unto us knowledge, wisdom, and understanding. Blessed art thou, O Lord, who graciously givest knowledge unto men.'

V. 'Bring us back, O our Father, to the observance of thy law, and make us to adhere to thy precepts; and do thou, O our King, draw us near to thy worship, and convert us unto thee by perfect repentance in thy presence. Blessed art thou, O Lord, who vouchsafest to receive us by repentance.'

VI. 'Be thou merciful to us, O our Father, for we have sinned: pardon us, O our King, for we have transgressed against thee, for thou art a God, good and ready to pardon. Blessed art thou, O Lord most gracious, who multipliest thy mercies in the forgiveness of sins.'

VII. 'Look, we beseech thee, upon our afflictions; be thou on our side, in all our contentions; and plead thou our cause in all our litigations; and make haste to redeem us with a perfect redemption, for thy name's sake; for thou art our God, our King, and a strong Redeemer. Blessed art thou, O Lord, the Redeemer of Israel.'

VIII. 'Heal us, O Lord our God, and we shall be healed; save us, and we shall be saved; for thou art our praise. Bring unto us sound health, and a perfect remedy for all our infirmities, for all our griefs, and for all our wounds; for thou art a God, who healest, and art merciful. Blessed art thou, O Lord, our God, who curest the diseases of thy people Israel.'

IX. 'Bless us, O Lord, our God, in every work of our hands, and bless unto us the seasons of the year, and give us the dew, and the rain to be a blessing unto us upon the face of all our land, and satiate the world with thy blessings, and send down moisture upon every part of the earth that is habitable. Blessed art thou, O Lord, who givest thy blessing to the years.'

X. 'Convocate us together by the sound of the great trumpet, to the enjoyment of our liberty; and lift up thy ensigns to call together all of the captivity, from the four quarters of the earth to our own land. Blessed art thou, O Lord, who gatherest together the exiles of the people of Israel.'

But this is enough for a specimen. The rest are much of the same strain; but the reader that is desirous to see them, will find them in Dr Prideaux's Connection of the Old and New Testament, part I. b. vi.

ter of Deuteronomy, to the end of the 9th verse: the second, from the beginning of the 13th verse of the eleventh chapter of Deuteronomy, to the end of the 21st verse: and the third, from the beginning of the 37th verse of the fifteenth chapter of Numbers, to the end of the chapter: and because the first of these portions, in the Hebrew bible, begins with the word Shema, that is, hear, therefore the reading of the whole is called the reading of the Shema, which, next to their saying of the Shemonech Eshreth, or the famous eighteen prayers, is reckoned the most solemn part of their religious service.

The five books of the law were divided, as some say, by Moses himself, but not improbably by Ezra, into fifty-four sections, because in their intercalated years, (when a month was added to the year,) there were fifty-four sabbaths, and so a section, being read every sabbath day, completed the whole in the space of a year; but when the year was not thus intercalated, those who had the direction of the synagogue-worship, reduced the sections to the number of sabbaths, by joining two short ones several times into one, because they held themselves obliged to have the whole law, from the beginning of Genesis to the end of Deuteronomy, read over, in this manner, every year.

In the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes, when the reading of the law was prohibited, in the room of the fifty-four sections of it, the Jews substituted fifty-four sections of the prophets, which were ever after continued; inasmuch that when the reading of the law was again restored by the Maccabees, the section which was read every sabbath out of the law, served for the first lesson, and the section out of the prophets for the second; for that is the meaning of ¹ St Paul's 'standing up to preach, after the reading of the law and the prophets;' that is, after the reading of the first lesson out of the law and the second lesson out of the prophets.

3. The exposition of the law and the prophets went along with the reading of them: for after that the Hebrew language had ceased to be the mother-tongue of the Jews, and the Chaldee grew up into use instead of it, the custom of the synagogue was, that one should first read a paragraph of the Scriptures to the people in the Hebrew tongue, and then another interpreted it in the Chaldee, which they better understood. And this seems to suggest the reason why these sections of Scripture came to be divided into verses, namely, that by this means the reader might certainly know how much he was to read; and the interpreter how much he was to interpret at every interval.

4. After that the reading and expounding were over, any person of learning, and knowledge in the Scriptures, might address himself to the people, upon what moral or divine subject he thought proper; only we may observe, that this was a compliment usually paid to strangers; and therefore when St Paul and his company came to Antioch in Pisidia, and went into the place of divine worship on the sabbath day, ² 'after the reading of the law and the prophets, the rulers of the synagogue sent unto them, saying, ye men and brethren, if ye have any word of exhortation for the people, say on.'

From what has been said it appears, that the ministration of the synagogue-service was not confined to the sacerdotal order; for the priests were consecrated only to the service of the temple, which was widely different from this, as consisting chiefly in the offering up of sacrifices and oblations, but to this in the synagogue any one that by learning was qualified for it, was admitted. Only for the preservation of order, there were in every synagogue some fixed officers, whose business it was to take care that all religious duties were therein decently performed.

The first of this kind are those whom the Scriptures of the New Testament call ‘rulers of the synagogue:’ but how many of these belonged to each synagogue we cannot tell, only we may presume, there were more than one, because they are mentioned in the ¹ plural number, in respect of the same synagogue. Next to them, and perhaps one of them, was the minister of the synagogue, whose business it was to offer up to God the public prayers of the congregation; and being for this purpose delegated, as it were, by them to God, is therefore in the Hebrew language, called Sheliach Zibber, that is, the angel of the church, or congregation: from whence the name of the bishops of the seven churches, mentioned in the Revelations, is manifestly borrowed. Next to this angel of the church, were the deacons, and inferior ministers of the synagogue, called in Hebrew Chazarin, or overseers, who, under the rulers of the synagogue, had the charge and oversight of all things in it, and kept the books of the holy Scriptures, the liturgies, and utensils, which they brought forth, and carried away again, as there was occasion: and next to these overseers was the interpreter, whose office it was to recite in Chaldee the lessons, as they were read in Hebrew, to the congregation; and because a good deal of skill in both languages was requisite for such an undertaking, whenever the rulers of the synagogue found a person fit for this purpose, they retained him by a salary, and so made him a standing minister among them.

We have nothing more to add concerning this synagogue-worship, but that the times appointed for it were three days a week, besides their holidays, whether fasts or festivals, and thrice on every one of those days, that is, in the morning, in the afternoon, and at night: and that when at any of these times the blessing was to be given, if there was a priest present in the congregation, he always did the office; but if there was none there, the Sheliach Zibber, who read the prayers, in a form of benediction made proper for him, dismissed the people.

Before we dismiss this subject, there is one common inquiry which, by this time, we may be able to satisfy, and that is.—How it came to pass, that the Jews were so prone to idolatry before the Babylonish captivity, and so strongly bent against it, even to a degree of superstition, after that captivity was ended? which can hardly be imputed to any other cause, but that they had the law and the prophets every week read unto them, after that captivity, which they had not before. Before the captivity they had no synagogues for public worship, or instruction, nor any places to resort to for these purposes, but either the temple at Jerusalem, or the cities of the Levites; and from hence great ignorance grew among the people: God was little known among them, and his laws in a manner wholly forgotten; and therefore, as occasions offered, they were easily drawn into all the superstitious and idolatrous practices of the heathen nations that lived about them. But now, when, after the Babylonish captivity, synagogues were erected in every city, to which they constantly resorted for public worship, and where, every week, they had the law at first, and afterwards both the law and the prophets read to them; and where, by sermons and exhortations, they were, at least every sabbath day, instructed in their duty, and excited to the performance of it; this kept them in a thorough knowledge of God and his laws, as the condemnations in the prophets, when once they came to be read among them, deterred them from transgressing against them; for, ² ‘all Scripture,’ as the apostle speaks, ‘is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness, that the man of God,’ or every man who resolves to be godly, ‘may be perfect, wise unto salvation, and thoroughly furnished unto all good works.’

One thing we may observe farther:—That, since there was a public liturgy established in the Jewish church, and forms of prayer, though very empty and jejune in comparison of those that are in use among us; our blessed Saviour, when upon earth, was contented to join with the public in these forms, and to frequent the synagogue ³ every sabbath day. And this may inform us, that to break the union of a church, upon the account of better edification, or more ecstatic prayers, is a refinement that the great Teacher of all righteousness knew nothing of. In the course of his preaching, he spared not to tell the Jews freely of all the corruptions that, in his time, they had run into: and therefore had it been contrary to the will of God, to use set forms of prayer in his public service, or had it been displeasing to him to be addressed in such mean forms, when much better might have been made, we may be sure he would have told them both, and joined with them in neither: but since he never found fault with them for using set forms, but, on the contrary, he taught his own disciples a set form to pray by, since he no where expressed a dislike of the forms then in use, upon account of their meanness, but, on the contrary, testified his approbation of them, by joining with them in their synagogues; this should convince our separatists, one would think, that neither our using set forms of prayer in our public worship, nor the using of such as they think not sufficiently edifying, can be objections sufficient to justify them in their refusal to join with us in them, because in both these cases they have the example of Christ directly against them.

The truth is, whether there be a form or no form, or whether the form be elegantly or meanly composed; nothing of this availeth to the recommending of our prayers unto God. It is the true and sincere devotion of the heart alone, that can make them acceptable unto him: for it is this only that gives life and vigour, and a true acceptance, to all our religious addresses. Without this, how elegantly, how movingly, soever the prayer may be composed, and how fervently, how zealously, soever it may seem to be poured out, yet all this is dead matter, and of no validity in the presence of our God. But, on the contrary, the very heathens can tell us, that, be our prayers and oblations ever so mean, they will be a ‘sacrifice of a sweet smelling savour’ unto him, if wo

CHAP. I.—From the Death of Nehemiah, to the Death of Antiochus Epiphanes.

THE HISTORY.

MANASSEH, as Josephus calls him, (for we have now left the sacred history, and have nothing but the books of the Maccabees, Philo Judæus, and Josephus, with some fragments of the Greek and Latin writers, to depend on,) being expelled from Jerusalem, with several others, who would not submit to Nehemiah’s order for their parting with their idolatrous wives, went to Samaria, as we said before, and there put himself under the protection of Sanballat, his father-in-law; who, applying to Darius Nothus, the then king of Persia, did so far insinuate himself into his favour, as to obtain a grant for the building of a temple on Mount Gerizim, near Samaria, and for making Manasseh, his son-in-law, the high priest of it.^a

^a On the supposition that Nehemiah returned to Judea in the latter part of the reign of Darius Nothus, it is easy to see what gave occasion to the mistake of Josephus, who assigns Sanballat, the chief of the Samaritans, contemporary with Nehemiah, to the reign of Darius Codomannus; and makes Manasseh, the son of Joiada and son-in-law of Sanballat, the son of the high priest Jaddua. Misled by the similarity of the names, he confounded Darius Nothus with Darius Codomannus; and this is not at all surprising, for Josephus in his Antiquities treats of this period very negligently, and has fallen into numerous errors. The more modern Jews were very ignorant of the later periods of Persian history. If we correct this oversight of Josephus, it will no longer be necessary to maintain the very improbable assumption, that there were two chiefs of the Samaritans of the name of Sanballat, separated from each other by a century, (B. C. 431 and 331,) each of whom had a daughter married to a fugitive son of the Jewish high priest. There was but one Sanballat, chief of the Samaritans, whose daughter was married to a son of the high priest Joiada, and that about the year B. C. 408. That important historical fact, therefore, which Josephus has placed in the reign of Darius Codomannus, properly belongs to the last years of Darius Nothus. It was from this last mentioned monarch that Sanballat obtained permission to build a temple for the Samaritans on mount Gerizim. This chief had distinguished himself, perhaps by his alacrity in furnishing with provisions the army destined for Egypt; and having thus ingratiated himself with the king, his request was the more readily granted. In this temple Manasseh the son of the high priest Joiada, whom Nehemiah had expelled from Judea on account of his connexion with the daughter of Sanballat, was appointed high priest. Afterwards, according to the testimony of Josephus, these Jews, who in their own country had been guilty of criminal offences, or who from any cause became dissatisfied, took refuge in Samaria. By means of these emigrants the Samaritans were recalled from idolatry, and brought to worship J-hovah alone. But this circumstance, far from allaying the enmity between the two nations, tended rather to increase it, at least on the part of the Jews, to whom this temple, built after the year B. C. 408, and the reception of fugitive Jews, was a constant source of provocation. In this manner every thing falls naturally and without violence into its proper order of time, and the succession of the high priests, (Neh. xii. 10, 11,) is completely reconciled with history. For though this table was evidently completed by a later hand, this circumstance alone, without other reasons, cannot prove it incorrect. And no such other proof of its incorrectness now remains: for if Joiada entered on the priest-

The Samaritans^b were originally the Cutheans, and such other of the eastern nations, as Esarhaddon, after the deportation of the Israelites, planted there; but after this temple was built, and Samaria became a common refuge for all refractory Jews, this mixture of inhabitants in a short time produced a change in religion. For whereas they had hitherto worshipped the God of Israel, in conjunction with the gods of the east, from whence they came, when once the Jewish worship came to be settled among them, and the book of the law of Moses to be read publicly, they conformed themselves wholly to the worship of the true God, and in their performance of this were as exact as the Jews themselves. The Jews, however, looking on them as apostates, hated them to such a degree, as to avoid all manner of converse and communication with them. This hatred first began from the malice which the Samaritans expressed against them, both in the rebuilding of their temple, and in the repairing the walls of their city. It was afterwards much increased by the apostasy of Manasseh, and his setting up an altar and temple, in opposition to those at Jerusalem; and it was all along kept up, on account of some particular tenets wherein the two nations were hood B. C. 412, there are for the eighty years which intervene during this period and the time of Alexander, three high priests, namely, Joiada, Jonathian or Johanan (John) and Jaddua; and it is known that Jaddua was very aged when Alexander visited Jerusalem. It is accordingly no longer necessary to assume, without evidence, that there were two high priests of the name of Jaddua, one at the time of Nehemiah, and a second in the days of Alexander.—Jahn’s Hebrew Commonwealth.—Ed.

^b If we believe their chronicle, which they tell us is of great antiquity, though others who have examined it, will not allow it to be as old as Constantine’s days, they give us an account of their origin quite different from what we gather from sacred writ. They pretend to be descended from Joseph by Ephraim, in a direct line; and that when Joshua entered into the promised land, he caused a temple to be built upon Mount Gerizim, and appointed one Buz of the seed of Aaron, to officiate as high priest, from whom they have an exact genealogy, and uninterrupted succession ever since. They neither own Jeroboam’s schism, nor the transmigration of the ten tribes, but give this account of their leaving their country, and returning to it again:—That when the kings of Jerusalem and Syria had revolted against Bachtmezzar, so they called Nebuchadnezzar, he came with an army and took Jerusalem, and thence marching to the Shechemites, for that is the name they give themselves, ordered them to leave their country in seven days, upon pain of military execution, which they readily did: that when he sent Persians to inhabit the cities which they had left, they could not live there, because the fruits which seemed fair to the eye, were tainted with poison, and so destroyed them: that upon complaints of this, the king consulted with some of the ancient inhabitants of these provinces, who informed him that the only remedy was to send the Hebrews back again into their own country, which when he consented to, a place was appointed for their general rendezvous; that when they came to this place a dispute arose between them, whether they should go and rebuild the temple of Jerusalem, or that of Gerizim, and when Zerubbabel was for the former, and Sanballat for the latter, each pleading the sanction of the Pentateuch, and each pretending that the copy of his opponent was corrupt, they resolved to end the controversy by a fiery trial: that Zerubbabel’s copy being thrown into the fire, was immediately consumed, but that Sanballat’s endured the flames three times together, and received no manner of harm; whereupon the king honoured the Shechemites with rich presents, and sent Sanballat as the head of the ten tribes, to take possession of Mount Gerizim. But who sees not that this whole history, full of falsities and absurdities as it is, was only invented to wipe off the shame and disgrace of the Samaritans, for being the offspring of proselytes, and a medley of foreign nations?—Bausnage’s History of the Jews, b. ii. c. 1, and Universal History, b. ii. c. 1.

known to disagree. For the Samaritans received no other Scriptures than the five books of Moses; they rejected all traditions, and adhered only to the written word itself; and they maintained, that Mount Gerizim, ^a whereon their temple was built, was the only proper place for the worship of God; and from this variety of causes did ensue all the hatred and virulence, which, in the course of this history, we shall have but too frequent occasion to take notice of.

After the death of Nehemiah, who was the last governor that the kings of Persia sent to Jerusalem, Judea being added to the prefecture of Syria, was from thenceforward subjected to the rulers of that province; and under them the administration of all public affairs, both civil and ecclesiastical, was committed to the high priest, which made that office much more coveted than it used to be, and many times tempted those who had no right to it, to invade it.

Upon the death of Darius Nothus, Artaxerxes, who for his extraordinary memory, is by the Greeks called the remembrancer, succeeded his father in the throne of Persia; ^b and towards the latter end of his reign,

^a Josephus, in his Jewish Antiquities, (b. xiii. c. 6,) relates a dispute, which arose in Egypt, in the reign of Ptolemy Philopater, between the Jews and Samaritans, concerning their temples. The Samaritans maintained, that their temple upon Mount Gerizim was the only true temple of the Lord; and the Jews on the contrary affirmed that theirs at Jerusalem was the only true one. The dispute was brought before the king; advocates on both sides were named: and it was agreed, that they who did not make their allegations good, should be condemned to death. Both parties promised that they would produce all their testimonies from the law only. Andronicus, advocate for the Jews, spake first, and proved so very evidently from the Scriptures, the antiquity of the temple of Jerusalem, the succession of the high priests, and the value which the Asiatic princes always had for that holy place, while at the same time they never so much as thought of the temple at Gerizim, that the king and his assessors, declared he had carried his cause, and ordered Sabbaeus and Theodosius, the advocates for the Samaritans, to be put to death. Whether there be any reality in this account of Josephus or no, it is certain that the Samaritans, on behalf of Mount Gerizim, have to plead,—That there Abraham, (Gen. xii. 6, 7, and xiii. 4,) and there Jacob, (Gen. xxxiii. 20,) built altars unto God, and by their offering up sacrifices thereon consecrated that place above all others to his worship; that for this reason God himself appointed it (Deut. xxvii. 12,) to be the hill of blessing; and that accordingly Joshua on his entrance upon the land of Canaan, caused the blessings of God, to such as would observe his laws, from hence to be pronounced; and, lastly, that when he passed the Jordan, he built here an altar of the twelve stones, which he took out of the river in his passage, (Deut. xxviii. 2—7,) according to what God had commanded him by Moses. But herein the Samaritans are guilty of a great prevarication; for they have changed the words in the text of Deuteronomy, and instead of Mount Ebal, as it is in the original, have put Mount Gerizim, the better to serve their cause. The truth of the matter is, since Manasseh was resolved to make a schism in the Jewish church, and Sanballat to build a temple for him, the reasons above mentioned might be inducement enough for them to make choice of that place, rather than any other; but from thence to pretend to vie with the temple at Jerusalem, is highly arrogant; because the Jews have authentic testimonies, that the public exercise of the true religion was settled among them, and solemnized at Jerusalem long before this temple at Gerizim was thought of. In short, the religious observances of the Jewish worship did always attend the ark of the covenant, but the ark was never once at Gerizim, nor indeed was it fixed in any settled place, until David took it to his palace at Jerusalem, and Solomon had built a temple for it in the same city.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 409, and Calmel's Dictionary under the word Gerizim.

^b Artaxerxes the second, surnamed Mnemon, also called made Bagoses governor of Syria and Phœnicia, who took upon him to confer the pontificate, even while Johanan the high priest, who had been several years invested with it, was alive, upon the high priest's brother Joshua, and who accordingly came with this grant to Jerusalem, in order to take possession of the office. ¹ But while the one endeavoured by force to get possession, and the other by force to keep him from it, it so happened, that Johanan slew Joshua in the inner court of the temple; which, when Bagoses heard, he came in great wrath to Jerusalem; went into the temple, notwithstanding the remonstrances that were made against it; and, having taken a thorough cognizance of the fact, imposed a mulct for the punishment of it, and obliged the priests to pay, out of the public treasury, for every lamb that they offered in the daily sacrifice, ^c the sum

Arsaces, ascended the throne on the death of his father, notwithstanding the exertions of his mother Parysatis to secure the succession to her younger son Cyrus. Though at the commencement of his reign he permitted his queen Statira to be guilty of an act of the most horrid cruelty, and generally yielded too far to the wickedness of his mother, he was on the whole a just and magnanimous prince. He pardoned his brother Cyrus, who, on the information of Tissaphernes, was detected in an attempt to assassinate him at his coronation, and even reinstated him in his government of Asia Minor. But Cyrus was so little affected by his brother's generosity, that he now determined on accomplishing his object by open rebellion. Under pretence of making war upon Thrace, and afterwards upon Tissaphernes, he levied a powerful army, and was powerfully supported by the Lacedæmonians, whom he had assisted with money in the Peloponnesian war. Clearchus, a Lacedæmonian general joined his forces, already consisting of 100,000 men of various nations, with a body of 13,000 Greeks. With these forces Cyrus marched to Babylon, B. C. 401, the same year in which Socrates was put to death. Artaxerxes, who had been seasonably informed of the revolt by Tissaphernes, came against him with an army of 900,000 men. They engaged in a bloody battle at the village of Cunaxa, which was situated about thirty English miles south of Babylon, between the Tigris and Euphrates. The 13,000 Greeks had already half gained the victory, when Cyrus, pressing on too zealously against his brother, when he wounded, was himself slain by the royal guards. This expedition, and particularly the astonishing retreat of the 10,000 surviving Greeks by a route of more than eighteen hundred English miles, have been described by Xenophon, the eye-witness and director of that achievement.—Jahn's Hebrew Commonwealth.—Ed.

^c This, if extended only to the ordinary sacrifices which were offered every day, amounted to 365,000 drachms for the whole year, which is no more than one thousand one hundred and forty pounds twelve shillings and sixpence of our money; but, if it extended also to the extraordinary sacrifices, which on solemn days, when added to the ordinary, it will come to about half as much more. For the ordinary sacrifices, which were offered every day, and therefore called 'the daily sacrifices,' were a lamb in the morning and another in the evening, which are called 'the morning and evening sacrifices;' and these, in the whole year, came to seven hundred and thirty. But, besides these, there were added, on every sabbath, two lambs more, (Numb. xxviii. 9, 10;) on every new moon, seven, (Numb. xxviii. 11;) on each of the seven days of the paschal solemnity, seven, (Numb. xxviii. 16—21;) besides one more on the second day, when the wave-sheaf, was offered, (Lev. xxiii. 12;) on the day of Pentecost, seven, (ver. 17, 18;) on the feast of trumpets, seven, (Numb. xxviii. 27; on the great day of expiation, seven, (chap. xxix. 8;) on each of the seven days of the feast of tabernacles, fourteen, (chap. xxix. 13;) and on the eighth day, seven, (Numb. xxix. 36;) so that the additional lambs being three hundred seventy and one, these, if reckoned to the other, make the whole number annually offered at the morning and evening sacrifices, to be eleven hundred and one; and therefore, if the mulct of fifty drachms a lamb were paid for them all, it would make the whole of it to amount to 55,050 drachms, which comes to seven-hundred and twenty pounds six shillings and threepence of

of fifty drachms, which is about one pound eleven shillings and three pence of our money.

After the death of Artaxerxes Μητρώου, Ochus succeeded his father, but obtained the crown ^a by very wicked and indirect means. He reigned, however, for one and twenty years, after which ^b he was poisoned by his favourite eunuch ^c Bagoas, who put the crown upon the head of Arses, his youngest son; but, in a short time, dispatched him likewise, and made Codomannus ^d (one of the same family, but at some distance, and who, upon his accession, took the name of Darius) king of Persia.

In the third year of the reign of Ochus, about 356 years before the birth of Christ, Alexander the Great, who overthrew the Persian empire, was born at Pella in Macedonia. His father Philip had been chosen captain-general of all Greece, which, at this time, made a very considerable figure in history, for carrying on the war against Persia; but when he was just ready to set forward upon that expedition, ^e he was slain at home, while he was celebrating the marriage of Cleopatra his daughter with Alexander king of Epirus.

Upon his death, Alexander his son succeeded him in the kingdom of Macedon, when he was twenty years old; and ^f having been chosen, as his father was, to command the Grecian forces against Persia, he took the field, and in one campaign only, overran almost all Asia Minor; vanquished Darius in two pitched battles; took his mother, wife, and children prisoners; and, having subdued all Syria, came to Tyre; but there he our money. But even this sum being too small for a national mulet, it seems most probable, that all the lambs which were offered in the temple in any sacrifice, and upon any account whatever, were taken into the reckoning. We may observe, however, that whatever this mulet was, the payment of it lasted no longer than seven years; for, on the death of Artaxerxes, the changes and revolutions which then happened in the empire, made a change in the government of Syria, and he that succeeded Bagoas in that province no farther exacted it.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 356.

^a Artaxerxes, when he died, left three sons, Ariaspes, Ochus, and Arsames; Ariaspes was an easy credulous prince; and therefore Ochus so terrified him with menaces, which he pretended came from his father, that for fear of being put to death, he poisoned himself. Arsames he caused to be assassinated by Harpates; and this loss, added to the other, so overwhelmed the old king with grief, that he broke his heart and died.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 359.

^b This eunuch having poisoned both Ochus and his son Arses, set the crown upon Darius's head; but, finding that he would not answer his purpose, in permitting him to govern all in his name, which was the thing he aimed at in his advancement, he was resolved to have removed him, in the same manner as he had done his predecessors; and accordingly had provided a poisonous potion for him. But Darius, being advised of the design, when the potion was brought to him, made him drink it all himself, and so got rid of the traitor by his own artifice.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 335.

^c The occasion of his death is said to be this:—Pausanias, a young noble Macedonian, and one of his guards, having had his body forced, and seditiously abused by Attalus the chief of the king's courtiers, had often complained to Philip of the injury; but, finding no redress, he turned his revenge from the author of the injury upon him who refused to do him justice for it, and slew him as he was passing in great state to the theatre, having the images of the twelve gods and goddesses, and his own in the same pompous habit, carried before him. Hereby he arrogated to himself the honour of a god; but being slain as soon as his image entered the theatre, he gave a signal proof that he was no more than a mere mortal man.—Justin, b. ix., Diodor. Sicul. b. xvi.

met with a stop; for the Tyrians, ^d in confidence of the strength of the place, and of assistance from their allies, when he would have entered the city, denied him admittance.

While his army was besieging Tyre, he sent out his commissioners, requiring the inhabitants of the neighbouring countries, namely, of Galilee, Samaria, and Judea, to submit to him, and to furnish him with what he wanted. Other provinces complied; but the Jews, pleading their oath to Darius, by which they thought themselves bound not to acknowledge any new master so long as he was alive, refused to obey his commands. This exasperated the conqueror not a little, who, ^e in the flush of his many successes, could bear no contradiction; and therefore, as soon as he had done with Tyre, ^f he marched directly against Jerusalem.

^d No sooner was he chosen general of all the Grecian cities confederated against the Persian empire, but he subdued the Tyrians and Triballians in Thrace; and, upon his return, took Thebes, that had revolted from the confederacy, and razed it to the ground. After this, setting out upon the Persian expedition, he vanquished Darius near the Granicus; and after the action, took Sardis, Ephesus, Miletum, and Halicarnassus, the next year he made himself master of all Phrygia, Lycia, Pamphylia, Pisidia, Paphlagonia, and Cappadocia. The next year he gave Darius a second defeat (and a terrible one it was) at Issus, took his mother, wife, two daughters, and a young son, prisoners; seized Damascus, and in it immense riches; subdued in short, all Syria, Cœlo-Syria, and Phœnicia: for every place yielded to him, none pretending to make any resistance till he came to Tyre.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 333.

^e As soon as he had taken the town, he burned it down to the ground, and destroyed and enslaved all the inhabitants. Eight thousand he slew in the sackage of the town, and two thousand of those whom he took prisoners he caused to be crucified, a piece of cruelty this highly unbecoming a generous conqueror. But, to palliate the matter, he gave out, that it was done by way of just revenge upon them, for their murdering their masters, and that, being originally but slaves, crucifixion was the proper punishment for them. But this depended upon an old story. Some ages before, the slaves of Tyre, having made a conspiracy against their masters, murdered them all in one night, (except only Strato, whom his slave secretly saved) and having married their mistresses, continued masters of the town, and from them the present Tyrians were descended. So that Alexander pretended, on this occasion, to revenge on them the murder that was committed by their progenitors so many ages before, though, in reality, it was to gratify his rage for being so long detained before the place, and there so valiantly resisted. Recovering, however, its beauty and riches again, it was invested with the privileges of a Roman city for its fidelity, and in the flourishing times of Christianity was distinguished as the first archbishopric under the patriarchate of Jerusalem. It shared the fate of the country in the Saracen invasion, in the beginning of the seventh century. It was reconquered by the crusaders in the twelfth, and formed a royal domain of the kingdom of Jerusalem, as well as an archiepiscopal see. William of Tyre, the well-known historian, an Englishman, was the first archbishop. In 1289, it was retaken by the Saracens, the Christians being permitted to remove with their effects. When the Sultan Selim divided Syria into pacha-lies, Tyre, which had probably gone into decay with the depression of commerce, was merged in the territory of Sidon. In 1766, it was taken possession of by the Moutualies, who repaired the port, and enclosed it on the land side with a wall twenty feet high. This wall was standing at the time of Volney's visit (1784). It was a miserable village: its exports consisted of a few sacks of corn and cotton, and the only merchant of which it could boast was a solitary Greek, in the service of the French factory at Sidon, who could hardly gain a livelihood. It is only within the last five and twenty years that it has once more begun to lift its head from the dirt.—See page 343.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 333; Maunder's Journey from Aleppo to Jerusalem, and Wood, Traveller.

Jaddua, next day, with the priests and people, habited in the manner directed, went out of the city to a certain eminence, which commanded the prospect of all the country round, and there waited the coming of Alexander. As soon as the high priest saw him at some distance, he moved towards him in this solemn pomp; which struck the king with such an awe, that, as he drew near, he bowed down to him, and saluted him with a religious veneration, to the great surprise of all that attended him.

While every one stood amazed at this behaviour, Parmenio, his first favourite, took the freedom to ask him, how it came to pass, that he whom all mankind adored, paid such adoration to the Jewish high priest? To which his reply was, "That he did not pay that adoration to him, but to the God whose high priest he was; that while he was at Dio in Macedonia, and deliberating with himself how to carry on the war with Persia, that very person, and in that very habit, appeared to him in a dream, encouraging him to pass boldly over into Asia, and not to doubt of success, because God would be his guide in the expedition, and give him the empire of the Persians; and that therefore from hence he was assured that he made the present war under the conduct of that God to whom in the person of this high priest, he paid adoration." And hereupon, turning to Jaddua again, he embraced him very kindly: and so, going into the city with him, offered sacrifices to God, in the temple, where the high priest showed him the prophecies of Daniel, ^a predicting the overthrow of the Persian empire by a Grecian king, which he applied to himself, and thereby confirmed his opinion that God had chosen him to execute this great work.

When he left Jerusalem, he offered to grant the people whatever immunities the high priest should desire; but he requested no more than a toleration to live according to their own laws and religion, and an exemption from the payment of tribute every seventh year, because on the sabbatical year the Jews were forbidden to till their ground. This he readily consented to, and having signified his pleasure, that if any of them were minded to list in his troops, he would readily receive them, great multitudes did hereupon offer their service, and followed him in his other expeditions.

of him, that he would likewise honour their city and temple with his presence. "He was then hastening to Egypt, he told them, but that when he returned, if his affairs would permit him, he would not fail to comply with their desires: and when they requested of him an immunity from all taxes every seventh year, because they, as well as the Jews, did every seventh year suffer their land to lie fallow, he asked them if they were Jews, because to them only he had granted that privilege. Their answer was, that they were Hebrews, but that the Phœnicians called them Sichemites: whereupon, having no leisure to make any farther inquiry into the matter, he referred this likewise to his return, when he promised to examine into their pretensions, and to do them justice; but before his return, they had done enough to incense him against them.

On his going from these parts into Egypt, he had made Andromachus, a special favourite of his, governor of Syria and Palestine; who ³ coming to Samaria, in order to settle some affairs, was burnt to death in his house, which the people set on fire, out of rage and discontent, very probably, that the privileges, which were granted to their enemies the Jews, were denied to them. This barbarous action exasperated Alexander not a little; inasmuch that, having caused those who had acted any part in the murder of the governor to be put to death, he drove all the rest of the inhabitants out of Samaria, planted therein a colony of Macedonians, and gave the rest of their territories to the Jews.

After the death of Alexander, ^b who did not long sur-

^b It is not well agreed among historians, how this great conqueror of the world died. Some of them are of opinion, that he was poisoned by the procurement of Antipater, whom he had left governor of all his dominions in his absence, and who, for his mal-administration, had been lately dismissed; and, therefore, fearing to be called to an account, did, by the hands of his sons, who were about the person of the king, and one of them his cupbearer, execute this treason upon his master's life, in order to save his own; but in the judgment of other historians he died by nothing but excessive drinking; and thus they relate the story. "One day after he had been sacrificing to the gods for the many victories which he had obtained, he made an entertainment for his friends, wherein he drank very hard, and continued the debauch till late at night; when returning from the feast he and his company were invited by a physician of Thes-salia to come and drink a little more at his house. Alexander accepted of the offer; and, as there were twenty in company, he first drank to each of them in their order, and so pledged them again, and then called for the Herculean cup. There was in company one Prodeas, a Macedonian, but a terrible drinker, and to him the king drank this Herculean brimful, which they tell us held six of our quarts, and not long after pledged him in the same; but immediately after the second cup he dropped down upon the place, and then fell into a violent fever, of which he died, in the thirty-third year of his age, after a reign of twelve years, six years as king of Macedon, and six more as monarch of Asia." He was a man of a bold enterprising spirit, but fuller of fire than discretion. His actions, though they were attended with success, were carried on with a furious and extravagant rashness; and the few virtues that he had were obscured with much greater vices. Vain-glory was the predominant passion of his soul; and the fables of the ancient Greek heroes, the only chart by which he steered his conduct. This was the reason that he dragged Betis round the walls of Gaza, in the same manner as Achilles had used Hector; that he undertook that hazardous expedition into India, as Hercules had done before him; that he made a drunken procession through Caramania, because Bacchus is said to have done the like in the same place; and that he affected to be called the son of Jupiter, because most of the vive the unfortunate Darius, ^a the Grecian or Macedonian empire, for so it was now become, was divided among the chief commanders of his army, who soon fell to leaguings and fighting against each other, till after some years they were all destroyed, except four, and these agreed to make a partition of the whole among themselves, and so cantoned it into four kingdoms, though all this while Aridaus, ^b a bastard brother of Alexander's, that took upon him the name of Philip, and after him Alexander Ægus, his own son by his wife Roxana, bore both of them the title of kings.

In this division, Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, whom the Greeks call Soter, having taken possession of Egypt, thought that the provinces of Syria, Phœnicia, and Judea, would be an excellent barrier for him; and therefore ancient heroes pretended, that they had for their fathers one god or other. The truth is, this young conqueror, having the Iliad of Homer in great admiration, always carried them with him, laid them under his pillow when he slept, and read in them on all leisure opportunities; and therefore finding Achilles to be the great hero in that poem, he thought every thing said of him worthy of imitation, and the readiest way to become a hero himself, which was the main impulsive cause of all his undertakings; but in reality, were actions to be duly estimated, he could deserve no other character than that of the great cut-throat of the age in which he lived. The folly of mankind, however, and the error of historians is such, that they usually make the actions of war, bloodshed, and conquest, the subjects of their highest encomiums, and those their most celebrated heroes that most excel in these; whereas those only are the true heroes, who most benefit the world, by promoting the peace and welfare of mankind. In a righteous cause indeed, and the just defence of a man's country, all actions of valour are just reasons of praise; but in all other cases victory and conquest are no more than murder and rapine, and those who thus oppress the world with the slaughter of man, the desolation of countries, the burning of cities, and the other calamities which attend war, are the scourges of God, the Attilas of the age in which they live, and the greatest plagues and calamities that happen to it; and therefore to make these the subject of praise and panegyric, is to lay ill examples before princes, as it such oppressions of mankind were the truest ways to honour and glory.—Diod. Sic. b. xvii; Arrian. b. vii; Justin. b. xii; Quin. Curt. b. x; Plutarch. in Alexandro; and Prideaux's Connection, anno 328, and 332.

^a After the battle of Arbela, wherein he was sore discomfited, he made his escape into Media, and having got some few forces together, thought to have tried his fate in one battle more; when Bessus, his governor of Bactria, and Nabazanes, another Persian nobleman, conspired together; and having seized the poor king, and made him their prisoner, put him in chains, and shut him up in a close cart, and so carried him with them towards Bactria, intending, if Alexander pursued them to purchase their peace by delivering him up into his hands; but if he did not, to kill him, and seize his kingdom, and so renew the war. Alexander having heard what these traitors had done, made all the haste he could to rescue Darius out of their hands; but when, after several days' march, he came up with them, (because Darius refused to mount on horseback, for his more speedy flight with them,) they gave him several mortal wounds, and left him dying in the cart. He was dead before Alexander came; but when he saw his corpse, he could not forbear shedding tears at so melancholy a spectacle: and having cast his cloak over it, he ordered that it should be wrapped up therein, and carried to his mother Sisymbria, at Sinushan, where he had left her with the other captive ladies, to be buried there with a royal funeral, for which himself allowed the expense, in the sepulchres of the kings of Persia.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 330.

^b Aridaus, with his wife Eurydice, was put to death by Olympias, the mother of Alexander the Great, after he had borne the title of king for six years and seven months; and Alexander Ægus, with his mother Roxana, after a long imprisonment in the castle of Amphipolis, was, in like manner, murdered by Cassander, to make way for himself to the crown of Macedon.

² The Jews, however, for some time, stood out against him, and upon account of the oath they had taken to the deposed governor, refused to submit to his authority. Hereupon he marched into Judea, and, having got possession of most of the country, laid siege to Jerusalem. The place was strong enough, both by nature and art, to have made a considerable defence against him; but the Jews had then such a superstitious notion for the observance of the sabbath, that they thought it a breach of their law, even to defend themselves on it: which when Ptolemy understood, he made choice of that day to storm the place, and in the assault took it, because there were none that would defend the walls against him. At first he dealt hardly with the inhabitants, and carried above an hundred thousand of them captives into Egypt; but afterwards, considering how faithful they had been to their former governors, he employed them in his army and garrisons, and granted them large immunities and privileges; whereupon the whole nation of the Jews became subject to the power and dominion of the kings of Egypt.

In the fifth year of this Ptolemy's reign, Onias the Jewish high priest, died, and was succeeded by Simon his son, who, from the holiness of his life, and the great righteousness which shone forth in all his actions, was called 'Simon the Just.' He continued in his office for nine years, in which time he did many beneficial acts ^c both in the church and state of the Jews; but what is chiefly commemorated of him, is his completing the canon of the Scriptures of the Old Testament. What Ezra, ³ and the men of the great synagogue, who, as some say, assisted him, did in this work, we have taken sufficient notice of before. The books of Ezra, Nehemiah, Esther, and Malachi, as well as the two Chronicles of the kings of Judah and Israel, could not possibly be inserted by Ezra himself, because some of these books claim him for their author and in others

^c The commendation which the author of Ecclesiasticus gives of this high priest, is thus expressed:—'He, in his lifetime, repaired the house again, and in his days fortified the temple. By him was built from the foundation, the double height, the high fortress of the wall above the temple. In his days, the cistern to receive water, being in compass as the sea, was covered with plates of brass. He took care of the temple that it should not fall, and fortified the city against besieging. How was he honoured amidst the people, in his coming out of the sanctuary? He was as the morning star in the midst of a cloud, and as the moon at the full, or the sun shining upon the temple of the Most High, and as a rainbow giving light in the bright clouds:—When he put on the robe of honour, and was clothed with the perfection of glory, and when he went up to the holy altar, he made the garments of holiness honourable.'—Eccus. b. i. ii. &c.

there are some particulars which refer to times as low as Alexander the Great, and therefore a later time must be assigned for their reception into the canon. And if so, there seems to be none so proper as that when the men of the great synagogue, who, under the direction and presidency of Simon the Just, were employed in this work, ceased to be.

Simon was succeeded in the pontificate by his brother Eleazar, (for his son Onias was but a minor when he died); and, upon the death of Ptolemy Soter, his son Ptolemy Philadelphus succeeded in the throne of Egypt, and pursued his father's example in continuing the museum, ^a or college of learned men, which he had erected, and in augmenting the noble library ^b which he had left behind him at Alexandria. To this purpose, hearing that the Jews had among them a famous book, namely, the book of their law, which well deserved a place among his collection, he sent to Eleazar ^c the high

^a This was a large edifice in Alexandria, which stood in that quarter of the city called Brachium, and was designed for the habitation of such learned men as made it their study to improve philosophy, and all useful knowledge, like that of the Royal Society at London, and the Royal Academy of Sciences at Paris. This building, which was not far distant from the palace, was surrounded with a portico or piazza, where the philosophers walked and conversed, and had in it a common hall, where they used to eat together. The members of this society were under the government of a president, whose office was of that consideration and dignity, that, during the reign of the Ptolemies, he was always constituted by those kings, and afterwards by the Roman emperors. The revenues appointed for the maintenance of this college, from the first foundation of it, were large. From it did proceed men of very excellent literature; and to it was owing, that Alexandria, for a great many ages together, was the greatest school of learning in all those parts of the world; until, in the war which the Alexandrians had with Aurelian the Roman emperor, all that quarter of the city where the museum stood was destroyed, and with it this college of learned men dissolved.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 285.

^b This library was at first placed in the museum; but, when it was filled with books to the number of 400,000 volumes, there was another library erected within the Serapeum, or the famous temple where the image of Serapis was set up, which increased in time to the number of 300,000 volumes, and the two put together made up the number of 700,000 volumes in the whole, of which the royal libraries of the Ptolemaic kings at Alexandria are said to consist. Their manner of collecting them was not so very honourable; for whatever books were brought by any foreigner into Egypt, these they seized, and sending them to the museum, where they maintained people for that purpose, they caused them to be transcribed, and then sent the copies to the owners, but laid up the originals in the library. When Julius Cæsar waged war with the Alexandrians, it so happened, that the library in the Brachium was burned, and the 400,000 volumes that were laid up there were all consumed. But that of the Serapeum still remained, and soon grew to be larger, and of more eminent note than the former; but at length, in the year of our Lord 642, when the Saracens made themselves masters of the city, they totally destroyed it. For, when the general of the army wrote to Omar, who was then the caliph or emperor of the Saracens, to know his pleasure concerning it, his answer was, "that if these books contained what was agreeing with the Alcoran, there was no need of them, because the Alcoran alone was sufficient for all truth; but if they contained what was disagreeing with it, they were not to be endured;" and therefore he ordered, that whatsoever the contents of them were, they should all be destroyed.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 285.

^c Josephus hath given us both Ptolemy's letter to Eleazar, and Eleazar's answer at large; but whether these pieces are genuine or no, is a matter of some dispute among the learned. They are too long, however, to be here inserted; but the substance of the letter is,—“That both Ptolemy and his father had been extremely kind to the Jews; his father, in placing them in offices of trust; and himself, in redeeming great numbers of priest, to desire an authentic copy of it: and, because it was written in a language that he did not understand, he desired him, at the same time, to send a competent number of learned men, well versed in both the Hebrew and Greek tongues, who, out of the former, might translate it for him unto the latter. This Eleazar failed not to do; and, from the joint labours of the LXX. or rather LXXII. translators, that were employed in the work, the version has ever since gone under the name of the Septuagint: but of this piece of history we have already had occasion to say what we thought sufficient, towards the conclusion of our ^d apparatus.

After the death of Ptolemy Philadelphus, ^e his son Euergetes came to the crown of Egypt, and Onias succeeded his uncle, though not immediately, in the pontificate. He was the son of Simon the Just; but in many things, the very reverse of his father. At the best he was but a weak and inconsiderate man; ¹ but being now grown very old, and very covetous, he took no care to pay Ptolemy Euergetes the annual tribute of twenty talents, which his predecessors used to do; so that, when the arrears were swelled to a large sum, the king sent one Athenion, an officer of his court, to Jerusalem, to demand the full payment of the money, upon peril of having an army sent among them to dispossess them of their country.

² Onias had a nephew by his sister's side, whose

them from slavery, and employing several of them both in his court and camp; and that, as a farther testimony of his kindness to them, he proposed to make a translation of their law into the Greek language, for which he desired them to send a proper number of such men as he knew were qualified for the undertaking.³ In answer to which, Eleazar acknowledges the receipt of his most gracious letter, and of the valuable presents which he had sent; and, in return promises, that the people should not fail to pray to God daily for the protection of his person, and the prosperity of his royal family; and that, pursuant to his commands, he had sent an authentic copy of the law, and six men out of each tribe to assist in the translation of it.—Jewish Hist. b. xii. c. 2.

^d Those who would see more at large what are the opinions of learned men concerning the Septuagint, and the account which Aristæus gives of the manner in which it was done, may consult the critics who have expressly handled this matter, such as Scaliger, Usher, Walton, Frassen, Dupin, Valda, Hody, Calmet, Whiston, and Prideaux in his Connection, anno 277.

^e After the death of his beloved wife Arsinoë, Ptolemy did not long survive her: for, being of a tender constitution himself, and having farther weakened it by a luxurious indulgence, he could not bear the approach of age, or the grief of mind which he fell under upon this occasion; but, sinking under these burdens, he died, in the sixty-third year of his life, after he had reigned in Egypt thirty-eight years. As he was a learned prince, himself, and a great patron of learning, many of those who were eminent for any part of literature resorted to him from all parts, and partook of his favour and bounty. Seven celebrated poets of that age are said to have lived at his court: four of which, namely, Theocritus, Callimachus, Lycophron, and Aratus, have their works still remaining; and, among these, the first of them has a whole Idyllium, and the second, part of two hymns, written in his praise. Manetho, the Egyptian historian, dedicated his history to him; and Zoilus the scolding critic, came also to his court: but how great soever his wit was, he could never recommend himself to king Ptolemy, who hated him for the bitterness and ill-nature of it: and, for the same reason, having drawn on himself the odium and aversion of all men, he at length died miserably; for some say that he was stoned; others that he was burned to death; and others again, that he was crucified by king Ptolemy, for a crime that deserved that punishment.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 219.

name was Joseph, a young man of great reputation among the Jews, for prudence, justice, and sanctity of life. He, as soon as he heard of the message, which Athenion had brought, and of the people's great consternation thereupon, went immediately to his uncle, and severely upbraided him with his ill management of the public interest, who, for the lucre of a little money, had exposed the whole nation to such imminent danger, which now there was no way to avoid, as he told him, but by his going immediately to the Egyptian court, and, by a timely application to the king there, endeavouring to pacify his wrath.

The bare mentioning of a journey to Alexandria ^a so terrified the high priest, that upon his declaring, that he would quit his station both in church and state, rather than undertake it, Joseph offered, with his permission, and the people's approbation to go in his stead. In the mean time he took care to entertain Athenion at his own house, as long as he continued in Jerusalem, in a very splendid and magnificent manner: when he departed, he presented him with several very valuable gifts; and so sent him away in a good disposition, to make as favourable a representation to the king as the case would bear, until himself should come to the Egyptian court, in order to give him a full satisfaction.

Athenion was so taken with this prudent behaviour, and kind entertainment of Joseph, that when he came to give the king a report of his embassy, he could not but mention his name with pleasure; and when he told him of his intentions to come and wait upon him himself, he set forth his character with so much advantage, that the king expressed a desire to see him. In a short time Joseph set out for Alexandria; and falling in upon the road with several of the chief nobility of Cœlo-Syria and Phœnicia, whose business at court was to farm the royal revenues of these provinces, he joined company with them, and having learned from their discourse of what value these revenues were, he made use of that intelligence afterwards, both to his own and the king's advantage.

When they all arrived at Alexandria, the king was gone to Memphis; ^b so that Joseph made haste thither, and had the good fortune to meet him, the queen, and Athenion, all in the same chariot, returning to Alexandria. The king, upon Athenion's signifying who he was, called him into the chariot; and having mentioned his uncle's ill-usage, in not paying him his tribute, he was thereupon entertained with so handsome an apology for that neglect, which he chiefly imputed to his uncle's old age, and other infirmities, that he not only satisfied the king, but gave him withal so good an opinion of the advocate, that, when they came to Alexandria, he ordered him to be lodged in the palace, and entertained at his expense.

When the day of farming out the revenues to the best bidder was come, the Syrian and Phœnician noblemen, with whom Joseph had travelled to Alexandria, beat down their price, and would give no more for all the duties of Cœlo-Syria, Phœnicia, Judea, and Samaria, than eight thousand talents: but Joseph having found fault with them for undervaluing the king's revenues, offered to give twice as much, even exclusive of the forfeitures, which used before to belong to the farmers; and was thereupon admitted to be the king's receiver-general of all these provinces.

Upon the credit of this employment, he borrowed at Alexandria five hundred talents, wherewith he satisfied the king for his uncle's arrears; and having received a guard of two thousand men, to support him in the collection of the duties, he left Alexandria, and immediately entered upon it. In some places he met with opposition, and very opprobrious language; but having ordered the chief ringleaders to be seized, and exemplary justice to be executed upon them, he hereby so terrified the rest, that they readily paid him his demands without any molestation. And in this office he continued for the space of two and twenty years, under Ptolemy Euergetes, and

^a This city, which was built by Alexander the Great, A. M. 3673, was, after his death, made the capital of Egypt, by Ptolemy and his successors, for almost 300 years. Dinocrates, who rebuilt the temple of Diana at Ephesus, after it had been burned by Erostratus, was the architect who drew the plan of it, and had the chief direction of the work; but to have it carried on with more expedition, Alexander appointed Cleomenes, one of his captains to be the surveyor of it; and for this reason, Justin (b. xiii. c. 4.) calls him the founder of it. The happy situation of this city between the Mediterranean and the Red Sea, and upon the river Nile, drew thither the commerce of the east and west, and made it in a very little time one of the most flourishing cities in the world. It has still some small repute for merchandise; but what has occasioned the decay of its trade, is the discovery of the passage to the East Indies by the Cape of Good Hope, on the south of Africa. Before this discovery the whole spice trade was carried into this part of the world through this city; for the spices were brought from the East Indies, up the Red Sea to Egypt, and from thence were carried by land on camels to Alexandria. When Egypt became a province of the Roman empire, this city continued the metropolis of it, and when the Arabians took it, which was about 610 years after Christ, there were 4000 palaces still standing in it, 4000 bagnios, 40,000 Jews paying tribute, 100 squares, and 12,000 persons that sold herbs and fruits. Here, as we said, was the famous Serapeum, or temple of Serapis, for beauty of workmanship and magnificence of structure, inferior to nothing but the Roman capitol. Here was the museum, or college of philosophers; and here that noble library, which was erected by Ptolemy Philadelphus, but unhappily burned in the war between Cesar and Pompey, but notwithstanding all its former splendor and magnificence, this city is now become a poor village, by the Egyptians called Raehot, without any thing remarkable in it, except its ruins, and the remains of its former grandeur; only without the city, Pompey's pillar, the shaft whereof is six fathoms high, all of one piece of curious granite, is justly admired as one of the finest columns that is any where to be seen.—Cabnet's Dictionary under the word; and Wells's Geography of the New Testament.

^b This was a very famous city, and, till the time of the Ptolemies, who removed to Alexandria, the place of residence for the ancient kings of Egypt. It was situated above the parting of the river Nile, where the Delta begins. Towards the south of this city stood the famous pyramids, two of which were esteemed the wonders of the world; and, in this city, was fed the ox Apis, which Cambyses slew in contempt of the Egyptians worshipping it as a god. The kings of Egypt took great pleasure in adorning this city; and in all its beauty it continued, till the Arabians made a conquest of Egypt under the Caliph Omar. The general who took it built another city just by it, which was called Fustat, because his tent had been a long time set up in that place, and the Caliph's Fatamites, when they became masters of Egypt, added another to it, which is known to us at this day by the name of Grand Cairo. The Mameluke Sultans, of the dynasty of the Careassians, having afterwards built a strong fort on the eastern shore of the Nile, did, by degrees, annex a city to it, which came to be called the New Cairo, as what the Fatamites had built was called the Old; but it must be observed, that the ancient Memphis stood on the western shore of the Nile, whereas whatever the Arabians have there built, from time to time, is on the eastern shore of that river.—Cabnet's Dictionary, under the word.

Philopater his son, until Ptolemy Epiphanes, the son of Philopater lost these provinces to Antiochus the Great.

On the death of Ptolemy Euergetes his son Philopater (not without some suspicion of having poisoned his father) succeeded to the throne; and, in the fifth year of his reign, having, at Raphia, a town not far from Gaza, defeated the army of Antiochus the Great, he afterwards visited the cities which by this victory he had regained, among which Jerusalem was one. Here he took a view of the temple, gave valuable donatives to it, and offered up many sacrifices to the God of Israel; but, not being content with this view from the outer court, beyond which no Gentile was allowed to pass, he was for going into the sanctuary, nay, even into the holy of holies itself, where no one but the high priest (and that only on the great day of expiation) was allowed to enter. This made a great uproar all over the city. The high priest informed him of the sacredness of the place, and of the law of God, which forbade his entrance. The priests and Levites were gathered together to hinder it. The people did earnestly deprecate it; and great lamentations were every where made, upon the apprehension of the approaching profanation of their holy temple. But all to no purpose. The king, the more he was opposed, the more resolute he was to have his will satisfied, and, accordingly, pressed into the inner court; but as he was passing farther to go into the temple, he was seized with such a sudden terror and consternation of mind, that he was carried out of the place, in a manner half dead, and, in a short time, departed from Jerusalem, highly incensed against the whole nation of the Jews, and venting many bitter threatenings against them.

Nor was he forgetful to put his threats in execution. For no sooner was he returned to Alexandria, but he published a decree, and caused it to be engraven on a pillar erected at the gate of his palace, excluding every one who would not sacrifice to the god whom he worshipped, from having any access to him: degrading the Jews from the rights and privileges they had in the city; and ordering them all to come, and ¹ be stigmatised with the mark of an ivy leaf (the badge of his god Bacchus) by a hot iron impressed upon them, and, as many as refused to come, commanding them to be put to death.

Nor did his rage end here: for, being determined to extirpate the whole Jewish nation, as many at least as were in his dominions, he sent out orders to his officers, requiring them to bring all the Jews who lived any where in Egypt, bound in chains to Alexandria; and having shut them up in the Hippodrome, (a large place, without the city, where the people used to assemble to see horse-races, and other shows,) he proposed the next day to make a spectacle of them, by having them destroyed by his ^a elephants. The elephants, to make them more furious, were intoxicated with wine, mingled with frankincense: but the king, the night before, having sitten up late at a drunken carousal, overslept himself, so that the show was put off till the day following; and, the next night, having done the same again, the show, for the same cause, was put off to the third day. All this while the Jews, continuing shut up in the Hippodrome, ceased not with lifted up hands and voices, to pray unto God for their deliverance, which, accordingly, he vouchsafed them. For, on the third day, when the king was present, and the elephants were let loose, instead of falling upon the Jews, they turned all their rage upon those that came to see the show, and destroyed great numbers.

This wonderful interposal of providence, in the protection of these poor people, together with some strange appearances, at the same time, seen in the air, so terrified the king, and all the spectators, that he ordered all the Jews to be set free; restored them to their former privileges; revoked every decree that had been made against them, and, among other favours, indulged them with his liberty—even to put to death all those Jews, who, in fear of persecution, had apostatized from their religion, which accordingly they put in rigorous execution.

Upon the death of ^b Ptolemy Philopater, his son Ptolemy Epiphanes, a child but of five years old, succeeded him in the throne: but Antiochus the Great, taking the advantage of the young king's inability to oppose him, marched an army into Coelo-Syria and Palestine, and, in a very short time, made himself master of them. The Egyptians, however, under the command of Scapas their general, endeavoured to regain them, and had actually recovered Jerusalem into their possession; but, upon the approach of Antiochus in person, and the defeat which he gave them at Paneas, the Jews, who had been but badly used by Scapas, a very covetous and rapacious man, submitted to him very cheerfully; and receiving him and his army into the city, assisted him in the reduction of the castle, where Scapas had left a garrison. In acknowledgment of which services, he, by a public edict, granted them many favours, and, among the rest, a liberty to live according to their own laws and religion, and a power to prohibit any stranger to enter within the sept of the temple, alluding to the attempt which Philopater had lately made that way.

But Antiochus had greater things in view, than the subjection of a province or two; and therefore, to have more mad and furious. When they are thus irritated and inflamed, their strength is prodigious, and nothing can stand before them. Every creature that comes in their way, they trample under foot, overthrow whole squadrons, knock down trees, and demolish houses.—Calmel's Dictionary, under the word.

^b This Ptolemy was a man entirely given up to his lusts and voluptuous delights. Drinking, gaming, and lasciviousness, were the whole employments of his life. Agathoclea his concubine, and Agathocles her brother, who was his catamite, governed him absolutely; and when Arsinoe, who was both his sister and wife, complained of the neglect, which, by means of these two favourites, was put upon her, this so offended the king and his catamite, that orders were given to have her put to death. But he did not long survive her; for, having worn out a strong constitution by his intemperance and debaucheries, he ended his life before he had lived out half the course of it.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 204.

^a In the books of the Maccabees, we find frequent mention made of elephants, because after the reign of Alexander the Great, these animals were very much employed in the armies, which the kings of Syria and Egypt raised. They were naturally of a very quiet and gentle disposition, and never made use of their strength, but when they were irritated, or compelled to it: and for this reason, we find that the elephants which were in the army of Antiochus Eupater, had the blood of grapes and mulberries shown them, thereby to animate them to the combat, (1 Mac. vi. 34.) as those, which here Ptolemy Philopater kept, were intoxicated with incense dipped in wine, to make them his armies at liberty to engage the Romans, ^a who, since the defeat of Hannibal, in the second Punic war, were become justly formidable, made a peace with Ptolemy, and, giving him his daughter Cleopatra in marriage, with her he resigned the provinces of Cœlo-Syria and Palestine, by way of dower.

By this means Judea reverted to the Egyptian crown, and Joseph, the nephew of Onias, the high priest, was reinstated in the office of collecting the king's revenues, in that and the neighbouring provinces. But, as Ptolemy, in a short time, had a son by Cleopatra, upon which occasion it was necessary for Joseph, among other great officers of state, to congratulate the king and queen, and to make them such presents as were usual, he, being now too old to take such a journey, and his other sons refusing to go, was obliged to send Hyrcanus, who was the youngest, but the best qualified for such a negotiation, to make his compliment in his stead. But the history of the young man's birth is somewhat remarkable.

^a It was by Hannibal's instigation that he entered upon this war, wherein he was far from having the success which he expected. Two years he took up in preparations for it; and had got together an army consisting of seventy thousand foot, twelve thousand horse, and fifty-four elephants; but the Romans, with less than half the number, met him near Magnesia, under mount Siphilus, and there gave him a total overthrow.

^b According to the Jewish law, an uncle might marry his niece, though an aunt (Lev. xviii. 12, 13, and xx. 19,) might not marry her nephew, for which the Jewish writers assign this reason:—That the aunt being in respect of the nephew, in the same degree with the father or mother, in the line of descent, had naturally a superiority over him; and therefore for him to make her his wife, and thereby to bring her down to be in a degree below him, as all wives in respect of their husbands are,

Hyrcanus, when he undertook the journey to Alexandria, persuaded his father not to send his presents from Judea, but to purchase them rather at Alexandria, obtained, by this means, an unlimited credit upon his agent in that city: and therefore, when he came thither, instead of ten talents, as might be expected, he demanded a thousand, which in our money amounts to above two hundred thousand pounds.

With this money he bought an hundred beautiful boys for the king, and an hundred beautiful young maids for the queen, at the price of a talent a head; and when he presented them, they carried each a talent in their hands, the boys for the king, and the young maids for the queen; so that this article alone cost him four hundred talents. The rest he expended all in valuable gifts to the courtiers, and great officers about the king, except what he kept for his own private use.

By these means growing highly in favour with the king, queen, and all the court, he made use of his interest to supplant his father; and under pretence of his old age and imbecility, obtained of the king a commission to be the collector of the royal revenues in all the country beyond Jordan; which so enraged his brothers, that, with their father's connivance at least, if not direct approbation, they conspired to waylay him, and cut him off, as he returned: but the guards who attended him, and were to assist him in the execution of his office, proved too strong in the assault, wherein two of his brothers fell.

When he came to Jerusalem, however, his father would not see him, and nobody would own him; so that he passed over Jordan, and entered upon the execution of his office: but upon his father's death, which happened soon after, a war commenced between him and his surviving brothers, about the paternal estate, which, for some time, disturbed the peace of the Jews at Jerusalem. But as the high priest, and generality of the people, sided with the brothers, he was again forced to retreat beyond Jordan, where he lived in a strong castle; until Antiochus Epiphanes, succeeded to the throne of Syria, and threatening to punish him according to his deserts, made him, for fear of his threats, fall upon his sword and slay himself.

Upon the unhappy death of Antiochus the Great, ^c his son Seleucus Philopater succeeded him in the kingdom of Syria, to which was annexed Judea, and the other would be to disturb and invert the order of nature; but that there is no such thing done, when the uncle married the niece, in which case, both keep the same degree and order that they were in before, without the least mutation.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 187.

^c On his coming into the province of Elymais, hearing that in that country there was a great treasure in the temple of Jupiter Belus, and being in great difficulties how to raise money to pay the Romans, he seized the temple by night, and spoiled it of all its riches: which so enraged the people of the country, that to revenge this sacrilege, they rose upon him, and slew him, and all that were with him. He was a prince of that laudable character for humanity, clemency, beneficence, and of great justice in the administration of his government, and till the fiftieth year of his life, managed all his affairs with that valour, prudence, and application, as made him prosper in all his undertakings, and deservedly gained him the title of the Great; but in the latter part of his life, declining in the wisdom of his conduct, as well as in the vigour of his application, every thing he did then lessened him as fast as all his actions had aggrandized him before.—Prideaux's Connection, anno 187.

adjacent provinces. At his first accession, he favoured the Jews, and supplied them with all things for the service of the temple at his own expense; but being, some time after, informed by one Simon a Benjamite, that there were great riches in the temple, he sent his treasurer Heliodorus, to make seizure of them, and bring them to Antioch. But Heliodorus, going into the temple for that purpose, and entering into the sacred treasury, was stopped in his attempt by an apparition of angels, armed, as it were, to defend the place against his sacrilegious hands; for these are the words wherein the history of the Maccabees relates the matter: ' There appeared unto him an horse, with a terrible rider upon him, and adorned with a very fair covering, and he ran fiercely, and smote at him with his fore-feet; and he that sat upon the horse, seemed to have a complete harness of gold. Moreover, two other men appeared before him, notable in strength, excellent in beauty, and comely in apparel, who stood by him on either side, scourging him continually, and giving him many sore stripes, insomuch that he fell to the ground; but being taken up by those that attended him, and carried off in a litter, he continued speechless, and without all hopes of life, for some time, till, at the intercession of his friends, the high priest prayed to God for him, and so he recovered.

Not long after this, the same Heliodorus, aspiring at the crown, poisoned his master Seleucus, in hopes of succeeding him; but Eumenes, king of Pergannus, and Attalus his brother obstructed his design, and placed Antiochus, surnamed Epiphanes; ^a another son of Anti-

^a If we may credit the conjecture of Appian he was surnamed Ἐπιφανής (the Illustrious) because he vindicated the claims of the royal family against the usurpations of the foreigner Heliodorus. He also bore the surname of Θεός, which is still seen upon his coins. But as he is represented by historians, he well merited the surname of Ἐπιμανής (the Insane) which his subjects gave him instead of Ἐπιφανής. He often lounged like a mere idler about the streets of Antioch, attended by two or three servants; and, not deigning to look at the nobles, would talk with goldsmiths and other mechanics in their workshops, engage in trifling and idle conversation with the lowest of the people, and mingle in the society of foreigners and men of the vilest character. He was not ashamed to enter the dissipated circles of the young, to drink and carouse with them, and to promote their revelries by singing and playing on his flute. He often appeared among the common people at the public baths, engaging in every kind of foolish jest without the least regard to the dignity of his station and character. Not unfrequently did he appear in the streets in a state of intoxication, when he would scatter his money about and practise various other fooleries equally extravagant. Sometimes he exhibited still more decisive tokens of madness. He would parade the streets of his capital in a long robe and with a garland of roses upon his head, and if any attempted to pass by or to follow him, he would pelt them with stones which he carried concealed under his garments. When the humour pleased him, he would array himself in a white robe like the candidates at Rome, and in this dress go about Antioch, saluting the citizens whom he met, taking them by the hand, embracing them and supplicating their suffrages for some Roman office, of which they probably had never before heard even the name. When he had thus obtained a number of votes, sufficient to constitute him a tribune or an edile, he would with great solemnity seat himself in an ivory chair in the market-place, after the manner of the Romans, listen with deep attention to the most trifling disputes, and pronounce judgment upon them with all the gravity of a Roman magistrate. At other times he publicly appeared in familiar intercourse with panders and common prostitutes. His liberality was profusion without bounds, and often ridiculous. He sometimes presented great sums of money to ochus the Great, upon the Syrian throne, who proved a very terrible enemy and persecutor of the Jews. No sooner was he settled in the kingdom, but being destitute of money, and having an heavy tribute to pay to the Romans, ² he deposed Onias, a man of singular piety and goodness, from the high priesthood, and for 360 talents, which he engaged to pay yearly, sold it to his brother Jason. But as Jason had supplanted Onias, so his brother Menelaus, being sent to Antioch with this tribute-money, for 300 talents more than Jason had given, purchased the priesthood, and had him, in like manner deposed: whereupon he withdrew to the country of the Ammonites, waiting for some revolution in his favour.
